Mr. GWIN. I think the Senator from Maryland is mistaken in regard to the Whig party not getting the benefit of a report of the proceedings of Congress. I think the most efficient reports of the proceedings of Congress that are published in this city are in the National Intelligencer. They contain the most information. They are not so extensive, but they are drawn up with great care and accuracy. They give an account of the proceedings, which the people will read. The reports in the official papers are so long and go into such details that the people will not read them, as they will read those in the Intelligencer. I think the reports of the Intelligencer are admirable. They embody the proceedings of Congress, leaving out a great many details which are not necessary. If the honorable Senator from Maryland will bring forward a proposition to compensate the editors of that paper for the reports they publish, I will sustain it. Those reports are much more condensed, and therefore are read more extensively in the country. I think therefore that the objection the Senator from Maryland brings forward is not sustained by the facts of the case.

Mr. PRATT. Will the honorable Senator bring me a National Intelligencer, and show me a debate? Except, perhaps, upon the question of a war, which was alluded to the other day, I have not seen a single speech of a member of this body published in that paper. It may be that, according to the view of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, the editors of that paper have been making a selection, and that in their judgment there has not been any speech made this session by any Senator or member of the other House worthy of dissemination among the people. But it is certainly true that there has been no speech of a member of this body published in that paper, except upon the isolated question of the fisheries, and of non-intervention; and I will state, as a fact which cannot be overcome, that we pay about $100,000, or more, for the printing of the speeches of the members of this body. We pay a very large amount, which comes out of the public Treasury, for the publication of those speeches; and the question is, Shall the people be permitted to subscribe for this paper, and read those speeches? That is the whole question. Under the existing law they cannot subscribe, because the postage prevents its being sent, except at enormous rates.

Mr. GWIN. I think the Senator misunderstood me. My statement was, that the reports of the proceedings of Congress in the Intelligencer are more generally read than the reports in any other newspaper, because they are more succinct, and give the substance of the proceedings, without going into unnecessary details. I think they are the most interesting and useful reports; and, as I said before, if the Senator will bring forward a proposition to compensate the editors for their reports, I shall be willing to vote for it. I do not think it is necessary to publish all these speeches. I do not think the people read them. I think the publication of our proceedings are entirely too extensive.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to a third reading by a vote, on a division, of ayes 21, noes 17. It was then read a third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The PRESIDENT. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, private bills come up in their order.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to suspend, for the remainder of the day, the operation of the order requiring to-day to be devoted to private bills, for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CLEMENS. I hope that motion will not prevail. We have on our table a number of private bills which, if passed at all, must be passed to-day. It is a matter of very little importance whether the Indian appropriation bill gets through this week, next week, or the week after. Nobody will be affected injuriously by it, if it does not pass until the end of the session. But there are claimants here who have just claims on the Government, whose claims we know will not be attended to—for this session at least—unless they are disposed of to-day. Claimants are here demanding justice at our hands. I hope it will be granted to them.

Besides, there are other reasons why the Indian appropriation bill should not be taken up to-day. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. ARCHISON] has not concluded an examination which he has been making in relation to the very next amendment which comes up. There is also an amendment to be offered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, in which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] feels a great deal of interest, and he is detained to-day by the sickness of his son. If the bill should be taken up, therefore, we should be compelled to postpone it, because Senators would not go on with it under the circumstances. At any rate, it would be impossible to get through with it to-day, and it is wholly immaterial whether we get through with it or not to-day. It is not necessary that it should be passed to-day. There is no pressing necessity for it. There is no immediate demand for its passage, and we know that if the private bills are postponed now, they will not be considered again for the remainder of the session. I hope we shall proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. President, I think there would not have been so many private bills upon the Calendar undisposed of, if the Senate had agreed to sit on Saturdays. I recollect that on last Friday my friend from Alabama himself made the motion to adjourn over until Monday, and I am not sure but that he made the motion on more than one occasion. I have thought that it would be better for us to sit on Saturday for the very purpose of disposing of the bills on the Private Calendar, for every one must see that unless these bills are acted on now, there is no probability whatever, that they will pass the House of Representatives at the present session.

In order, therefore, to dispatch, particularly that portion of the business accumulating on our hands, it would be better for the Senate to sit on Saturday.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, I suspect that we have passed and sent to the House as many private bills as they will be likely to act upon at this session, or as they will have time enough to act upon. There is time enough for us to act upon any private bills which may have been sent by the House of Representatives. But I fear it would be throwing away time now to consider any more of our own private bills, and send them to the House.

Nor do I agree with the Senator from Alabama, that it is a matter of no importance whether the Indian appropriation bill is settled this week or next week. We have proposed to adjourn on the 31st of August. If we do so, it will require us to occupy ourselves industriously. If we mean to discharge the public business of the country, there are other things to do—there are other public measures, besides the appropriation bills, to be attended to. Nor does it follow that we should do nothing in relation to the Indian bill at all, on account of what has been said by the Senator from Alabama. It is true, there is an amendment which the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs wishes further time to examine. That amendment could be laid over. But there are other amendments of the Committee on Finance, and there are amendments which the Committee on Indian Affairs, I understand, is now prepared to offer as soon as the Senate shall be through with the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I hope we shall go on with private bills to-day. At an early period of the session, we recognized the propriety of giving these private bills a fair consideration, and made it a portion of our rules that we would devote Friday of every week to their consideration. We have, time after time, suspended that rule, and put off private bills sometimes for as many as three Fridays in succession. Now, towards the close of the session, when we know there are private bills here, the justice and the pressing necessity of which no one will deny, and which cannot be passed, as the Senator from Alabama has suggested, at this session, unless acted upon to-day, we are called upon to postpone them. I do think that from these considerations, and from common justice, we ought to proceed to the consideration of private bills.

Mr. HUNTER. I am informed by the Secretary of the Senate, that we have never passed as many private bills at any session before, as at this session; so that I think it is not fair to say that the Senate has done injustice to private claimants.

Mr. RUSK. I am very sure that we have not passed half as many private bills as we ought to have passed. There are many bills on the table which have been reported and re-reported, passed and repassed. If we have passed some at this session, and now refuse to consider the rest, it is making favorites of some claimants against the Government, and postponing others.

Mr. CLEMENS. I wish to say a word in reply to the Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER.] He says that on last Friday I made a motion to adjourn over, and thereby defeated the action of the Senate on private bills on Saturday. Why, does not that Senator know that if we had met on Saturday, not one solitary private bill would have been touched? Does he not know that by a standing rule of the Senate, we take up private bills on Fridays. Besides, I do not know whether last Friday was wasted, but other matters took precedence.

Mr. WELLER. The Senator is mistaken as to what I did say. I did not say that private bills necessarily came up on Saturday, but that we might have sat on Saturdays and disposed of some of them. That is my opinion still.

Mr. CLEMENS. We have never spent any day upon private bills, except days specially set apart for them. If we were to sit here from now till the beginning of the next session, we would not do so. I did make a motion to adjourn over on last Friday, and it is probable I shall make the same motion to-day—and I believe the Senator voted with me then.

Mr. WELLER. No, sir.

Mr. CLEMENS. He certainly did not vote against the motion.

Mr. WELLER. The Senator is mistaken. I never voted to adjourn over.

Mr. CLEMENS. I believe there was no division on the motion, and we know that gentlemen are sometimes willing to have it done, although they do not want to help to do it.

The motion to suspend the order requiring private bills to be taken up, was not agreed to, there being, on a division, ayes 18, noes 20.

JOSEPH H. D. BOWMAR.

Mr. DOWNS. There is a private bill which was laid on the table some weeks ago, which I wish the Senate now to take up and dispose of. It is a bill for the relief of Joseph H. D. Bowmar. It was laid on the table under peculiar circumstances. The Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FELCH], the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and myself differed about a material fact in the case, and I therefore consented that the bill should be laid on the table. Since that time, I have examined the matter, and I have satisfied myself as to that point, and I therefore ask the Senate to take up the bill now and dispose of it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, its consideration. It provides for granting a patent to Joseph H. D. Bowmar, of Carroll parish, Louisiana, for a lot in fractional section No. 27, in township 19, of range 13 east, in the district of lands north of Red river, subject to entry and sale, at Ouachita, in the State of Louisiana, containing one hundred and forty-five and thirteen hundredths acres, on final settlement certificate No. 9977, issued to Bowmar on May 16, 1849; and that so much of the second section of the act of March 3, 1849, entitled "An act for the relief of James G. Carson," as confirms the selection made by the Secretary of the Treasury of said lot No. 27, for the use of public schools be repealed: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to reduce the quantity of land to which that township is entitled by law.

Mr. FELCH called for the reading of the report of the Committee on Private Land Claims; and it was read.

From that report it appears that Bowmar, the memorialist, settled on lot No. 27, in fractional township 19, range 13 east, in the district of lands north of Red river, and became entitled to preemption in consequence of such settlement. This lot having been improperly selected for school purposes, upon an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, the selection was revoked, January 4, 1849, and the memorialist was permitted to enter his preemption. Before the entry was actually made, however, Congress, in ignorance of his rights, passed an act for the benefit of James G. Carson, by which Carson was permitted to enter the lot No. 27, which had been entered for school purposes by the proper officers, and for the settlement of which the memorialist had obtained a certificate bearing date May 16th, 1849. Owing to the obstacle arising from the act of Congress for the relief of Carson, a patent was refused to Bowmar. The committee, therefore, are of opinion that a bill should be passed allowing the memorialist to enter on this section.

Mr. FELCH. This bill was reached in its order some time ago, and upon my motion, I believe, it was then laid upon the table. Since that time I have looked into the facts in relation to it, and as I have not my memorandum here, not supposing it would again be called up out of its order, my recollection is not very fresh in regard to it. I was satisfied, however, from examining the matter, that this bill ought not to be passed. The difficulty about it is, that the land to which a preemption right is proposed to be given in this bill is, in point of fact, school land belonging to the State, being, I believe, the sixteenth section, which, in each township, is set aside by general law for school purposes. It seems to have been claimed by preemption right for an individual named Carson, and a law was passed by Congress allowing him to enter the land, providing, at the same time, as the general law provides, that if the sixteenth section should be taken in that way, the parties might select another in lieu of it. Those authorities selected this twenty-seventh section, and it became the property of the State for school purposes.

I think there has been some subsequent action on the matter by Congress, and yet, after all, there is nothing, so far as I have been able to discover when I looked over the papers, which divested the title of the State. It is, as I understand it, the property of the State as school land, and therefore it is not in the power of Congress to make a different disposition of it and deprive the State. I know there is a proviso in this bill which declares that it shall not diminish the quantity of land taken for school purposes. Of course we cannot divest the State authorities without their consent, and even if we should undertake to do so, the bill makes no provision as to the manner in which the same quantity of land shall be taken elsewhere. The difficulty arises from the want of power on the part of Congress to make this disposition. I regret that the question should have been brought up to-day, because I have some memoranda on the subject which I wished to present, and am compelled now to state only my general recollection of the matter.

Mr. DOWNS. Mr. President, I am sorry that the gentleman has not got his memorandum here. He had it here when the subject was up before, and I regret to say that it was totally erroneous, and gave an incorrect representation of the whole matter. I have looked into the papers since the question was up before, and I see no reason to doubt the propriety of the bill. The gentleman does not understand this case as well as he would have the Senate believe he does.

I must say once for all, that I consider it a little extraordinary that, not only in this case, but in many other cases reported on by the Committee on Private Land Claims, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands should take upon himself to supervise their proceedings, and consider that nothing should be done on a case, unless it came from his committee. If that course is to be pursued, I suppose the gentleman had better move to disengage altogether with the services of the Committee on Private Land Claims. And now to show with how much caution gentlemen of another committee ought to interfere with the proceedings of a committee of which he has no knowledge, I wish to point out to the gentleman, and to the Senate, how egregiously he has mistaken the whole case, when he comes in to correct the solemn and formal action of another committee.

The Senator has stated that this is an ordinary case of preemption—that here is a lot of land set apart in the township as a school lot, and that therefore it must be sacredly preserved as such, and that Congress has no power to dispense with that rule, or to give it to the claimant in this case. This is an imperfect statement of the case. The true statement is this: That, under a special act of Congress, passed in 1826, I believe there have been selected in this particular township instead of one, three school lots. By that act, in certain fractional and other townships, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to make certain selections, so as to give the proper school authorities in Louisiana certain lands. They made those selections. In several townships various lands were selected. In this particular township three lots were selected. Sometimes through inadvertence, or want of information, more lands were selected than the township was entitled to. In this particular case it was ascertained, long afterwards, that more than the quantity to which the fractional township was entitled had been selected. The petitioner here, who has settled on one of those lots, petitioned the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Walker, and after a formal investigation of the matter, the Secretary took up the question and decided that more than the legitimate portion of this township had been selected, and that, therefore, he would release, not lot sixteen, but lot twenty-seven, which Bowmar claims, from that reservation, and allow him to perfect his preemption. Now, is there anything illegal in that? Is there anything improper in that? Was it not competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to undo an error which had been made before? Most assuredly it was. It has been done in other cases. After full examination he did release this land from the school reservation, and allow Bowmar to go on and perfect his preemption.

But the gentleman is equally mistaken in the law as he is in the fact. He says Congress has no power to make such a release as that; whereas, the papers here show that the very act of Congress passed in favor of Carson did release the township—the act of Congress did release a portion of the land, and gave a preemption right to Carson. That act of Congress released one of the three lots from the same reservation which the Secretary of the Treasury, by authority, had previously released. Perhaps Congress has now grown wiser than it has been heretofore, or, if we follow the advice of the gentleman, we shall grow wiser; but this has been the practice pursued for many years. There are many cases in which these exemptions from reservation have been granted, and especially in cases of this kind, where three lots were selected instead of one. It is perfectly competent to do it. Precisely the same thing was done by Congress for Carson, and was done by the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to Bowmar. The only reason why Bowmar did not perfect his entry in accordance with the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury, made before the passage of the act passed for the relief of Carson, was that he did not apply to the Land Office before that act was passed.

A serious mistake which the gentleman made when the subject was up before—as I understood him, and his memorandum showed it—was that the act of Congress for the relief of Carson was passed before the release by the Secretary of the Treasury. The papers show that such is not the fact; that this release was made before the passage of the act, and that if Bowmar had happened to apply to the Land Office earlier, he would have been allowed to perfect his entry. He was obliged to go to the Land Office, and before he did go there, to perfect it according to the decision which was made, as the report states, the act was passed. The decision of the Secretary of the Treasury was made in January, and the act was passed in March, I believe. When he came to the Land Office, he found that the act had been passed. The question again came before the Secretary of the Treasury, and he decided that, as Congress had interposed, there was no power for him to interfere.

This, then, is the state of the case. The only objection that existed in this case was removed by the Secretary of the Treasury before Congress passed the act for Carson's relief. That act was passed by Congress without any knowledge that an application had been made to the Department by Bowmar. It is evident that if Congress had known the condition of things, it would not have passed that act. The act of Congress in favor of Carson, mentions this reservation, and the selection previously made. That would not have been done if it had been known that the selection had been set aside previously by the Secretary of the Treasury, as the papers show that was done.

The whole case, then, is this: There were three lots reserved for schools in this particular township. Bowmar, I believe, was the oldest settler, and certainly the one who obtained the consent of the people of the township, for the other party did not obtain their consent. He applied in the regular manner to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary released the reservation of one of the school lots, and allowed him to perfect his entry; but before the entry was actually perfected Congress, without knowing anything on the subject, passed an act in favor of Carson. Now, I suppose that the regular act of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the discharge of his duty, is as binding under the circumstances as the act of Congress was. I do not dispute the authority of either to release the land from this reservation, and I do not think that either ought to be considered a nullity. The object of this bill, therefore, is to place these parties on the same footing—to continue the release of this reservation which was made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and let Carson, if you please, have the benefit of his act—place the parties on an equal footing, and let the merits of the case be contested before the courts.

There is no contest between the people of the township about this matter. The contest is between Carson and Bowmar; and the object of the bill is to place them on an equal footing, and then they may go before the courts of justice, and have their rights adjudicated. There can be no objection raised that the township will not consent, for the papers show that the township has consented. At any rate, there is a proviso in the bill that it shall not be done contrary to their wishes. The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Atchison,] some time ago, when the subject was up, made objection to the bill, but after investigation he has withdrawn his objection, and thinks the bill ought to pass.

Mr. CASS. I have very great respect for my honorable friend from Louisiana, but it seems to me that his remarks on this case are not characterized by that comity towards my colleague which he usually displays towards his fellow-members, and which we all ought to display. He seems to censure my colleague for investigating a case upon which the Committee on Private Land Claims have reported, and he talks about revising their proceedings, as though any of us were precluded by the report of a committee, and had no right to investigate facts, and circumstances, and principles connected with it. When any member of a committee investigates a case—and I feel as though I could do it in very few cases—and a member comes forward and takes upon himself to look into it, and ascertain the law and the facts in regard to it, in order to guide our decision, I am much obliged to him for it.

Let it be remembered, in this particular case, that my colleague is at the head of the Committee on Public Lands; and between the subjects which go before that committee and the Committee on Private Land Claims there is very great connection; and when he deems it to be his duty, as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, to present his views with respect to the cases thus brought before us, we ought all to be under obligation to him. I am sure that my honorable friend from Louisiana, on reflection, will take that view of the case. The character of my colleague is known to us all. There is not a member on this floor who is not perfectly convinced in the probity of his intentions. Although the Senator from Louisiana is, no doubt, certain as to the justice of his case, we who are dispassionate—we who have had no peculiar cause to investigate it, and no local feelings to act upon us—look upon it as a question which is open to examination, and I am sure the members of the Senate will be thankful to my colleague if he has investigated it. I have considered it my duty, under the circumstances, to advert to the remarks of my honorable friend from Louisiana, in the hope that they will not be repeated, under the circumstances, by any Senator.

Mr. DOWNS. I am very sure my honorable friend from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] who has just addressed the Senate, if he knew the circumstances of the case as well as I do, would not have said what he has said. It was not in regard to an ordinary case that I made these remarks. This is not the first, but the twentieth time, in which this interference which I oppose has taken place. I have heretofore let it pass by in silence. It was not simply the interference in this case which prompted me to make the remarks which I have made; but because here, in a case examined by me and by my committee, an important fact was stated, that this release was made by the Secretary of the Treasury before the bill for the relief of Carson was passed. It was so stated in the report. It was so stated by me in the debate. Yet the Senator got up here in the Senate, and read from a memorandum—and by the way, I would like to know who furnished him with it—that such was not the fact. I was taken so much by surprise at it, that I consented at once that the matter might be investigated, and had the bill laid over.

Now, sir, is that an ordinary occurrence? Is it such an ordinary case that it is to be passed over without any notice? A fact was stated in a formal manner in the report of the committee; it was stated by me here in my place; and yet the gentleman got up and contradicted it. Is it right? Is it proper? Is it just to myself or to the committee that such a matter should be passed over in silence? I was as much astonished as any man could be at the course pursued by the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Felch,] However inconsistent with his usual course, still the facts are as I have stated; and it was my duty, as a member of the committee—as a member of the Senate—to meet it. I intended, on the very next day, when private bills were considered, to have called up the bill, and made some remarks. I did not do so, because the gentleman was then absent, on account of sickness; and circumstances have prevented me calling it up before this time.

The Senator from Michigan who last addressed us [Mr. Cass] is entirely mistaken in supposing that I object to the interference of another member of the Senate with my report. What I do object to is to a Senator contradicting, unless he has sufficient and competent authority to do so, a fact stated by me in my place, and also in the report. Now, it turns out, on investigation, that the fact was as I stated it. That is what I object to, and not to the interference. I think the Senate well knows, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] has observed, that I am not captious in matters of this kind, and I am not disposed to object to interference with my reports. It is done every day. I do not object to a gentleman opposing my bills, but I shall object to any interference under similar circumstances.

Mr. FELCH. Mr. President, I scarcely expected that this debate, which has relation to a matter pending before the Senate—the decision of a question in which no Senator has any particular interest—should have resulted in any thing like a personal allusion; and especially a personal allusion to myself. With the Senator who has just taken his seat, I have always been upon the most friendly terms. But I am surprised at the course which he has taken upon this occasion. His remarks are without foundation in anything which has been said or done by myself, and certainly without foundation in anything which I have ever felt either of interest in this case, or of personal feeling toward the gentleman himself. Sir, I regret it.

I have no harsh words to reply. The Senator must enjoy his remarks to satisfy himself and his feelings, if he has any in regard to the matter; but I repeat, that I regret that he has found it necessary either to entertain a feeling of that kind, or to express it here upon this floor.

Sir, as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, I know as well as any man what are the boundaries of the duties of that committee. I believe that few men here will accuse me of attempting to step beyond the bounds of that duty. But it does so happen, that in relation to administering the public domain, it is very often the case, that what are called private land claims, which go to the Committee on Private Land Claims, are so connected with the class of claims which go to the Committee on Public Lands, as scarcely to be distinguished, the one from the other. Many of them relate to precisely the same subject; and of this very class of cases, some go to the Committee on Public Lands and some to the Committee on Private Land Claims. If I have considered it my duty on any occasion to interfere—to use the expression of the Senator from Louisiana—in matters of this kind, it has been because my attention has been more particularly directed to the subject of the disposition of the public lands, and not from any personal feeling or personal desire to interfere with the reports or the actions of other members of the Senate. I beg Senators to recollect that, placed, as I have been, on the Committee on Public Lands ever since I have been in the Senate—directing my attention to that subject—I have withdrawn my mind from almost all other subjects discussed in this body. I should like sometimes to participate in debates of a more general and interesting character; but I have been compelled to devote my whole energies, and very much of my time, to the duties of that committee; and no man has regretted it more than I have. I know that it has been made the subject of remark in regard to myself, that I have not participated in debates on subjects of more general interest. Having directed my attention to that particular subject—being placed there, not by choice, but against my wishes—I have considered it my duty to look into the disposition of the public domain as well as I could; and to express my views upon those subjects which relate to it whenever they have been presented—not as chairman of that committee, but as a member of the Senate. As one of the members of this body, whenever questions of this kind have come up, and my attention has been directed to them, and I thought I had information which could with profit be presented to the Senate, I have gone beyond any petty personal feeling to perform that which I regard as my duty, and the duty of every member of the Senate.

Have I ever presented a bill here from the Committee on Public Lands, to which I have not invited scrutiny and investigation? Have I ever complained of any man for scrutinizing my reports? Have I ever complained of any one for aiding me in doing justice to those parties who come here for justice, or for protecting the public interests, when those interests (as they always are) are brought in question by the bills we are about to pass? No, sir, I regard it as the duty of every man who stands here, as the chairman of a committee upon any subject, to look around the Senate, upon every side, invite investigation, and seek for information. Whenever I have presented a matter of this kind, I have been ready to thank every man who, with more knowledge than myself, has come up to enable me either to advance the measure I have introduced, or prevent its being advanced when the public interest required that it should not be passed. That is what I regard as my position.

I come here with no complaints of any man, and regret that any one should have found occasion to make a complaining allusion to myself, such as has been made on this occasion. There is one person of whom I would wish never to speak here or elsewhere; and that is myself. Self is the last subject upon which a man ought ever to speak. But I have done with that.

Mr. DOWNS. I merely wish to explain that it was not personal feeling that influenced me. So far from entertaining any personal feeling against the honorable Senator, I spoke because I felt it to be my duty, under the circumstances, to make the remarks which I have made. And, to show that there is no personal feeling on the subject, and has not been from the beginning, but that I have merely done what I considered to be my imperative duty, I take occasion now to say, with all sincerity, that the Senator from Michigan is one of the very last members of the Senate in relation to whom, if I could have had my choice, I should have made the remarks which I have made. There has existed between us a friendship which has never been interrupted. I have great confidence in his judgment. Yet, the circumstances were such that, even against all this, I have felt it to be my duty to make the remarks which I have made.

Mr. FELCH. Mr. President, I come now to the fact which the honorable Senator stated—which was true—that, in the memorandum which I had here before, there was a mistake as to the date of one of the laws passed by Congress. There was a mistake in the date. The honorable Senator took the memorandum from my hands, and returned it to me again, stating that fact. Subsequently I looked upon the memorandum, and found that there was a mistake. But that the Senator supposed it was anything more than a mistake in making out the memorandum never, until this moment, entered my mind. I did not understand him to impute anything wrong in that matter, or anything more than a mere error in copying.

Mr. DOWNS. I wish the gentleman to understand me. I do not even now suppose that the mistake was made by the Senator. I suppose it was made by the memorandum. My objection was, that the Senator used the memorandum after it was stated to him that it was a mistake. I never supposed, nor did I intend to charge, that he had intentionally used the mistaken memorandum; but he did use it after it was stated to be a mistaken one.

Mr. FELCH. I made no use of the memorandum after the Senator pointed out to me the error, and I had an opportunity to look at the papers. After that I made no use of it, either here or elsewhere.

Now, what is the amount of the matter? That the memorandum misled me as to a date; the Senator pointed it out to me; I looked at it, and found that there was a mistake. Have I ever alluded to it since? Have I made use of a memorandum which was not correct, when it was shown to me that it was not correct? I did find that there was a mistake as to the date on the memorandum, and I have never used the memorandum since I found that to be the case. But, on looking at the papers, I was satisfied that it was a mistake, which did not change the principle involved in the case; but, on the contrary, that this section—number twenty-seven—was a section which had been selected by the school authorities, and which had been confirmed by the Secretary of the Treasury, when that Department had charge of the public lands, before the Department of the Interior was organized.

Mr. DOWNS. I would suggest to the Senator that he is entirely mistaken. The selection was made by the register and receiver, under the instructions of the Secretary. The people of the township had nothing to do with the selection.

Mr. FELCH. The selection was made in the manner pointed out by law. At any rate, this twenty-seventh section was selected by the proper authorities, instead of the sixteenth section, which was taken for another purpose. My principle is this: that whenever that section was selected according to law, and was approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, it became, that moment, the property of the State authorities, for school purposes; and from that moment it was out of the power of Congress to give it to a third person, and in that manner divest the title of the local authorities of the State. That is the point in controversy. That is all the point there is in this case.

Suppose the Senator should say I was mistaken in all this. I have no angry feeling on this subject; I am willing to go to the record and see whether I am right. I want to ascertain the facts. I know none of these parties. All I want is that we shall investigate this matter, and do whatever may be right about it. I am willing to give a preëmption right in this case, if we have the power to give it.

I have but a few words more to say, and they are in regard to the proposition of the Senator as to the power of Congress over the school lands. I will explain myself in a very few words on that subject. The sixteenth section is originally, in all the townships, reserved for school purposes, by general law. Previous to the time of the State organization, it is reserved in the same manner pointed out in the laws providing for the survey of the country, reserving the sixteenth section. The sixteenth section is not, however, appropriated for school purposes; that is to say, the title to it does not vest until, by act of Congress, it is made to pass directly in the State within which it lies. The school authorities, and sometimes the townships, have charge of it, and sometimes the State authorities themselves. But whoever may be the competent authority, that authority has the charge of the school lands. Whenever the State is admitted into the Union, the sixteenth section is then provided for. It is provided for, and lately it has been made a condition that they shall have the sixteenth section to manage for themselves, for school purposes, upon assenting to certain other propositions which Congress always makes to them upon their admission. That is the usual way. Whenever they assent, what then is the case? Why, the sixteenth section is no longer a mere reservation for school purposes, to be disposed of afterwards by Congress, but it is the property of the State, for that particular purpose, and comes under the charge of the regular school authorities. That is the true state of the case.

Now, the principle has been this: After the reservation, and before the cession of the land to the State, Congress has power over it, and may grant preëmption rights, and it may dispose of it in other methods, providing, as it always does, to make up the quantity elsewhere, if the sixteenth section should be taken for some other purpose. Up to that time, they have full power over it, as the Senator says. So they have, and they have that power up to the time the school land is ceded to the State; but when it is ceded to the State, the power of Congress ceases—utterly and forever ceases; and Congress then has no authority to grant preëmption rights; no power to give it to individuals—to this man or to that man, for this purpose or for that purpose, without the assent of the State. That doctrine is certainly very clear. It is manifest by this bill, because the bill provides that the inhabitants of the township shall give their assent; but the inhabitants of the township are not the power which have the authority to control and manage this land. By their petitions to Congress, or by their assent, they cannot divest the title which is now in the State or the town authorities, as such, having upon them the obligations and the conditions of that trust, which is merely a trust to use it for school purposes. We cannot divest the title in that manner.

There is my difficulty in this case, and it is the only difficulty I have; it is the abstract question, and nothing else, which weighs upon my mind. It is the question whether, the proper authorities having selected this twenty-seventh section for school purposes, it is competent for the Government to divest them. That is the only question. As I now understand the facts, and as I understood the facts all the while, that principle applies to this case. If it does not apply, however, if Senators are satisfied that in point of fact we have power to divest the title of the State authorities to this land, and to give a preemption right to this individual, certainly I am willing to go with my friend from Louisiana. My difficulty is upon that point. I do not see that we have the power to do what the bill proposes to do.

Mr. DOWNS. I am inclined to think it is a mere question of law. I think the Senator assumes that Congress has no legal power to release this reservation. No doubt the distinction which has been made is a good one, where land was originally reserved as land vested in a State; but in both cases, both before and after its investment in a State, it has been the practice of Congress to release such reservations with the consent of the parties interested. Why, sir, in the very act for the relief of Carson, there was a reservation of another section in the same township in the same reservation, and the land was in the same situation as this land was when the reservation was asked at the Treasury Department. I cannot see how the question of legality can arise. Does the gentleman contend against the right of Carson also? There was no difficulty in the case of Carson. It was in consequence of the fact that the Carson claim was allowed, that the Secretary of the Treasury withdrew the permission of this claimant to perfect his title, and therefore he must have considered the claim of Carson valid. But, according to the doctrine of the Senator, the act in favor of Carson was illegal and inoperative. If this were an original question I would say, never in a single case remove the reservation; but when I looked into the statute-book, and found that the thing was done every day, and also after the consent of the people of the township was given, and saw that it was done by the competitor in this case, since Congress has given this man Carson the preference here, I do not see why there should not be fair play between them, and why they should not both be put upon the same footing.

According to the idea of the Senator from Michigan, the act in favor of Carson was illegal; and because it is doubtful, he will allow the illegal act to stand, and reject this claim. Why give Carson his claim, and deny it to the other? Even supposing that Congress have not the power to release from reservation, it seems unjust to do it in one case and not in the other. You thus give one of them a title; and the moment you have done it, you take from the other the privilege of perfecting his title also. I know the gentleman would not deny justice in this case, by granting to one what he would refuse to another. We do not ask that Congress shall take the land from one and give it to the other. All we ask is that Congress will place the two parties on the same ground.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to inquire whether this land was selected by authority of the State first for school purposes, and whether that selection was approved by the proper authority here?

Mr. DOWNS. These selections are made by the registers and receivers of public money, and the school authorities have nothing to do with it.

Mr. SHIELDS. That may be the case in Louisiana. I wish to know whether the land was selected for school purposes, and whether the selection was approved by the agent of the Government? and if so, whether we could pass a law relating to it after that?

Mr. DOWNS. Such laws have been passed repeatedly.

Mr. SHIELDS. I was not aware of the fact.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not intend to enter into this discussion, although the subject is one in which I feel much interest, involving, as it does, the question as to the power of the Government to undertake to divest the school authorities of their title to lands granted for school purposes. The law has been so plainly stated by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FELCH,] and by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] as to the principle of law involved, that it is unnecessary for me to say anything on that subject. As to the practice of Government, I have had especial occasion to look into that subject, not in regard to this case, but in regard to others, very carefully; and I am not aware of a single case in which Congress has passed an act undertaking to divest a State, or the school authorities in a State, of school lands after the selection and confirmation of such lands have been made.

Mr. DOWNS. I will point out a case to the Senator. The very case under discussion, in which this man Carson is concerned, is one of that kind.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not acquainted with the circumstances of that case; it has escaped my observation; but I will undertake to say that, as a question of law, although I do not pretend to be a lawyer, if Congress have passed such an act, it is of no force, and that the State authorities, or the school authorities, can, at any time, enforce their title, and claim the land, no matter into whose hands it may have passed, or what laws Congress may have enacted. Why, if Congress have made a grant of land, and that land has been selected, and the title confirmed to the grantee, whether an individual, a State, or a school, they have no more authority to pass an act to take back that property without free consent of the owner, than they have to go into any State of the Union and pass an act to divest an individual of a piece of landed property of which he may have been possessed for fifty years.

I rose, principally, for the purpose of making an inquiry of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. DOWNS,] as to the law of his State on this subject. As I understand the question, the bill provides that the grant shall be made to this individual, on condition that the school authorities of the township shall give their consent to it.

Mr. DOWNS. If the Secretary will read the proviso to the bill, it will answer the inquiry of the Senator.

The proviso was read, as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed, as to reduce the quantity of land to which said township is entitled by law.

Mr. BORLAND. That does not meet the question I intended to ask the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. DOWNS,] The bill renders it necessary that the authorities shall give their assent. I understand that the authorities of Louisiana have nothing to do with the school lands; that, by legislative provision, the school lands are consolidated, and that one common fund is formed for the whole State; so that an act of the Legislature, and nothing but an act of the Legislature, together with an act of Congress, could make such a grant valid.

Mr. DOWNS. I think that this proviso clearly shows the argument of both the Senators to be wrong. Their argument is, that it is not competent for Congress to take away this particular quantity of land. The bill is furnished with that express provision, for it says, that the effect of the bill shall not be to diminish the quantity of land. If this is so, and if it be possible to give this individual his right of preemption, and not deprive the people of the township of any right to which they are entitled, does not the argument of both gentlemen, in such case, fall to the ground? That provision is a part of the bill. It limits the bill, which has no proper authority to deprive the school authorities of a single acre of land. Does not such a proviso answer all objects, and silence all objections?

Mr. BORLAND. The Senator from Louisiana is mistaken if he supposes that I am arguing merely in regard to the quantity of the land. He knows well enough, that in many cases the value of land does not depend so much upon its quantity as upon its locality and quality; and, to show what I mean, I will remark, that in my own State, by act of Congress, there were two changes of school lands for other lands which very seriously injured the school interest. These two instances, however, were before the grants had been perfected, and while they were merely reservations. In one case, the sixteenth section was deemed a proper one, on account of its locality, to locate a town upon in the county of Washington, in the western part of the State of Arkansas. The county authorities desired it as a location for the seat of justice for that county; and application was made to Congress, and the sixteenth section was granted by Congress to that county, to be laid off into two lots and used for the building of a court-house and jail, and other buildings, and commissioners were appointed to make a selection somewhere else. The proceeds of the sale of that section on which that town was built, was sufficient to endow a college, and the other section which the school authorities got, in lieu of it, has not been sufficient to establish even a common school.

So also in another case, Congress passed an act taking the sixteenth section in another county—the county of Crawford—for the establishment of a military fort and dépôt, and directing that the school section should be taken somewhere else. Now, the value of the land where this fortification now stands, as in the other case, is sufficient to endow a college, and yet they have not, to this day, got land enough in that county to endow a school. It is to prevent things of this sort, that I am opposed to the passage of such laws—to say nothing of the want of power on the part of Congress.

I know nothing of this particular case. I know nothing of the parties claiming here; but I apprehend it is a fact that this piece of land for which this individual is here claiming the right of preemption, is worth five times as much as any public land in any part of that county; and if you grant the right of preemption to this individual—that is supposing you have the power—you will give him land at the rate of $1 25 per acre which in all probability may be worth $10 or $20 or $25 per acre, or even more than that, and you force the commissioners to go and select a piece of land in lieu of it which is perhaps not worth more than $1 or $1 25 per acre. That is certain, because in that region all the lands which are salable have been taken up, and in that way you defeat the beneficent object of Congress in granting lands for school purposes. You permit, for the benefit of an individual, the use of most valuable land, and you turn the schools off with lands which for all the years they have been in market have not yet sold for $1 25 per acre; and you thus give them that which produces a sum altogether insufficient for the attainment of the object for which the grant was originally made.

I am quite aware, Mr. President, that there may be individual cases of hardship. Individuals, as we know has frequently been the case, may have settled by mistake upon school lands and improved them. In all these cases I would go as far as I have lawful authority to relieve them; but when I am met by such an obstacle as meets us in this case, namely, the want of power, I hold that in the first place, if we pass such an act, it would be worth nothing if the school authorities thought proper to contest it; and in the second place, that we would do great wrong to the school interest for the benefit of an individual. I cannot, therefore, give my sanction to it.

Mr. RUSK. I see no difficulty which can result from the passage of this bill. I have not investigated the case much, but from the discussion it seems to me clear that the school authorities can lose nothing by the passage of the bill, while, if we refuse to pass it, much injury may result to the settlers. If it be not absolutely school lands, he is entitled to his preemption, certainly; and if it be school lands, and has been vested by an act of Congress in an individual, we cannot by a second act of Congress give a title. The bill is on a footing which is guarded. There is an express proviso that limits the bill, and prevents him from claiming the land at all, if it came into the quantity set aside for schools. Under these circumstances, I can see no objection to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HEIRS OF JOSHUA KENNEDY.

Mr. CLEMENS. I now move that the Senate take up Senate bill No. 257, being "A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Joshua Kennedy, deceased." It is a bill which has been reported favorably several times by committees of the Senate; it has passed this body three times, and has passed the House once, at a different session. I think there can be no objection to it. It was taken up a few days ago, and laid over in consequence of objection being made by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.]

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal representatives of Joshua Kennedy, deceased, the sum of $6,500, in full compensation for the destruction of property by the Creek Indians in the year 1813.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Is there any report from the committee?

Mr. CLEMENS. There is a report accompanying the bill, and as it explains the subject much better than any speech I could make, I will read it, with the permission of the Senate:

"The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs of Joshua Kennedy, respectfully report: That they have examined the case with great care, and find the facts to be in exact accordance with the narrative contained in the report of the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives at the first session of the Thirtieth Congress, herewith filed and intended to be made a part hereof. On entering upon the examination of this case, the committee felt a distrust of its justice, occasioned by the length of time during which it had been permitted to remain unsettled, and the fact that a commission had been appointed for the express purpose of deciding upon this and similar claims.

The prejudice which had thus arisen soon passed away, however, on a careful examination of the facts as stated in the evidence, particularly when it was ascertained that there had been no laches on the part of the petitioner in presenting his claim, which had been left unsettled owing to the shortness of the time for which the commission was appointed, to wit: two years. The destruction for which the petitioner asks indemnity did not take place 'while' the troops occupied the property; but there can be no doubt that 'such occupation was the cause of its destruction,' so that the case, in the opinion of the committee, comes clearly within the spirit, if not the letter, of the act of 1816, and the supplement thereto. If the military occupation be the exciting cause of the destruction, it is difficult to imagine what difference the precise moment at which the destruction took place can make. It is the feeling of hostility, created on the part of the enemy by the act of the Government in erecting a source of annoyance in their neighborhood, which makes the Government liable for the consequences of its own act, and not the particular time chosen by the enemy to satisfy its vengeance. In the case under consideration, the petitioner had originally erected his buildings and other improvements under the assurance given in the President's proclamation, that the persons and property of settlers should be protected. Subsequently these buildings were converted into a temporary fort by an officer of the Government, and as such became the point of assault to the Indians immediately after their successful attack on Fort Mimms and the massacre of its garrison. It is true, the party of troops which had occupied the premises had, in their panic, occasioned by the destruction and slaughter at Fort Mimms, retired; but immediately after that destruction, and whilst the military defenses were still in existence, the premises were attacked and destroyed by the enemy."

Mr. BRODHEAD. I believe this is the first bill of that precise character which has been brought before the Senate—probably the first time that a bill of this character has been reported. The claim for compensation here made, arises out of the destruction, by the Indians, of some private property, which was occupied, or which had been occupied by the troops of the United States. Now, the rule in civilized warfare is, that where private property is occupied by the forces of the contending parties, it is lawful for the enemy to destroy such property, and the Government reimburses the owner for the damage so inflicted. That is the rule observed in civilized warfare; but the same rule has not prevailed when private property has been destroyed by the Indians in consequence of its being occupied as a military post, because the Indians invariably destroy private as well as public property; they have never made any discrimination in this respect. The fact that this mill was occupied for some time by our troops, would not make any difference in the degree of hostility shown by the Indians. During the period of its occupancy by the troops, it was quasi public property; but it was not so occupied at the moment of its destruction, and therefore the fact of the occupation for a brief period, does not bring the case within the rule established after the war of 1812, and referred to in this report.

If there are any precedents in favor of this claim, I should like to see them. If the bill passes, there are numerous other cases of a similar character which will come here. The whole western frontier—more especially as our settlements are pushed further west—will send in claims for compensation in that case.

As the Indians have never exercised any discrimination between public and private property; and as the rules, applicable to the compensation of parties who have suffered loss by civilized warfare, have never been applied to the relief of those whose property has been destroyed by savages, I shall be compelled to vote against this bill, unless there are some very peculiar facts connected with the case.

Mr. RUSK. The law of 1816 was general in its character, and did not make the distinction which the Senator from Pennsylvania draws. He draws a distinction between civilized and savage warfare. The law was broad and liberal. Though this case has been reported upon favorably many times, there has been one adverse report upon it since 1816; and one of the difficulties I had in reporting upon it was, that, as I supposed, the parties had not applied under that general law. It turned out, however, upon investigation, that they did apply under the act of 1816. The board that sat to determine the amount of damage to be paid, under that act, was limited in time, and as the Senate will remember, that time expired before they could examine this case. There was no objection to this claim whatever, because the law was general, and covered all cases of wars with Indians as with civilized enemies. The facts in the case are these, and it comes within the principle of the law of 1816, so that so far from being a precedent, it is in conformity with numerous cases which have passed Congress. Sometime since, I investigated the matter, and I found numerous affidavits in relation to the case, though some were considered not entirely correct at the time. The claim is for buildings, which were a set of mills, to the neighborhood of which the troops had been ordered, and which they took possession of and occupied, because they were the most defensible place in the neighborhood. Our troops were there, and they put up some barricades around the mill and occupied it as a post. The Indians, during the time that these troops were in this occupation, attacked and massacred every one in Fort Mimms. This was two miles below. I suppose they did not kill every one; but they took that fort, and coming to this post, and seeing that it had been used by their enemy, they destroyed it, burnt up the mill, fortifications, and all. To show that the fact of its having been occupied by our troops was the moving cause of their destroying it, it is only necessary to take into consideration the fact that there was considerable other property in the neighborhood which they did not touch. These are the facts about this case. It comes within all the rules of the precedents, instead of being itself a precedent.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I make a legal point, and make but one point. Perhaps I was not sufficiently well understood when I was up before. I do not dispute the facts that are urged in relation to this claim; I admit the facts all to be true. The question is this: In civilized warfare, wherever our troops have occupied private property, and the enemy has destroyed that private property in consequence of such occupation, the Government has always paid for losses sustained, according to the rules relating to civilized warfare. But I must be permitted to assert, that, in our contests with the Indians, no such rule has been adopted or prevailed, because the Indians destroy public and private property alike. The fact that our troops casually occupied a gentleman's mills is not an inducing cause, at least not a sufficient cause to induce the Indians to destroy those mills. In marching from Fort Mimms to those mills which were destroyed, no doubt they destroyed much private property not occupied by our troops.

If this bill prevails, would not all other persons living in that neighborhood, who lost private property by the Indians, have an equal claim? I raise this question before the Senate, whether you will apply the same rule in cases of warfare with the Indians that you do in cases of warfare with civilized nations? If you do, then it is right to pass this bill, and if you will establish this rule, then I know many other cases now pending before the Committee on Claims, which must come forward. I raise that legal point.

Mr. ATCHISON. It seems to me that the reason of the law of 1816-'17 applies to this case. We may have laws which are not founded in reason; but if we have such laws I think every one will admit that they ought not to be followed as precedents. But it is said that this property was destroyed by the enemy. What for? On what principle was the law of 1816 made? It is, that where private property has been taken for the use of the Government for the time being, and the use by the Government of such property, by having troops there, attracts the enemy to that point, whether civilized or savage, and the enemy has destroyed it, then the owner is entitled to compensation for such property. That I understand to be precisely the case here. Fort Mimms was destroyed a day or two before this mill was destroyed. A few troops occupied and fortified this mill, it being on the frontier of that settlement. The occupation of this mill by these troops attracted the Creek Indians to that point, and they destroyed it, and one or two out-houses adjoining. If my recollection is right, the Committee on Indian Affairs only estimated the loss sustained by the destruction of the mill and property immediately in the possession of the troops.

Then again, sir, it is a remarkable fact that there was no other property destroyed in that neighborhood by these Indians. They were attracted to this mill expecting to find it occupied by a small body of troops. These troops, however, having heard of the massacre at Fort Mimms, took time by the forelock, and abandoned this mill a very short time previous to its destruction by the Indians. Whether they acted with bravery or with cowardice is another question—one, about which I will not inquire, although I have my doubts whether they might not have stood their ground, and defended their position, having the notice which they had. That, however, is not the question. It is the principle which is involved; and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] has raised the very question—the principle on which this and all other similar cases must be decided. I can see no objection to the compensation being made which is proposed in this bill. The Indians expected to find this mill in the occupation of our troops. They were disappointed, it is true, for the troops had abandoned the fort a day or two before the Indians arrived. But the Indians knew they had been there, and that they had used it as a fort; and it is for the Senate now to settle the principle.

I cannot myself see any distinction between the mill being destroyed by Indians or by Frenchmen, if we had been at war with France at the time. The mill had been but a day or two previously in the occupation of our troops, and when the Indians came upon it they destroyed it; and no man can deny that it has been the universal custom of the Government to pay compensation to the suffering party in such cases. But, when the same causes brought this band of Creek warriors upon this little fortification, which was taken possession of by the United States troops or the troops of the State, I do not recollect which, and it is a matter of no consequence as to that point—when the same causes brought the Creek Indians to that post which would have brought a civilized enemy to it, I can see no difference, and no reason why the money should not be paid for the property thus destroyed in the one case as well as in the other.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I entertain great doubts whether, under the law of 1816 and 1817, the claimant in this case would be entitled to payment, even if his losses had been inflicted by civilized people instead of by the Creeks. That act made provision for the compensation of those private individuals whose property was destroyed during the last war; but no payments were made under it, except in those cases where the property was actually in the occupation of our troops at the moment of its destruction, or where there were military stores on the premises. Now, according to the statement of this case by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. ARCHISON,] these mills were not in the actual possession of our troops at the time they were destroyed, nor did they contain military stores. If the Senator is correct in making that statement, the owner could not be reimbursed even if the enemy had been Great Britain, and if the mills had been burned by British troops. The Senator says that the Creeks destroyed the mills because they had been occupied by the troops of the United States; not because they found the troops actually in possession, and that the property would not have been destroyed, if it had not been so occupied. How can the Senator prove a fact of that kind? How can any one tell the purposes of the Indians? If they did not destroy private property in the same neighborhood, if it was not their universal practice to destroy private as well as public property, then I would admit that the fact might be proved; but under existing circumstances it cannot be proved; and therefore, I am of opinion, that no payment could be made in accordance with the act of 1816.

I have no personal feeling in this matter; and raised this point for the consideration of the Senate as a question of principle. I desire the decision of the Senate upon it, so that we may know how to act in future.

Mr. PRATT. The chairman of the Committee on Claims has said that this is a very important case, because there are many cases depending upon the decision of the Senate upon this question. In the investigation of this claim, being a member of the Committee on Claims myself, I could never see the distinction which was attempted to be drawn between a civilized and an uncivilized enemy. The principle upon which the act of 1816 was based was, that wherever private property was so occupied by the forces of the United States as to justify an enemy in destroying it, there followed the correlative duty on the part of the Government to pay for the property so destroyed. That the Senator from Pennsylvania admits. In the application of that principle, so far as the Committee on Claims is concerned, they have applied it so as to meet the case of losses by a civilized enemy. I never could see a reason for that distinction. I now ask the attention of the Senate to the question, as I will propound it.

Suppose we were at war with a civilized enemy, Great Britain for example, and our troops should take possession of a house belonging to an individual, and fortify it, and use it as a fort. There is the fortification which our troops had made, and when the enemy approach the house, the troops retreat. Can it be said that this civilized enemy would not be entitled, in such a case, to destroy that fortification? Why, no one would say that. And in all that class of cases, where the enemy has been civilized, the Committee on Claims have uniformly reported in favor of paying for the loss sustained. I cannot see the distinction between the destruction of the property by a savage or a civilized enemy; or on what principle you would be justified in making payment for losses sustained in the one case, and not in the other. Can any one give a sensible reason for such a distinction?

If we had been at war with Great Britain, and our forces had occupied this House or mill, in the manner in which it was occupied, and had retired as the troops did in this case, it is conceded by the Senator from Pennsylvania that our Government would have been bound to pay, because Great Britain would have been entitled to destroy the property; and consequently, as we had given them a legal right to destroy the property on account of its occupation by our troops, we were bound to pay for it. Therefore, if it authorized a civilized enemy to destroy the property, it would authorize a savage enemy to do it. I cannot see, if this property was destroyed solely because it was occupied by our troops, why we are not as much bound to pay as if it had been destroyed by a civilized enemy. It is an important question, and I wish to have it settled with a full understanding of the bearing which the decision is to have upon many other claims, and with a knowledge of all its consequences.

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. President, I do not wish to argue this question, but rise for the purpose of offering an amendment. The words "in the Treasury" have been accidentally omitted after the word "money" in the bill. I move that they be inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLEMENS. This is a bill that, it seems to me, requires no arguments to commend it to the Senate. It requires a mere statement of facts.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] is wholly mistaken when he says that there are no precedents for the payment of this claim. On the contrary, there is no precedent adverse to it. The Senator thinks that it should not be paid; seven different committees of this body, and one committee of the House of Representatives have been of the opinion that it ought to be paid. Where the weight of authority lies, I shall not attempt to decide. Three times has this bill passed the Senate; and if it does not present a fair claim for compensation, I should like to know what case can be presented to Congress that will be entitled to compensation. This property was occupied by our troops at the time the massacre at Fort Mimms occurred; after that event, the Indians marched to attack this property in consequence of its occupation by the troops; and the garrison abandoned it, and sought safety in flight; the Indians then destroyed the mill, but they did not destroy any other private property on the way or in the neighborhood. They were attracted there by the presence of the troops; and went solely for the purpose of destroying the mill, together with those who were in it; and it was, therefore, solely in consequence of that occupation that the place was destroyed, as the troops had just abandoned it before the Indians arrived.

Now, as to these fine-spun distinctions between civilized and savage enemies, I will not occupy time, nor weary the Senate by attempting to show that we are bound to pay in the one case, as much as in the other. The exciting cause of the destruction of this private property, whether by civilized, or savage enemies, was the occupation by the troops of the Government, and the Government is therefore responsible.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall not make any remarks with regard to the bill under consideration, although I agree with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT,] that the principles involved, with regard to the destruction of property by an enemy, in the law of 1816-'17, are very important in themselves; and I fear that they have been unadvisedly departed from. I do not intend to enter into any discussion in reference to this particular bill, but I have a word or two to say in reference to that class of bills to which the Senator from Maryland has referred—namely, those claims which are yet to be reported upon. In the present case, I will state what I believe to be the principle of relief embodied in these laws, and not only in these laws, but in the original cases, in which the Government has made compensation for damage done to property by the enemy during war. The right of civilized nations is drawn from the struggles of civilized nations; and that right is on the part of one nation to destroy any public stores, public buildings, or public armaments of any kind, belonging to the enemy; and the principle follows, that if the Government necessarily impresses upon private property a public character by the mode of its occupation, the party to whom the property belongs, is fully entitled to redress for the destruction of his property, if that destruction results from an act of the Government.

Now, the laws of 1816-'17, in the language of the bill, guarded against what might be an evil arising from these loose notions of what might be sufficient to impress upon private property the character of public property, and therefore they provide, in order to secure compensation for damages, that the occupation of such property, by troops, as barracks, or for military stores, shall be limited to the time of actual occupation. And this was an essential provision. The case is essentially different, however, where the Government takes private property, and turns it into a fortification, as in this case. The principle of the law is, that if you impress upon it the character of public property, the enemy has a right to destroy it; and in regard to the facts in this case, although I think the report would have been better if it had been more specific, I am, notwithstanding, inclined to think that the case is one in which the party is justly entitled to relief. The Government took a certain mill, and turned it into a fortification. The mill remained in that situation till it was destroyed by the Indians, and after that, the party owning the property claims compensation.

Mr. CASS. Will the Senator allow me to inquire whether this was done with the knowledge of the party?

Mr. BAYARD. Whether it was done with the knowledge of the party or not, is immaterial, if Government takes possession of private property and turns it into a fortification, and thus invites its destruction. The party would not be entitled to compensation, unless the Government has impressed upon that private property the character of public property. If, as in this case, the Government takes possession of the property of a citizen and impresses upon it the character of public property, turning it into a fort, and the troops retreat before the enemy comes up, and that property is destroyed by the enemy, the Government is responsible. If a private house is taken, and it is not altered in any way in its form, and then retire from it, its character as private property would remain the same. It is only when it is in the actual occupation by public troops, that the party is entitled to redress. If, however, the Government turn it into a fort, and leave it in that shape, and it is destroyed in that shape, then I say that Government is bound to pay. That was the case in this instance. Government impressed upon the private property the character of public property, and therefore Government is responsible for its acts, which resulted in the destruction of the property.

This is the law as it exists among civilized nations. They destroy private property remaining in the shape of a fortification, whether occupied or unoccupied. If that principle prevails among civilized nations, most certainly you would extend the same principle with regard to granting relief for losses caused by savage warfare.

The reason why Government cannot undertake to remunerate citizens for losses of private property in civilized warfare is most palpable. If it were to be done, you would justify them in the destruction of private property, because they would thus assail your Treasury, which must meet the expense of the remuneration; and it would be the policy to destroy your Treasury as well as your armaments. But when war exists among civilized nations, they have said they would not touch private property. If, however, you adopt the principle of making good the destruction of private property, you invite its destruction, because you give it the character of public property by so doing, and will be responsible for its destruction, and thus exhaust your Treasury. The principle of humanity, which would prevent the destruction of private property where there could be no redress, we should in such a case be exempt from; because we should know that at a later day the party would be relieved from the loss by his Government. I suppose that to be the reason why nations in their laws have always refused to pay for the destruction of private property, unless at the time of the destruction the character of public property was impressed upon it; in which case they are responsible for it.

I believe that is the true principle, the true construction of the laws of nations; and according to the principle of the law of 1816, as this case stands, although the reasoning did not satisfy me, the facts as set forth do satisfy me. Government fortified the property, and thereby impressed upon it the character of public property; and is therefore responsible for its destruction.

The distinction therefore in this case is, that the Government may impress a permanent character on property, and then the actual occupation at the moment of destruction is not necessary to entitle the owner to recover the value. Destruction might take place during the occupation by the military, or it might not. In this case a permanent character was given by the fortification by the Government; and that being the case, I think the claim comes within the principle of the law of 1816, and ought to be allowed.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I understand the facts of the case very differently from the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] I understand that these mills were occupied with the consent of the owner; that they were not fortified; consequently no permanent character was given to them, and when the troops left, they immediately became private property again.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator will allow me to read an extract from the report, I think he will come to a different conclusion. The facts, as I have already stated, are not given as specifically as I could wish, but I will give them as they are stated. The report says:

"In the case under consideration, the petitioner had originally erected his buildings and other improvements under the assurance given in the President's proclamation, that the persons and property of settlers should be protected. Subsequently these buildings were converted into a temporary fort by an officer of the Government, and as such became the point of assault to the Indians immediately after their successful attack on Fort Mimms, and the massacre of its garrison."

I understand the words "converted into a temporary fort," to embrace some act which would effect the change of the character of these buildings into a fort, by the erection of a stockade, or by some other mode—a character which would remain after the troops had retired. The character impressed by the Government on the property still remained.

The bill, as amended, was reported to the Senate, and the amendment having been concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, but in a few moments the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. ATCHISON moved that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to Monday next.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to the proposition to adjourn over to-morrow. I think there is no necessity for it in any respect, or on any ground whatever. I am opposed to adjourning over for a single day, or a single hour, when the time can be profitably employed in the transaction of the business of this nation. For that reason I shall object to the proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BRIGHT.) There can be no discussion upon a motion to adjourn.

Mr. ATCHISON. But this is not a proposition to adjourn in such sense as precludes debate. The rule says that a motion to adjourn shall be decided without debate. This, however, is to decide the time at which the Senate will again meet when it adjourns to-day. It is a different question from a mere question of adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet again on Monday next.

Mr. ATCHISON. I think that question is open to debate; but I do not intend to discuss this matter at all. The Senator from Texas [Mr. Houston] has stated that I have not the same appreciation of the value of time that he has. That assertion may well be true. But, sir, I am quite willing to compare work with that gentleman during the present session. Work, sir, I say work! I am a member of a committee, and I examine evidence, and documents, and make reports, and do all other work which a member of a Senate committee may do, and should do, and which I think it is my duty to do. I take my share of the labor—the work. It is true that I do not occupy much of the time of the Senate in making speeches. No, sir; and I must confess further that I am sometimes very restless under speeches.

Mr. President, to cut this matter short, allow me to say that I do not wish to make any issue of this kind with the Senator from Texas, although he has tendered it. If I am not much mistaken, that Senator, if not during the present session, then during a former one, has gone home and attended to his own private business.

A SENATOR. It was during the present session.

Mr. ATCHISON. My friend near me says it was during the present session. Well, in regard to that I have nothing to say, except that the services of the Senator are valuable here on all occasions. He is a gentleman of experience, and his opinions have great weight. I am willing to award all this to him; I am willing to admit that his labors are far more valuable than mine, and, perhaps, far more valuable than those of many other members of the Senate; I am willing to admit all this; but I do not think that by an adjournment over till Monday any time will be lost that could be devoted in the Senate to the business of the country. On Saturdays, and in the mornings before the meetings of the Senate, is all the time that Senators have to transact office business, or to attend to any private business that may demand their attention. I know that many gentlemen of this Senate have a large correspondence, which they usually bring up on Saturdays, and even on Sundays.

Mr. MASON. Oh, no; not on Sundays!

Mr. ATCHISON. Yes, sir, on Sundays. I have seen some of my friends at work on Sundays; and I do not know but that, if I called upon my friend from Virginia [Mr. Mason] to give evidence of the fact, I might prove it by himself. [Laughter.]

But, sir, I see no necessity for the Senate sitting to-morrow. I am satisfied that there would not be a quorum present. The Senator from California might go on and make his speech, but I am quite willing to give him a chance to make it on Monday, and I am willing to listen to him, too, on that day or any other day. I know that it is delicacy on his part to ask for a meeting of the Senate to-morrow, while I feel that it is courtesy on my part to press this motion. I am willing to give him one day next week—say Monday. To make a speech to empty benches and an empty gallery—

why, sir, the thing is preposterous; not to be thought of. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I am very sorry that my friend from Missouri should have misapprehended my position. I did not say, nor did I intend to say, that the Senator from Missouri did not place the same value on the time of the Senate that I did.

Mr. ATCHISON. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. HOUSTON. I said the gentleman might not do so, but for certain reasons I did appreciate the time of the Senate. At the same time, I intended no reflection upon any one. But it certainly has been the uniform custom during this session, to make this motion every Friday. One gentleman, not now here, has been the habitual mover of that question—I mean no disrespect—that when we adjourn, we adjourn to meet on the following Monday. That has been the case throughout the whole session.

Now, Mr. President, I did go home, and the very identical reason why I did so, was because I had been so long in the Senate, that I had learned to calculate, with considerable precision, as to the time when the Senate might be expected to engage in business in earnest, and how long my services might be dispensed with. And if I had started on my journey home before the Christmas holidays, I might have had it in my power to add another month to the leave I took. Now, we have but little time left, and much business to be done. A portion of the business must be transacted, and if you set any reasonable time for the final adjournment, it will take all the time, being constantly employed, to transact all the business which it is indispensable to have done. I will accord to my friend from Missouri—

Mr. ATCHISON. The apology of the Senator from Texas is quite sufficient. I am perfectly satisfied with it.

Mr. GWIN. I have but a word to say. There is a question of much importance to me and my constituents which should be discussed to-morrow, and I intended to call it up to-morrow. I know perfectly well that it will not be considered of any great importance to the Senate generally. It will be chiefly a law argument. But it is of much importance to me to clear myself from misrepresentations on the subject. I cannot think of occupying a day of next week with a question of this kind, when we shall necessarily be engaged in the transaction of important business. If I cannot get to-morrow, I will not ask for any day next week, but take my chance of being heard at another time.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I hope the Senator from California may be gratified in his wishes, and that the Senator from Missouri will withdraw his proposition. I am sure he is very anxious to have an opportunity to speak to-morrow, as, if he does not, it is quite uncertain when he may have an opportunity of doing so.

Mr. ATCHISON. I will give him a chance on Monday.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn over; and, on a division, there were—ayes 21, noes 15.

So the motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by the hand of Mr. P. B. HAYES, its Chief Clerk, informing the Senate that the House had passed a bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers," and asking the concurrence of the Senate therein.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate take up the river and harbor bill, which has been sent to us from the House of Representatives, in order that it may be referred to a committee.

Mr. MASON. I object.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. MASON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg pardon. I rise to a question of order. Can we go into Executive session when there is a matter before us without disposing of it? That is the question of order which I raise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moved to take up the bill named by him; the Senator from Virginia objected; I then put the question whether the Senate would take up the bill, and as I understood by the sound, the majority were opposed to it, and I announced the vote to be in the negative.

Mr. DAVIS. I understood the Chair to announce that the motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia objected to taking up the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. The Chair will pardon me. I do not think this matter depends upon an objection. It is open to be taken up by a majority of the Senate. If that question was not put, I wish it put.

Mr. MASON. The question to take up the bill which was called for by the Senator from Massachusetts, was decided in the negative.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; that is a mistake.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated that the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts was to take up the bill. To this the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] objected. The Chair then put the question to the Senate, on the motion to take up the bill, and the Chair understood the Senate to decide in the negative.

Mr. DAVIS. There is a mistake about this. I wish the Senate to understand my object. I simply asked that the bill might be taken up, in order that it might be committed. That is the motion which I made; and if the decision of the Senate was in opposition to that motion, I certainly did not comprehend that decision. The whole thing was done in a very hasty manner. I thought the Chair announced that the bill was taken up.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. And so did I.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take the question again if such is the wish of the Senate.

Mr. MASON. Allow me one moment; I wish to state a proposition. This is private bill day; and under that rule which is absolute, no business can be taken up unless a vote of the Senate be first taken on a motion to lay aside the rule by which private bills are to be exclusively considered on Fridays. Such a motion has not been made, and the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is therefore not in order.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I will submit the question in a shape that will perhaps be unobjectionable. I move to suspend the rule in regard to private bills in order to take up this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is in order.

Mr. MASON. I submit that the Chair announced the decision of the Senate in regard to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, which was that the Senate refused to take up the bill. That was the judgment of the Senate, and I then made the motion to go into Executive session.

Mr. RUSK. And that motion was carried.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I hope I may be allowed to say, that we did not hear in this part of the Chamber, either the motion, or the announcement by the Chair, and I hope the question may be stated again. I will take occasion to say, that though the river and harbor bill was lost at the last session by a course of tactics sometimes practiced here, and then employed by my friend near me, that it will not be so lost again. The friends of the bill will be ready for the contest in the expenditure of time and the trial of nerve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to go into Executive session, unless there is a motion to reconsider the vote refusing to take up the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg to state, that if there was an announcement by the Chair, such as the Senator from Virginia understood, I only have to say, that it was not so understood by the gentlemen around me. They understood that the decision was to take up the bill. Now, in consideration of the state of things in the Senate at the time the question was put, I submit to the Chair whether, in fairness, the question should not be put again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put it again with pleasure if such is the wish of the Senate. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I wish to say, that I understood the announcement to be, that the vote was in favor of taking up the bill. I remarked at the time but two voices in the negative, while I am sure there were as many as a dozen in favor of it.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announced that there was a majority in the negative; and that the Senate refused to take up the bill.

Mr. TOUCEY. I would ask if, after that, there was not a motion to go into Executive session, which passed, and which was announced by the Chair as having passed?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts objected before the decision was announced.

Mr. WELLER. What had become of the previous motion, to proceed to the consideration of Executive business, which had been carried? The Presiding Officer had ordered the galleries to be cleared and had abandoned the chair, and the doors were closed; and then again the Presiding Officer took the chair, and, without any motion, the doors were opened.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion was made to reopen the doors, and the doors were reopened.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President—

Mr. DAVIS. Am I entitled to the floor?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I appeal to honorable gentlemen, and I submit to the decision of the Chair; and I take this question as decided that the Senate voted not to take up the bill; but when the Senate considers the circumstances under which the vote was taken I must say that we did not so understand it here, or we should have asked for a division. I ask whether it is not right that some gentleman should ask for a reconsideration of the vote. I cannot claim that right myself.

Mr. RUSK. I will attend to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Davis;] but before I move for a reconsideration of the vote, I will make one or two remarks concerning this matter of internal improvements, and this river and harbor bill. I may observe that it is one on which it is well known that great diversity of opinion exists in various parts of the country. It is well known that it is regarded by many gentlemen of high character for intelligence and undoubted patriotism, as unconstitutional. I must say, further, that since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor, that, with the exception of one time, it has always been forced upon us at the close of a session, when there was no time for the consideration due to a subject of so much importance. There is a sort of system about this to which I object, and against which I solemnly protest. There are many national improvements for which I am willing to vote, and to which I have no constitutional objection; but there is another class to which I have very serious objections, and that is to appropriations of money out of the Treasury to influence the popular opinion in particular Congressional districts.

Mr. President, this is a matter in which the whole country is concerned—East, West, North, and South—and one which furnishes strong temptations for combinations and partial legislation. It is a question in which every part of the country is concerned from one extreme to the other. But, sir, here we are at the end of a session of nine months, when not a word can be said, or a reason assigned, in favor of vast improvements which are national in their character; and we are called upon merely to register the estimates of some head of a bureau who chooses to furnish them.

Some of these improvements I am in favor of; and under the circumstances under which the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts was disposed of, I will move to reconsider the vote, in order that the bill may go to the Committee on Commerce; and I hope they will investigate the whole subject. I know that that portion of the country from which I come needs large improvements, and the country will save by them. These necessary improvements have been passed over without receiving any attention, while hundreds of thousands of dollars have been appropriated for improvements of a purely local character, and of very doubtful general benefit to the country.

Mr. GWIN. While the Senator from Texas is making his suggestion to the Committee on Commerce, I hope they will take into consideration that there is a part of the territory of the United States on the Pacific coast which has never been found out in any river and harbor bill yet. We have about two thousand miles of coast there within the territory of the United States, and it has never been ascertained by any committee in preparing a river and harbor bill. I hope, while taking into consideration the wants of the State of Texas, the committee will look to that coast also when examining the bill.

The motion to reconsider the vote refusing to take the bill up was agreed to.

The question recurred on taking up the bill.

Mr. CLEMENS. I do not know what is in that bill. I am anxious to vote for a reasonable bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors. I do not know what is in that bill, and I want to know. I do not intend that it shall progress further and faster than the Constitution allows. I shall object to its being read more than once to-day. I believe it cannot be read twice on the same day, if it is objected to. I shall ask that the bill be read through.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on suspending the order of business for the purpose of taking up the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will have its first reading.

Mr. CLEMENS. Let the bill be read through.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I move to dispense with the reading of the bill, except by its title, if it is in order.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Any Senator has a right to demand that the bill be read through.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know what the rule is, but I know what the practice is. The practice, when a bill is taken up for commitment, is to read it by the title. I have no earthly objection to its being read throughout. If it is to be read through, it may as well be read now as at any time. But I submit to the Chair whether it is not according to the rule to read a bill which is taken up for the purpose of commitment, by its title?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The usual course is to read a bill by its title a first and second time, with a view to reference.

Mr. ATCHISON. Is it not competent to call for the reading of the bill through? Or cannot the Senate, by unanimous consent, direct that it be read by its title? This bill is about to be read a first time. It has to be read a second time under our rules, before it can be referred. Is not that the case?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATCHISON. And one objection prevents its second reading to-day. Therefore, I see no object to be gained in having the bill read through now. It will be read a first time to-day, and, if objected to, it must go over until Monday, before it can be read a second time; and, after it is read a second time, the motion will be made to refer, or otherwise dispose of it. I ask the Senator from Alabama, then, to withdraw his request to have the bill read through, and let it be read a first time by its title.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule requires that the three readings of a bill shall be on three separate days. Any one Senator objecting, will postpone the second reading of the bill, as a matter of course, to another day.

Mr. CLEMENS. I shall object to its being read more than once to-day. Let it be read by its title.

The bill was then read a first time by its title—"An act making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers."

Mr. DAVIS. I now move that it be read a second time, with a view to reference.

Mr. MASON. I object to that. I understand that it cannot be read a second time on the same day, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS. That is not the point. The bill may be ordered to a second reading. When it has been so ordered, the Senator can object to its second reading to-day, if he sees fit.

Mr. ATCHISON. I am not satisfied that this is parliamentary. I know it is the usage of the Senate. But the bill has been read a first time, and to-morrow the second reading comes up, as a matter of course, unless the Senate make a further order. Why insist, then, on taking a vote as to whether it shall be ordered to a second reading?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in the power of the Senate to order the bill to a second reading.

Mr. SHIELDS. The question is, whether the bill shall be read a second time. If that is agreed to, the question will come up, whether it shall be read a second time now, that is, if it is asked for; but, then, an objection will prevent its being read to-day.

The bill was ordered to be read a second time.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that it may be read a second time now, with a view to its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. CLEMENS objected; consequently, the bill was not read a second time.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

And the Senate adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 30, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE SPEAKER. The business first in order is the motion to reconsider the vote by which the following bill was ordered to be laid on the table, viz: "A bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Oakland and Ottawa Railroad, commencing at the village of Pontiac, in the county of Oakland, and terminating on the navigable waters of Lake Michigan, in the county of Ottawa."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a question of privilege. It will be remembered by the House that a few days ago—I believe upon the 20th instant—I had the honor to address the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the presidential question. In the course of my speech, after reading a letter from the National Intelligencer signed "Americus," I used this language:

"The authorship of this communication was charged upon General Scott by prominent Whigs, who desired to defeat his nomination in 1848. Neither General Scott nor any friend for him has had the hardihood to deny but that its paternity belonged to him. The charge has now been made in the Union, under the very eyes of General Scott. He dare not deny it. I repeat the charge here in the American Congress. Will any gentleman on the Whig side of the House rise in his place and deny the charge? I pause for an answer. None, none dare make the denial. Let this, then, be set down as one of the known incidents in General Scott's public life; and let our Irish and German friends take good heed how they cast their votes for any man holding and avowing such sentiments. Let them read the views of General Scott, and be warned in time. 'Being forewarned let them be forearmed.'"

Mr. STANLY. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know what is before the House?

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio rose, as he stated, to a question of privilege.

Mr. STANLY. What is that question of privilege?

Mr. OLDS. I am now stating it as fast as I can.

Mr. STANLY. The gentleman is reading from a newspaper. Is that a question of privilege?

Mr. OLDS. It is a question of veracity between myself and my colleague, [Mr. BELL.]

Mr. STANLY. The gentleman can reply to his colleague in some other way. That is not a question of privilege. I object to it; I always have objected to it.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair has been unable to perceive that there is any question of privilege involved in what the gentleman from Ohio has thus far stated.

Mr. OLDS. I state that the question of privilege is a question of veracity between my colleague [Mr. BELL] and myself.

Mr. STANLY. That is no question of privilege.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair does not think there is any question of privilege involved in that.

Mr. OLDS. I hope gentlemen upon the other side of the House will not object to my proceeding.

Mr. STANLY. I object.

BELLEVUE LAND BILL.

Mr. CLARK. I repeat the request which I made to the House yesterday morning, to take up Senate bill No. 316, ceding certain land to the town of Bellevue, in Iowa, for the purpose of putting it upon its passage. I can state the object of the bill in less than thirty seconds. The Government holds certain reserved lands in Iowa, next to the Mississippi river—

Mr. HAMILTON. Is this to come out of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa propose to take up the bill before proceeding to the consideration of the business in the morning hour?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

Mr. CLARK. I do not believe there can be any objection to taking up that bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection was made by three or four gentlemen; and, amongst others, by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. CLARK. No one objected but the gentleman from Tennessee, and I do not think he will insist on his objection.

The SPEAKER. It is impossible for the Chair to anticipate what gentlemen will do. Several gentlemen objected, and the Chair so announced. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. JONES. No, sir.

OAKLAND AND OTTAWA RAILROAD.

The question recurred on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Michigan railroad bill was laid on the table.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. CLEVELAND. That motion was made by me yesterday.

The SPEAKER. That motion was proposed to be made, and the Chair decided that it could not be made at that time.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Well, I wished to renew the motion at the proper time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It was upon my motion that this bill was laid upon the table, but I understand that the gentleman from Arkansas—

[Loud cries of "Order!" and "Object!"]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If the motion to reconsider prevails, I want to withdraw the omnibus.

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

Mr. STUART demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, if we reconsider this vote, the gentleman from Arkansas will have a right to withdraw his amendment, even if there is objection to its withdrawal?

[Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. ALLISON. I can inform the gentleman from Indiana that its withdrawal will be objected to.

The SPEAKER. The right of the gentleman from Arkansas to withdraw his amendment before action has been had upon it, is very clear.

Mr. JOHNSON. And no action has been had upon it.

Mr. STUART. I want to call the attention of the Chair to the rule upon that subject. It is perfectly clear.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that the right of the gentleman from Arkansas to withdraw his amendment is very clear.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. Does the Chair decide that the gentleman from Michigan had a right to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was laid on the table, after it had once been reconsidered, and when the bill had not been altered in the least?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee raises a question of order in reference to the motion to reconsider. Some days since, the House reconsidered the vote by which this very bill was laid upon the table. Yesterday the bill was again laid upon the table, and a motion is now made to reconsider again. If it had been upon the passage of the bill, it is very clear that a second reconsideration could not take place; but the laying of a bill upon the table is not decisive, under our rules—at all events it is not contemplated by the rules as a vote decisive of the fate of the bill, whatever the practice may have been. It is often a question of time merely—to lay on the table now and refuse it then. The Chair thinks that from its nature, it may be reconsidered as often as the House chooses, being a question only in regard to the time of laying the bill upon the table. The Chair is not sure that this decision is a correct one under the parliamentary law, but he thinks it is. The vote to lay on the table yesterday, and the vote to lay on the table today, are distinct votes, controlled perhaps by time alone. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. VENABLE. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. MILLSON. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. VENABLE's motion, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 104.

So a call of the House was refused.

The question recurring upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, it was taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Babcock, Bartlett, Beale, Bennett, Bockert, John H. Boyd, Breckinridge, Burrows, Busby, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Caskie, Chapman, Chastain, Cleveland, Curtis, Daniel, Geo. T. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Dockery, Duncan, Edmundson, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gentry, Giddings, Goodenow, Grey, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hascall, Hebard, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holaday, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Lotcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLachlan, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Millson, Miner, Morehead, Murphy, Murray, Newton, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Perkins, Price, Riddle, Robie, Ross, Savage, Schermerhorn, Schoonmaker, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Stone, Stratton, Sutherland, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Watkins, and Wildrick—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Willis Allen, Barrere, Bowie, Bragg, Branton, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, E. Carrington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Disney, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Ficklin, Florence, Freeman, Green, Harper, Sampson W. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Howard, Thomas Y. How, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Landry, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Miller, Molony, John Moore, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Penn, Pennington, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Richardson, Robinson, Sackett, Scholcraft, Seury, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Thurston, Towsuhen, Walsh, Ward, Welch, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—73.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Pending the call of the roll on the above vote, the following gentlemen stated that they had paired off:

Mr. ASHE with Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana; and Mr. HART with Mr. McCORKLE.

STEAMBOAT RACING.

Mr. SACKETT asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill making it a capital offense for the officers and men, employed upon any steamboat running on any of the waters of the United States, and on which passengers are carried for hire, to be in any way engaged in running any such boat, on which they may be so employed, in any race, trial of speed, or contest for rapidity of passage with any other steamboat or vessel.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, objected.

Mr. KING, of New York. That subject is already before the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER stated that reports were in order from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

POST OFFICE LAWS.

Mr. OLDS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a joint resolution "modifying the existing laws for the government of the Post Office Department in relation to California and Oregon;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN DEARMIT.

Mr. CLARK, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of John Dearmit; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. C. I desire to know whether it is necessary that that bill should go to a Committee of the Whole House?

Several Voices. "Read the bill!"

The bill was then read through.

Mr. CLARK. Is it necessary that this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole House? It provides that the sum therein mentioned shall be paid out of any money in the Post Office Department not otherwise expended.

The SPEAKER. The principle which has hitherto controlled the action of the House upon this point is simply this: If by the passage of the bill under consideration, money will actually be paid out of the Treasury, without an appropriation, it must go to the Committee of the Whole. A precisely similar case was before the House the other day, and the Chair so decided.

Mr. CLARK. I move, then, that it take the usual course—that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, and that the bill and report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GREY, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of J. C. Buckles, of McStee & Eastman, and of the legal representatives of Nathaniel Patten, deceased, made reports thereon, accompanied by the following bills, viz:

A bill for the benefit of J. C. Buckles, of Louisville, Kentucky;

A bill for the relief of McStee and Eastman; and

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Nathaniel Patten, deceased, late a Representative of Missouri.

Which bills were severally read a first and second time, committed to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and the bills and the reports ordered to be printed.

Mr. GREY, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Washington Castleton, of Hawesville, Kentucky, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill for his benefit; which bill was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. GREY. I ask that the bill be read through with the view of having it put upon its passage.

The bill was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. GREY. I presume that this bill could be acted upon without reference to a Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule of the House, the bill, containing as it does an appropriation, must be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, unless by unanimous consent the House allows it to be put upon its passage.

Mr. GREY. The bill provides that $110 31 shall be paid to the Postmaster at Hawesville, Kentucky, for money paid twice by him through mistake. I hope there will be no objection to its being now put upon its passage. I ask that the report be read.

The report was then read by the Clerk.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire if this bill provides for the payment of a sum of money which the postmaster alleges to have inclosed in a letter, but which was lost?

Mr. GREY. I will answer in relation to this matter, that I believe every member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads agreed in the justice of this claim, and agreed to recommend the passage of the bill. The facts connected with the case were these: It is the custom of the Postmaster General to authorize drafts to be remitted from the postmasters in the small towns in the interior of the country, for the amount they receive in those offices. These drafts are drawn in favor of a postmaster in some of the large towns in the neighborhood, who, in that respect, act as the agent of the Department. Hawesville is upon the Ohio river, about one hundred miles below Louisville. The Postmaster General drew a draft upon the postmaster at that place in favor of the postmaster at Louisville. The postmaster at Louisville wrote to the postmaster at Hawesville, and drew upon him for $110 13, which was the amount of money in the hands of the postmaster at that place. The postmaster at Hawesville immediately took the money, and got it exchanged for two fifty dollar notes, and one ten dollar note, making $110, which was the amount of the draft sent by the Postmaster General, put the money into a letter, and mailed it to the postmaster at Louisville. He proves that the money was put into a letter which he wrote to the postmaster at Louisville. He proves that the letter was mailed and placed in the mail bags under the care of the agent of the Postmaster General. That mail bag was broken open, and the money taken from it. Then, sir, the proof is positively made out that there was no neglect of duty upon the part of the postmaster at Hawesville.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. When was this? Mr. GREY. It was the 10th or 11th of February, 1850. He applied to the Auditor to allow him credit for this $110, but he said that he had no authority to do so. He proves by the postmaster at Louisville that the mail which arrived at that time at Louisville was broken open, and letters extracted, from Hawesville. There were six or eight letters sent in that mail from Hawesville, but one or two of which were received. The postmaster at Louisville said the mail had evidently been robbed, but the boat had gone to Cincinnati, and he would wait till it came back, and see whether the letters could not be recovered; but nothing was heard from them. He then applied to the General Post Office, to have the money allowed him; but the Auditor decided that the laws regulating the Post Office Department prohibited him from doing so, and recommended him to petition to Congress for relief, with the expression of opinion that there would be no difficulty if he could show that there was no neglect on his part. Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired. Mr. SEYMOUR. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. GREY. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion, and allow me to get through with this small bill. I will say that this postmaster at Hawesville is an old man, and that his whole support was derived from his compensation as postmaster of this town. The office paid him about $105 per annum. That was the whole amount paid him by the office, and he was unable to pay the debt. His sureties were obliged to pay it, and did pay it, and now come, upon the recommendation of the Post Office Department, to Congress for relief. Now, sir, this man acted in good faith. The laws of the Post Office Department were complied with strictly, and the money was paid over. He acted honestly from beginning to end; and he sustains as honest a character as any man in the country. I ask that the bill may be put upon its passage.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to know if the morning hour has not expired?

The SPEAKER. It has. Mr. PHELPS. I am opposed to this bill altogether. I move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. COBB. I hope not, unless the motion is first made to recommit this bill.

Mr. GREY. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] was upon the floor when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] arrested him, and moved to go to the business upon the Speaker's table. The gentleman from Kentucky then asked to make the motion that the bill be re-committed to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Now, by a strict adherence to the rules, the gentleman from Kentucky could not make the motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope this bill will be disposed of now by laying it upon the table. I believe it is a bill that ought not to pass.

Mr. GREY. I thought the motion was made to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be made under the rules of the House, unless by the consent of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS.]

Mr. GREY. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will allow me to make that motion.

Mr. PHELPS. I should be very happy to accommodate my friend from Kentucky; but I believe the principle contained in the bill now under consideration is wrong. I believe the Government of the United States should not be held responsible for valuables which are transmitted through the mail. I must therefore decline to withdraw the motion.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I move to take up the river and harbor bill, which was reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on yesterday.

Mr. GREY. I again appeal to the gentleman from Missouri to extend to me the courtesy to allow me to enter a motion that this bill be committed, so that it may come up again on another day.

Mr. PHELPS. Well, I will extend to the gentleman that courtesy. I withdraw the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. GREY. I now move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KING, of New York. I think the bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The motion has been made and entered upon the Journal to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PHELPS. I move to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Is it not in order now to call up the unfinished business of yesterday?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, that motion is not in order until the motion made by the gentleman from Missouri to go to the business upon the Speaker's table is disposed of.

The question was then taken; and the House refused to go to the business on the Speaker's table—yeas 32, noes not counted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does not the bill of the gentleman from Kentucky, just before the House, now come up again?

The SPEAKER. It does, in the opinion of the Chair, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STUART. I submit that it is in order to call up and proceed with the unfinished business of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor. It is, however, in order to arrest debate and move to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, and call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. STUART. I make that motion.

REPORT ON PRINTING.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I ask if the report of the Committee on Printing does not now come up first in order?

The SPEAKER. It does, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. STANTON. Then I ask that it may be taken up.

Mr. JONES. How does the gentleman get the floor from the gentleman from Kentucky? [Mr. GREY.] The bill has not been re-committed, but is still before the House. The gentleman, [Mr. GREY,] while occupying the floor, was arrested in his remarks, under the rule of the House which authorizes any gentleman to take the floor from him, after one hour spent in the morning business, to move to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table. As I understand it, that is the only motion that can be made, which will take the floor from him, and that being voted down, he is still upon the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] will remember, that the rule provides expressly that the floor may be taken to move to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, or to the orders of the day. That is the language of the rule. If it is in order to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, it is in order to go to the orders of the day. The Chair therefore rules that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] is in order.

Mr. MILLSON. This being Friday, and the morning hour having expired, is not the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, in order?

The SPEAKER. That is also true, this being private bill day.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut. The honor and good faith of the nation require that we should go to the private business.

Mr. MILLSON. Is not this objection day?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This is the fifth Friday of the month, and objection days are the first and fourth Fridays.

The SPEAKER. It is not objection day.

The question was then taken on the motion submitted by Mr. SEYMOUR, and it was not agreed to.

So the House refused to go into committee upon the Private Calendar.

The question recurring upon the motion to proceed to the consideration of thereport of the Committee on Printing—

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, said: Permit me to remark, before the question is taken, that there is a general anxiety to take up and dispose of this river and harbor bill. My object in calling up the report of the Committee on Printing was simply that it might be postponed until the disposition of that bill. I have no desire to press it now.

Mr. STUART. It is unnecessary for the gentleman to make such a motion to postpone, as the business remains before the House.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the consideration of that report be postponed until the vote be taken upon the river and harbor bill.

Mr. STUART. Say until to-morrow.

Mr. STANTON. Well, I will say until to-morrow.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. STANTON; and it was agreed to.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I now move that the House proceed with the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has some doubts whether the gentleman has the right to take the floor from the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GREY,] to make that motion. He is, however, inclined to think he has the right.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. SEYMOUR; and it was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STANLY. Is it in order to move that there be a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. STANLY. I make that motion, then.

The question was taken on the motion; and it was not agreed to.

The previous question then received a second. The question then being, "Shall the main question be ordered to be put?"

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the Chair a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can by the consent of the House.

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!"]

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 98, nays 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abner Crombie, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Babcock, Bartlett, Beale, Bennett, John H. Boyd, Briggs, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Geo. H. Brown, Burrows, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chastain, Clark, Cleveland, Conger, Curtis, Dawson, Dean, Dismick, Doty, Duncan, Durkee, Eastman, Edger-ton, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Giddings, Green, Hart, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Henn, Hillyer, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Ingersoll, Jackson, James Johnson, Preston King, Kurtz, Lindsay, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Martin, McLanahan, McMullen, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Minner, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Orr, Penn, Perkins, Price, Riddle, Robie, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Skelton, Smith, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham S. Stephens, St. Martin, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Thurston, Townsend, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Walsh, Alexander White, and Wildrick—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Barrere, Bell, Bissell, Booneck, Bowie, Breckinridge, Brenton, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Chapin, Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Caskey, Chapman, Churchill, Clingman, Cobb, Culom, Daniel, Geo. T. Davis, Disney, Dockery, Dunham, Edmundson, Evans, Ewing, Ficklin, Floyd, Fowler, Gentry, Goodenow, Goodrich, Grey, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Hendricks, Hibbard, Holladay, Houston, Howard, Thomas M. Howe, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Kuhns, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Miller, Millson, Molony, Morehead, Murphy, Olds, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Pennington, Phelps, Porter, Rantoul, Richardson, Robinson, Ross, Smart, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Stone, Strother, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Addison White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodward, and Yates—78.

So the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. ORR moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be put, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon recommitting the bill to the Committee on Commerce; and being put, it was not agreed to.

The question next recurred upon agreeing to the amendments made by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the bill.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Is it now in order to move to commit this bill to the Committee on Roads and Canals, with instructions?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question having been called, it cuts off all motions to amend or postpone.

The first amendment made by the committee was then reported to the House, as follows:

"Insert after the word 'Albany' the words 'and not above Troy,' in the following clause:

"For continuing the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river, above and below Albany, $50,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

"For the improvement of the James and Appomattox rivers, below the cities of Richmond and Petersburg, $15,900."

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Upon agreeing to that amendment, I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 105; nays 62—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, William Appleton, Ashe, Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Beale, Bell, Bennett, Bocoock, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Breckinridge, Brenton, Briggs, George H. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Caskie, Chandler, Chastain, Clingman, Curtis, George T. Davis, Dean, Dockery, Durkee, Edmundson, Evans, Ewing, Florence, Fowler, Freeman, Gentry, Goodenow, Goodrich, Green, Harper, Iham G. Harris, Haws, Haven, Hebard, Horsford, Howard, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McMullin, McNair, Meade, Miller, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Orr, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Peim, Perkins, Porter, Price, Rantoul, Riddle, Robie, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Smart, Stanly, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Stratton, Strother, Thurston, Venable, Walbridge, Walsh, Watkins, Welch, Addison White, Wildrick, Williams, and Yates—105.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Barrere, Bragg, Bushy, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Churchill, Cleveland, Cobb, Cullom, Daniel, Dawson, Dimmick, Disney, Doty, Duncan, Dunham, Edgerton, Ficklin, Fitch, Floyd, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Giddings, Gilmore, Grey, Hamilton, Hart, Hebard, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hillyer, Houston, John W. Howe, James Johnson, George W. Jones, Kurtz, Mace, Mason, McLanahan, Millson, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Penniman, Phelps, Richardson, Robinson, Ross, Sackett, Schoonmaker, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Stuart, Townshend, Tuck, Wallace, Alexander White, and Wilcox—62.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the clause—

"For the survey of the harbor at the mouth of Trinity river, Texas, $3,000," and insert the following:

"For the survey of Trinity river, Texas, including the bar at the mouth, $3,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of the bill, section two, as follows:

"And he it further enacted, That the Commissioners of the land of Wilmington, North Carolina, be authorized to levy and collect a tonnage duty, not exceeding four cents per ton, upon all vessels of not less than sixty tons, for the purpose of cleaning out the obstructions at the mouth of the Cape Fear river, and that to effect that purpose the said Commissioners be authorized to pledge the receipts from the said tonnage duty, to pay the interest or principal of any loan they may effect for that purpose: Provided, That the Legislature of North Carolina, at the next session, order and authorize such tonnage duty."

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bocoock, Bowie, Bragg, Breckinridge, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Bushy, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Caskie, Chastain, Cleveland, Clingman, Daniel, Dimmick, Disney, Dockery, Doty, Dunham, Edmundson, Ficklin, Floyd, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Green, Hamilton, Iham G. Seymour, Smith, Stanly, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Stone, Strother, Tuck, Venable, Wallace, Watkins, Alex. White, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Williams—90.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, John Appleton, William

Appleton, Babcock, Barrere, Bell, Bennett, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Burrows, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Cobb, Cullom, George T. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Duncan, Eastman, Edgerton, Evans, Ewing, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Giddings, Gilmore, Goodenow, Goodrich, Grey, Harper, Haws, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ingersoll, George G. King, Preston King, Kurtz, Landry, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Miller, Miner, Molony, John Moore, Murray, Newton, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoonmaker, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Smart, Benjamin Stanton, St. Martin, Stratton, Thurston, Townshend, Walbridge, Welch, and Addison White—76.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I move to lay the bill and the amendments upon the table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion, until I can move to reconsider the last vote, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will do so.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I make that motion, then. The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. I now renew my motion.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 104; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bocoock, Breckinridge, Albert G. Brown, Bushy, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Caskie, Chastain, Churchill, Clingman, Cobb, Cullom, Daniel, Dimmick, Disney, Dunham, Edmundson, Ewing, Ficklin, Freeman, Gamble, Gentry, Gilmore, Grey, Hamilton, Iham G. NAYS—Messrs. Allison, William Appleton, Babcock, Barrere, Bartlett, Bell, Bennett, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, George H. Brown, Burrows, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark, Conger, Curtis, George T. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Evans, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Green, Harper, Haws, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Henn, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ives, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Landry, Lockhart, Mann, Martin, Miller, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Murray, Newton, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Penniman, Perkins, Porter, Price, Rantoul, Richardson, Riddle, Robie, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, St. Martin, Stratton, Strother, Stuart, Sutherland, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Welch, and Yates—104.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Pending the call of the yeas and nays—

Mr. HENDRICKS said: I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is anxious to vote upon this bill, but he is sick and unable to be in the Hall.

Mr. BISSELL. To accommodate a gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ROBBINS,] I have paired off with him, otherwise I should vote, aye.

Mr. POLK. I have paired off with Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, who is in favor of the bill. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote to lay upon the table.

Mr. NABERS. I have paired off with General TAYLOR, of Ohio, who was in favor of the bill. I am opposed to it in its present form.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. VENABLE. Is the bill engrossed?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. STUART moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The bill was read the third time.

The question now being, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, called for the previous question; which received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. SMART demanded the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, William Appleton, Babcock, Barrere, Bartlett, Bell, Bennett, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Briggs, George H. Brown, Burrows, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark, Curtis, G. T. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Evans, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Green, Harper, Haws, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Henn, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ives, John Johnson, Robert W. NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bocoock, Bragg, Breckinridge, Albert G. Brown, Bushy, E. C. Seymour, Smart, Smith, Richard H. Stanton, Stone, Sutherland, Venable, Wallace, Ward, Watkins, Alexander White, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Williams—75.

So the bill was passed.

Pending the call of the yeas and nays,

Mr. BISSELL said: I have paired off with Mr. ROBBINS, otherwise I should vote against the bill.

Mr. POLK. I have paired off with Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, who is in favor of the bill. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote against the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. While there are many provisions of this bill which I could very readily support, there are some others for which I cannot vote. Being now called upon to take the bill in the lump, I feel constrained to vote in the negative. I vote, no.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House upon the Private Calendar.

The question was taken on the latter motion, and it was agreed to—there being, upon a division, ayes 89, noes 48.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House upon the Private Calendar, (Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut in the chair.)

LIEUTENANT BARTLETT HINDS.

The CHAIRMAN. The business first in order is the consideration of House bill No. 149, entitled "A bill for the relief of the heirs of Lieutenant Bartlett Hinds." When the committee rose, the pending question was a motion that the bill be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That case, it will be recollected by the committee, was up sometime ago. I made the inquiry of the Third Auditor, whether there was any evidence upon the records of that Department, that Bartlett Hinds ever was entitled to commutation, or that he had ever served in a capacity that would entitle him to it. There was no such evidence there, and the presumption is, he is not entitled to it at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I notice that my colleague [Mr. FULLER] who reported the bill, is absent, and if there be nobody else here to defend it, I will ask that it be passed by.

Whereupon, by unanimous consent, the bill was informally passed over.

PAYMENT OF FLORIDA VOLUNTEERS.

The next bill that came up for consideration was House bill No. 161, entitled "A bill to provide for the payment of the companies of Captains Bush, Price, and Suarey, for military services in Florida."

By unanimous consent—Mr. WILCOX, who reported the bill, being absent—the bill was informally passed over.

DAVID MYERLE.

The bill for the relief of David Myerle next came up in order for consideration.

The bill provides for the payment to David Myerle of $30,000 for losses incurred whilst experimenting in American water-rotted hemp, under the direction of the War Department.

The reading of the report was called for.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I would suggest to the committee, as that report is very long, and perhaps would take nearly an hour to read it, that some member of the Committee on Naval Affairs would make a summary statement of the contents of the report.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let the report be read. This is an important claim, and one which ought never to be paid.

Mr. FLORENCE. Justice requires that the claim should be paid.

Mr. DANIEL. Justice requires that the claim should be rejected.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the report.

Mr. SACKETT. I move that the reading of the report be dispensed with.

Mr. JONES. To test whether there is a quorum present competent to transact business, I move that the committee rise, and upon that motion, demand a division of the committee.

The question was then put upon a division, and there were—ayes 16, noes 44; no quorum.

[Cries of "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!"]

The roll was then called, in compliance with the rules of the House, the absentees were noted and reported to the House. It being ascertained that a quorum was present, the committee again resumed its session.

Mr. DANIEL. Has the sense of the committee been taken on the proposition to dispense with the further reading of the report?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. STUART. The question now is on a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw the motion that the committee rise, as there is a quorum present.

Mr. DANIEL. I had occasion, some Congresses ago, to examine into this case, and I think I have not forgotten its main features. I think I remember all the material facts involved.

Mr. BOCOCK. Has the question been yet taken upon the motion to dispense with the further reading of the report?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. DANIEL. I think I have the floor.

Mr. BOCOCK. If that is the pending motion, you have not.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to dispense with the further reading of the report was submitted.

The question was then taken, and the further reading of the report was dispensed with.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I offer the following amendment to the bill:

Provided, That the funds hereby appropriated shall not be paid over until John Cornwall and F. Montmollin, of Kentucky, have an opportunity to contest their right to reimbursement of funds advanced by them to said Myerle: Provided further, That they shall institute suit for that purpose within ninety days from the passage of this act.

Mr. Chairman, I suppose that the gentleman who reported this bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs is prepared to make an argument to prove that the appropriation ought to be passed. I have nothing to say upon that subject at the present time. I have read the report carefully, and am satisfied that the Government of the United States induced Mr. Myerle to engage in experiments for the purpose of ascertaining whether American water-rotted hemp could not be obtained of proper quality and in sufficient quantities for the use of the Navy. When Mr. Myerle was about to make those experiments, under the encouragement and by the authority of the Government, he went out to the State of Kentucky, and being a man without means of himself, he obtained the funds to purchase the hemp, to hire the hands, and to go through all of his operations, from two gentlemen, who at that time lived in the district I now represent. One of them still lives there, and the other resides in the district represented by my colleague, [Mr. MARSHALL.] They furnished the money—they were the capitalists. It was by their aid that the experiments were made, whatever they may have been. Mr. Myerle gave them a lien upon the hemp to reimburse them for those advancements. I am giving the facts as I understand them, and there will probably be no dispute about them. He gave a lien upon the hemp. Afterwards some difficulty occurred between Mr. Myerle and the Government, and the hemp thus mortgaged, or a greater portion of it, by Myerle to them was taken off and sold, and they were left minus almost the whole amount of the money advanced to him. A very small portion they recovered.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. How much did they advance?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I cannot state from memory the exact sum; but they advanced him a sum sufficient to absorb almost the whole amount of the appropriation recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DANIEL. Was this indebtedness incurred in the purchase of the hemp, or simply making the experiment?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. In both.

Mr. DANIEL. Just as I supposed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. This is my information, at least. I have now in my desk a letter from Mr. Myerle to one of these gentlemen, recognizing his obligations to him. Therefore the report is incorrect when it says Mr. Myerle incurred all the expenditures. The gentlemen named in my amendment are the proper beneficiaries under this bill. Mr. Myerle is now insolvent. I understand that he was worth little or nothing at the time he commenced these experiments under the authority of the Government, and the only persons who have really suffered any great loss are the constituents of my colleague and myself. The amendment I have offered does not propose that this committee or the House shall decide the question between Mr. Myerle and them, but that the money shall be retained for ninety days in the Treasury of the United States, to enable them to commence suit in the appropriate court, to contest the question between themselves and Mr. Myerle, as to the proper direction of the whole or a part of the sum. That is equitable and right. If they cannot establish their rights they must go out of court. If they can, they ought to have the money.

Mr. CONGER. As I understand the amendment, it provides that the money shall remain in the Treasury for ninety days after the passage of the act for the purpose of having the rights of the parties determined. I suggest that the amendment does not reach far enough, because as the process of law could not reach the money in the Treasury of the United States, it would be necessary that the amendment should provide that the money be retained in the Treasury until the question could be decided by the courts, and that it be paid over in accordance with that decision.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The money is to be retained in the Treasury, provided suit shall be commenced within ninety days. The object of the proviso is to prevent delays injurious to Myerle. It provides that the money shall be retained in the Treasury and paid over according to the decision of the court; but there is a second proviso that these gentlemen shall bring suit within ninety days, the object of which is to protect Myerle.

Mr. BOCOCK obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether the parties to whom he has referred as having a claim upon this fund, should it be given to Myerle, did not have the hemp he rotted in their possession, and whether they did not take it to New Orleans and put it away for three years, to the detriment of Myerle and themselves? I will ask, further, whether they did not come before the House, and ask that they should have a claim upon that fund? I would request an answer to these questions.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I answer, generally, no. The gentleman is mistaken in part. It would be perfectly idle for the gentleman and myself to enter into an argument before the committee, involving all the facts and details of the case. My amendment provides that these facts and details shall be settled by a court of justice. The committee will see in a moment that that is the proper tribunal to adjudicate the matter.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to understand the case at the outset, and will, therefore, make one inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky. Do I understand that the person whose name is mentioned here, Myerle, was the agent of the Government in making that contract with the other gentlemen?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Not at all.

Mr. BOCOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that it was a private transaction, as between Mr. Myerle and the gentlemen named in the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. As a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, it became my duty to report this bill to the House, and I feel able at any time, when it shall be proper, to state at length to the committee the facts and arguments upon which my report rests. I feel, without arrogating anything to myself, that when the time arrives, I can prove to every fair-minded member of this committee—to every man whose mind is open to the consideration of reason, facts and arguments, notwithstanding the objections of the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Tennessee—that it is right. It might seem to be proper for me, in this stage of the proceedings, to state some of the facts upon which this claim rests; but I rise at the present time more for the purpose of noticing the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky than for any other. I shall raise the question of order upon it. With some little doubt upon my own mind whether this amendment is in order or not, I incline to believe it is not, and I shall ask the decision of the Chair on that point before I take my seat. I view that matter in this light: Mr. Myerle comes before Congress and represents he has a claim against the Government of the United States. The matter goes to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The committee considers it, and reports to the House that he has a just and well-founded claim; but here comes in a gentleman representing third parties, and says to this committee, "You ought not to pay this money to Myerle at this time, because, forsooth, there are private claims between him and these other persons, who are my constituents." The Government ought not to withhold justice, already long delayed, until they have an opportunity to test the validity of their claims against him. What has this Government to do with Myerle's transactions with other persons? Those other persons are not known in the contract with the Government. There is no privity between the Government and them. And if it were otherwise, is this amendment in order in another point of view? It provides that this money, though found to be due, shall not be paid to Myerle until these gentlemen shall have time to test their claims against him. How long is that? They say that they will begin their action in ninety days.

But who knows with what diligence they will prosecute that suit? Suppose they employ a dilatory lawyer, who will delay it term after term, and year after year, who knows then when the matter will be determined? The time, then, during which the payment of this money is to be suspended, is, in fact, if the amendment prevail, indefinite. Is it in order to introduce an amendment to that effect?

Mr. HUNTER. I submit that the gentleman should allow the Chair to decide the point of order.

Mr. BOCOCK. I have but a word more to say. This claim has been pending before Congress for the last five or six years, or more. It has passed this House, and only failed to become a law because the Senate did not have time to act on it. Why did not these gentlemen test their rights with Myerle during that time? Why did they lie still, do nothing, and say nothing, until Myerle was almost worn out, having lost his health and strength, and almost his life in this matter? They wait all this time, doing nothing, and now come and ask that the Government will withhold its arduous justice yet a little longer, until they have time to do what they might have done long ago. I wish to add a word more upon a point from which I was diverted by some interruption. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] says that his constituents are connected immediately with this contract, because they obtained a mortgage upon Myerle's hemp. When he comes to the proof, he will scarcely be able to show the existence of any such mortgage. It is unreasonable to suppose that it was made.

This is a contract on the part of David Myerle to furnish hemp to the United States Government, and these men knew that he had agreed to deliver it to the Government. Would they have agreed, under such circumstances, to take a mortgage upon it to secure a debt to them? I think the supposition altogether unreasonable. The proof will test the fact. It is needless, however, to go into these considerations now. I ask first the judgment of the Chair upon the question of order raised by me. I hold, as already stated, that the amendment is out of order, because it introduces here third parties, not known to the Government, who allege that they have claims of a private nature against Mr. Myerle, which this Government ought not to undertake to settle, but let these men stand on the same footing with other creditors of Myerle, and test their rights in a court of justice. It further proposes the postponement of this claim to some indefinite period, though it may be found to be just. Let the Chair decide.

Mr. CLEVELAND. It seems to me that this question of order is of some importance. I wish to say, that so far from the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] being improper, in my judgment, it is clearly right and proper. We are sitting here as a court of equity. This is an application to our sense of justice and right. These gentlemen come forward and ask that we shall give a large sum of money, for losses sustained in making this experiment for the benefit of the Government. If there is an appropriation to be made, another gentleman comes forward and says that I am the man who really has furnished the means for making this experiment, and I am the man who is in interest here; and therefore, if the Government is to pay at all, it should pay the man who has lost his money. Is not that perfectly proper and right? Would not a court of equity allow such an application under any circumstances? This application is founded upon the ground that this man was induced to invest his money in the purchase of hemp for the purpose of trying an experiment which it was supposed would prove beneficial to the Government. He says that he invested his money in this experiment at the suggestion of the Government. In consequence of the invitation and encouragement on the part of the Secretary of the Navy to make this experiment, he lost a large amount of money.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] says, that in point of fact the man who furnished the money and lost it, was another person, a third party; and, therefore, he asks this House, sitting as a court of equity, if they grant the money asked for by the petitioner, to place it in a condition where the question can be settled, whether it was his money which was lost, or that of this speculator. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOCKOCK] gets up and says that he can satisfy the House that Myerle is entitled to the relief he asks for; and he intimates if we do not take his opinion, that we are not fair-minded men.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I do not expect to get the gentlemen's vote.

Mr. CLEVELAND. The gentleman cannot get that of a majority of the House. The gentleman's assurance certainly will not help his case, for I believe this House will act upon the evidence adduced, and not upon the opinion of any man.

Mr. HUNTER. Is this question debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. HUNTER. Is there not a question of order pending?

Mr. BOCKOCK. I did raise a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that this amendment is germane. Whether it is proper or not is a question for the committee to decide.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I wish to say in regard to this matter, that when I rose I had intended to speak to the question of order merely, and I had the unanimous consent of the committee to discuss this matter, and show why this money should not be taken by some claim agent who might come in here, for the petitioner, and claim that he had lost this money, when, in point of fact, it was another's loss. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is in accordance with my views. I only wish to say a word to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCKOCK], who has reported this bill.

Mr. SMART. I will ask the gentleman to give way for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I am nearly through. I shall listen with attention to what the gentleman who has reported this bill will say; and until he says more than he has said, or anybody else has said, in favor of this claim, I think that the committee will hesitate, as I shall, long before they will advise the House to grant it.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. If I am wrong in the statements which I am about to make, I trust that gentlemen will correct me who have taken part in this discussion. I understand that this man Myerle, who was a hemp-grower himself, entered into a contract with the United States to furnish hemp; that he received assistance from two gentlemen in Kentucky, and how many more I do not know; that the credit of these two gentlemen was given to Myerle, and that they looked to his solvency entirely for their pay. If this be the state of facts, then I suppose that they have no claims at all upon this Government. Myerle has prosecuted his claim for compensation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment? I will make an additional suggestion. Gentlemen argue this matter as if there had been a distinct contract with Myerle by the Government under the authority of the law to do a particular thing, and then treat my constituents as third parties who come in here to interfere between Myerle and the Government. That has been the current of the argument. But, as was forcibly stated by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. CLEVELAND], this is a case of equity, to be administered by the Government between Myerle and the gentlemen named in the amendment. The general principle, that in cases of contract with an individual, the Government will settle with him alone, and not admit third parties, does not apply. The case lies in a nutshell. He desired to test the qualities of American water-rotted hemp. Experiments had to be made, and the agreement with Myerle was not merely a contract for the delivery of so much hemp. It required capital to make the experiments, and the Government promised, through the Secretary of the Navy, to deal liberally and justly in the matter of these experiments. In this state of the case, Montmollin and Cornwall advanced money to buy the hemp, to water-rot it, and to prepare it for the use of the Navy. A subsequent Secretary refuses to receive the hemp, and Myerle applies to Congress for relief upon principles of equity. Congress will not decide this case upon any contract, but upon its idea of justice to all parties concerned. Now, where does the equity lie? If this appropriation is to be made to cover outlays made in experimenting for the benefit of the Government, ought it not to go to those who expended the money? At least, ought they not to be allowed to have their rights settled in a court of justice? That is all I ask.

Will the gentleman allow me to make an additional observation to the gentleman from Virginia? [Mr. BOCKOCK.] I stated that Mr. Myerle had given these gentlemen a lien upon the hemp to indemnify them; but the gentleman inquires, with an air of great surprise, how he could give them a lien upon hemp which was to go to the Government. What difference did it make if the hemp was to go to the Government? Myerle agreed to furnish the Government with hemp of a particular quality—water-rotted hemp. He goes out and buys hemp in the stack, in the country, with the money of these gentlemen, and gives them a lien upon it. It was to be prepared in a certain mode, and was afterwards to be submitted to the Government. It is perfectly clear that there was nothing in the agreement to submit to the Government which would prevent him from giving them a guarantee. The information that I have received by letter is, that the Government never foreclosed any mortgage.

Mr. SACKETT. They objected to the hemp. Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The Government refused to take the hemp. Mr. Myerle got a large portion of it, and Montmollin and Cornwall a portion; but they are still greatly losers.

Mr. SACKETT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky one question. It appears by the report, if I rightly understand it, that the Government advanced a considerable sum to Myerle, when they entered into this arrangement of preparing this hemp. I ask whether there was not such an advance upon the hemp by the Government, and whether that advance has ever been restored to the Government?

Mr. BOCKOCK. The report states that there was a promise to make an advance; that the Secretary found himself unable to do it without the authority of Congress; that a proposition was introduced into Congress and passed one House, but failed in the other, and the advance was in fact never made.

Mr. HOWE. I have no other motive in rising but to get at the facts of the case.

Mr. BROWN. I do not desire to interfere with the gentleman's speech, but he seems to be seeking information. I have put into the hands of the Clerk a letter from Mr. Paulding, the Secretary of the Navy at the time this contract was made, and who, perhaps, understood it as well as anybody else. I ask that the Clerk may read that letter.

Mr. HOWE. I yield the floor for that purpose.

The Clerk then read the letter, as follows:

HYDE PARK, DUTCHESS COUNTY, April 20, 1852.
DEAR SIR: I wrote to acknowledge the receipt of your two letters from Columbia and Richmond, last winter, and one more recently from Washington, accompanied by an abstract of the late census, from the Congressional Globe, from which, among other things, I learn that twelve thousand tons of water-rotted hemp are now annually produced in the United States.

For this I do not hesitate to say, of my own personal knowledge, the country is indebted to your exertions, experience, enterprise, and perseverance, amid every species of obstacles and discouragement, and to the ruin of your affairs. It is by these exertions and sacrifices that the United States are now, in a great measure, if not entirely, independent of foreign nations for an article so indispensable to their naval and commercial marine.

I perceive that a motion to take up the bill for your relief was objected to in the House, by a member from North Carolina, whose motives, I have no doubt, were equally honest and patriotic. I know very well, from past experience, that a great portion of the claims presented to Congress are frivolous, fraudulent, and deceptive, or at least founded in weak, selfish principles by which men are so often led into erroneous ideas of what is due to themselves and others. But the recompense you ask of Congress is no adequate equivalent for your own labors and sacrifices, much less for the benefit you have conferred on your country; and it seems strange that while that body is displaying such unbounded liberality in applying the public property to the construction of railroads through deserts, and in behalf of future as well as uncertain benefits, it should thus long have delayed to discharge a debt of honest gratitude for one of such magnitude already received. I am as great a devotee of public economy as the member from North Carolina, whose known vigilance in watching over the people's money I cordially approve, at the same time that I conceive the obligations of justice superior to those of mere penny-saving.

Recollecting, as I do, that I was myself instrumental in persuading you to enter on an undertaking which had been declined by every other man to whom it was proposed, I cannot but feel an interest in the success of your application; still less can I withhold my respect from your firm reliance on the justice of Providence, if not that of Congress. It is the great sheet-anchor, and though it may sometimes drag a little in the storm, never fails to bring up the ship at last. So that I commend you with my best wishes for your final success. Your friend and servant,
J. K. PAULDING.

TO DAVID MYERLE, Esq., Washington, D. C.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I wish to inquire the date of that letter?

The CLERK. It is dated the 10th of April, 1852.

Mr. JONES. Is it numbered?

The CLERK. No, sir.

Mr. JONES. I think Mr. Paulding has written one or two letters upon this subject every session of Congress for the last ten years.

Mr. HOWE. This makes evidence for Myerle's claim, and not for the creditors. So far, very well. I was not particularly inquiring as to the merits of Myerle's claim, but to see how the creditors stood connected with him. That was my purpose. You recollect that the law knows no mercy, no favor whatever. It is the equity of which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] speaks that will administer justice to these two creditors of Myerle, (if the evidence makes out a case in equity.) I would be disposed myself, if there was no other evidence than the statement of the gentleman, to turn them round to Myerle, because the presumption with me is, that if Myerle entered into a large contract with the Government to procure water-rotted hemp, or anything of that kind, and had no means or money of his own, and is now totally insolvent, as he says, that he must have many creditors.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. He was insolvent then.

Mr. HOWE. Well, if he is not insolvent now there is no necessity of connecting his creditors with this bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. He is certainly insolvent now.

Mr. HOWE. I was going to make another

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

suggestion, and it is simply this: I have my own mind made up in regard to the amendment. Upon the supposition that he was insolvent then, and is now, he must have a multitude of meritorious creditors in Kentucky and elsewhere, if he was doing business there; and if it is right that these two persons should be preferred, it is equally right that all the creditors should be preferred. Therefore, this amendment ought to be enlarged, so that all the creditors of Myerle should have an opportunity of preferring their claims against him by suit at law, and substantiating their claims there, before Myerle should be allowed to take this money from the Government.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the difference between the general creditors and those particular creditors springing out of the fact that the debt he owes to the creditors now before the committee is a debt intimately connected with the experiments out of which this appropriation is to spring? That, in fact, the appropriation is intended to cover losses sustained by them?

Mr. HOWE. But I would suggest that all the creditors who are connected with the hemp, and who furnished him with the means, are equally meritorious with these two, and that they, as a class of creditors, should all have an equal preference, and that there should be no preference to one over the other, but that they should take at least pro rata, if this Government does not give enough to pay them all. If the gentleman will enlarge his amendment in that way, I shall have no objection to adopt it.

I believe there are creditors in my own State who furnished this man Myerle with money or credit to go on with his undertaking, for which they never received a farthing. They stand precisely in the same position and relation to Myerle and this Government that these two creditors do who have been spoken of by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE.] I do not believe that this Government ought to know anything about the creditors of Myerle at all. That is my private opinion. If the creditors have given credit to Myerle, they should look to him; and if he is not responsible, they should rely upon his honor, if he should get the money from the Government to pay them. It is like most other business transactions.

Mr. FLORENCE. I wish to make a remark, if my colleague will allow me to do so.

Mr. HOWE. I will yield the floor to my colleague.

Mr. FLORENCE. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] intimated to this committee that Mr. Myerle, at the time of entering into this contract, was insolvent.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. That is my information.

Mr. FLORENCE. Now, sir, if I am correctly informed, as I believe I am, I think I can substantiate it to the satisfaction of this committee and to the House, that Mr. Myerle was at that time engaged in a very lucrative business in the gentleman's own State, yielding him, by an examination of his books, an average amount of $68 a day, or $15,000 a year. He was enthusiastic in this enterprise. He entered into it, because he believed that he could accomplish a great purpose, and in doing so, he was guarantied by the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Paulding, against loss; and further than that, the understanding was that the hemp that he submitted to the Commissioner of Naval Affairs, or some other commission which I have forgotten, that existed at that time, was not to be condemned.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. A single word upon the question of insolvency, that I may be properly understood. I stated that I believe Myerle was insolvent, both now and at the time he commenced these experiments.

Mr. FLORENCE. There is no doubt he is at this time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I never heard of Mr. Myerle until about a year ago, nor do I know what his business was; but I have been informed, from various sources, that he was insolvent.

Mr. FLORENCE. He was a pioneer in the great improvements of the West. This hemp, if I understand it, was taken to Boston, and was taken possession of by the gentlemen who now lay claim to this money, or a portion of it, and sent to New Orleans. It was kept there a considerable time, made into rope and bagging, and sold, and the proceeds of the sale went into the possession or the pockets of the gentlemen represented by my friend from Kentucky, or whose interests are represented by him.

Mr. HOWE moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had the Private Calendar under consideration, and especially House bill No. 108, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means, the Military Academy appropriation bill, with the Senate amendments thereto.

Mr. ORR. What do you propose to do with it?

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANLY. If there be no objection, I think the bill had better be put upon its passage. It is now near the end of the session.

Mr. ORR. I shall object to that.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to put the bill upon its passage.

Mr. ORR. I do not know what the amendments are, and therefore I object to its being put upon its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was received, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ORR. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FICKLIN. I ask my friend from South Carolina to withdraw his motion for a moment, until I can have the concurrence of the House in a little amendment made by the Senate to the bill of the House, affecting settlers upon the Central Railroad in Illinois, which will take but a moment.

Mr. ORR. You had better do it to-morrow. I cannot withdraw my motion.

The question was then taken upon Mr. ORR's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the House adjourned until to-morrow, at eleven o'clock, a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 31, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be upon recommending House bill No. 309 to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

LAND DISTRICTS IN IOWA.

Mr. HENN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 478, being "An act to create three additional land offices in the State of Iowa." I will merely say to the House, that by this morning's papers, it appears that the Commissioner of the General Land Office has issued a proclamation for the sale of the public lands in the State of Iowa. The people residing on the Missouri river, where the greater portion of the lands are to be sold, are two hundred and forty miles from the present land office. Now, if we pass this bill to-day, a postscript can be put to the proclamation, whereby it will not be necessary to issue a new proclamation, and these people will be relieved from the necessity of traveling that great distance to the land office. I hope there will be no objection to taking up the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was taken up from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to hear the bill read through.

Mr. HENN. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not insist on the reading of the bill. I will say to him that it is drawn up in the form of all these bills, and in accordance with the views of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. FOWLER. Very well. I waive the request.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time, and was subsequently read the third time and passed.

WASHINGTON CITY GASLIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania. I ask the House to take up from the Speaker's table, a bill from the Senate to increase the capital stock of the gaslight company of this city, and to allow them to extend their pipes to Georgetown. I will merely state to the House, that the original capital stock of the company was $50,000, and that the company very recently expended $160,000 in improvements here in the District, and they wish now to extend their pipes to Georgetown. They cannot do it unless we pass this Senate bill. I hope there will be no objection to taking up the bill.

There being no objection, the following bill was taken up from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time by its title:

"Senate bill No. 135, to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Washington Gaslight Company,' approved July 8th, 1848."

Mr. ST. MARTIN moved that there be a call of the House.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania. I will merely say further, in reference to that bill, that, as the law now stands, the capital stock of the company shall be $50,000. The Senate has inserted previous to the words "fifty thousand" the words "three hundred and," so that the stock shall be $350,000; and they have also inserted after the word "Washington" wherever it occurs, the words "and Georgetown," so as to enable the company to lay their pipes in Washington and Georgetown. This bill does not alter the features of the original act at all. The act is very stringent, making each stockholder liable for every cent of the whole indebtedness of the company. The bill does not alter the features of the charter at all. It merely increases the capital stock, and allows the company to extend their pipes to Georgetown.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Does the act prohibit the company from exercising banking powers?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir; it does.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and was subsequently read the third time and passed.

BOUNTY LANDS TO SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. HENDRICKS. A month or two since the Committee on Public Lands reported a bill, No. 120, "authorizing certain soldiers of the late war with Great Britain to surrender the bounty lands drawn by them, and to locate others in lieu thereof." Upon the motion of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. HALL,] that bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Subsequently the chairman moved to reconsider that vote, and I now call up that motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. GREY. I rise to a question of order. The morning hour is set apart for reports from committees.

The SPEAKER. This is also business belonging to the morning hour, and being a motion to reconsider is a privileged question.

Mr. OLDS. Was not the bill to which the motion refers reported before the House adopted the special order setting aside one hour of the morning for the reception of reports from committees?

The SPEAKER. Still the Chair thinks that it would be classed with the description of business belonging to the morning hour, and as a privileged question, it may be called up at any time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that when this bill is understood, I think it cannot be objected to by any gentleman.

In the latter part of 1811, and the first part of 1812, it was found necessary, for the proper defense of the country, to complete the existing military establishments, and to add thereto ten regiments of infantry, two regiments of artillery, and one regiment of light dragoons, to be enlisted for the term of five years.

The acts of 24th December, 1811, and 11th January, 1812, under the provisions of which these additional forces were organized, provided that the soldiers thus called out should, upon receiving an honorable discharge, be entitled to receive a bounty of three months' pay, and one hundred and sixty acres of land. But, by these laws no provision was made for issuing to the discharged soldier a land warrant, or authorizing him to select his land. That was left to subsequent legislation.

Afterwards, and when the old regiments had been filled, and the new ones organized, laws were passed providing for the issuing of land warrants to such soldiers as were entitled to the land bounty. But these warrants were not assignable, nor could the soldier select his land and locate his warrant upon it, but large tracts of country were surveyed and set apart as military land districts, and from the whole the soldier was required to draw his piece of land by lot. In some instances the lots fell upon good land, but very many, if not the greater portion of these soldiers, thus received land that was not fit for cultivation, that was valueless. In all these cases the Government has not given them that compensation which was promised them when they enlisted. They expected to receive land that would be of value to them, land that would furnish them homes, but in this they have been disappointed.

At an early day Congress recognized the obligation of the Government towards these soldiers. In 1826 a law was passed extending to the military lands in Arkansas only, allowing those who had received lands that were not fit for cultivation, to surrender them and locate their warrants upon other lands in their stead. That law continued in force but for five years. But it was renewed again in 1830, 1840, and in 1848. Now, Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House, which I felt it my duty to introduce at an early day of the session, extends the provisions of these laws to the military districts in Missouri and Illinois, and allows the soldiers to whom valueless lands were allotted in these districts, to surrender them, and to get other lands in their stead. This is but right, sir. It is no bounty granted to these men. It is the discharge of an obligation resting upon the Government towards them.

Mr. DUNCAN. I desire to know whether this bill is limited to the soldiers themselves, or whether it applies to the assignees of the warrant also?

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is limited to the soldiers themselves. I ask that the bill may be read.

The bill was then read through by the Clerk.

Mr. ORR. I doubt very much whether this bill ought to pass. If I understand it, it relates to bounty lands, which were granted to the soldiers of the war of 1812, the warrants for which issued to those soldiers immediately after the termination of that war, forty years ago. It strikes me that that is a very long time to have possession of lands, and now ask to surrender the original warrants, and go upon other public lands for the purpose of locating. I imagine it would result in benefit to the assignees and to speculators, rather than to the soldiers themselves. It strikes me that there has been unusual delay on the part of the soldiers in postponing the application for forty years. I believe I shall move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, but I will withhold the motion to see if any light can be thrown upon the subject.

Mr. BRENTON. I will state, for the information of the gentleman from South Carolina, that the warrants issued for the benefit of the soldiers in the war of 1812 were not assignable. They were to be located for the exclusive benefit of the soldiers themselves. This bill applies to that class of warrants only, and, therefore, there can be no danger of their passing into the hands of speculators.

Mr. ORR. That may be very true, and it removes one of the difficulties that suggested themselves to my mind. I do not profess to have any familiarity with this subject. But some of these warrants, belonging to soldiers who served in the war of 1812, have come under my observation—lands located in some of the western States—in the States of Arkansas, Missouri, and other States. The lands, in many instances, where I have had occasion to examine into them, have been sold more than twenty years ago by the authorities of those States for the taxes.

Now, sir, I desire to know whether this bill is to provide for such cases as this. If this bill is to provide that lands which have been sold for taxes twenty years ago, and if the bill is to be pressed here, I hope it will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and thoroughly discussed, before it is adopted. As at present advised, however, I cannot vote for it.

Mr. BRENTON. The cases of which the gentleman speaks, where lands have been sold for taxes, or where they are otherwise incumbered, cannot happen under this bill. The lands cannot be transferred except in cases where they are entirely unincumbered, and where they are entirely worthless, and of no benefit to the soldier whatever. The law provides that the soldier must, at the time of his application for a transfer, state that fact, and prove it to the satisfaction of the officer. Lands which have been transferred cannot, as a matter of course, come within the provision of this bill. Those who have heretofore transferred them can have no benefit from this bill. There can, therefore, be no difficulty in relation to the matter of which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] speaks.

Mr. DUNCAN. It seems to me very questionable whether we ought to reconsider this vote and pass this bill. A long time has elapsed since these warrants have been issued; probably a large portion of the persons in whose favor they were issued, have long since deceased. This Government has fulfilled all its obligations. It has done what it promised to do. It promised bounty land and it has given it. It is an objection in my mind, that by the passage of this bill, you will increase the labor and expense of the Land Office, which is already very great. I do not think these individuals have any just claim upon the Government to be permitted, after a lapse of thirty or forty years, to change the location of their warrants, and I therefore think the bill ought not to be reconsidered, and that it ought not to pass.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not expect to say anything further upon this bill, but I desire very briefly to reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DUNCAN.] The locations were principally, if not all, made in three military districts—one in the State of Illinois, one in Missouri, and one in Arkansas. I have before remarked, that relief of the character asked for in this bill, has from time to time, since 1826, been given to those claimants whose lands were allotted in the Arkansas district. The bill now before the House proposes to extend the same provisions to the other two military districts. It makes a local law general. I think if any bill ought to pass, the one now before the House should. I know of none having more justice and right in it. The Government agreed to give these soldiers, in addition to their other compensation, one hundred and sixty acres of bounty land—land that was fit for cultivation. Afterwards the law was passed giving them the land by lot, so that under it some of them got good lands and others lands which were worthless. The object of this bill is, that in such cases those soldiers who hold worthless lands may exchange them for good lands.

But the gentleman says these warrants have been held by these soldiers thirty or forty years. Why, sir, some of the patents have not been received by the patentees over three years. I know of one case in my own district in which the soldier did not receive his patent till 1849. His land was drawn for him by lot in the Missouri district, but when he came to examine it, he found that most of it was covered with water. There were not two acres fit for cultivation out of the whole one hundred and sixty. The patent was issued to him for land drawn by lot. He did not know when his patent was issued. It was deposited here in the Land Office, or in the district land office, in 1819, and lay there till 1849 without his knowing it. There are many such cases I have no doubt. Their lands are drawn by lot, and the patent deposited here in the Land Office, or in the district land office, without the soldiers, in whose favor they are issued, knowing that they have been issued.

I will only add, sir, upon this point, that the time for issuing and locating these warrants has been extended from time to time, since 1816, until 1842, at which time I find the last act for that purpose, extending the time again five years. I am not prepared to say that any warrants have issued under the extension of 1842, but I suppose there was a necessity for the law or it would not have been enacted, and that warrants have been issued since that time, perhaps at so late a period as 1847.

Now, sir, I cannot see what wrong can possibly be done by the passage of this bill. If the soldier has sold his land, or if he has suffered any lien or incumbrance upon it, or if for any reason, the title does not remain in him or his heirs, as perfect, and free from defect, as when it was first vested in him, then he cannot avail himself of the provisions of this bill. But if he still holds the lands by the same title that he received from the Government, without lien or incumbrance, then, if the land be valueless, he may surrender it again to the Government, and in its stead receive one hundred and sixty acres of good land.

I think we ought to pass this bill. We ought to pass it now, while it may be of service to the soldiers, whom it is designed to benefit. They are becoming old, and if Congress long delays this act of justice, it cannot benefit them.

Mr. ORR. How would the gentleman ascertain the fact, and how could the Land Office ascertain the fact that the title to a tract of land in a remote county in Arkansas, was free from lien, and was worthless?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hold in my hand the printed instructions from the Land Office, under the law of 1843, relating to the Arkansas district, which is in the language of the bill before the House. I will answer the gentleman by reading from these regulations of the Department:

"The proof of the lands being unfit for cultivation, should be the affidavit of some disinterested and responsible person or persons, who shall have actually examined the whole of the land. The proof that the party has not divested himself of his interest in the land by deed or in anywise incumbered the same, and that the land has not been sold for taxes, must be the certificate of the proper officer, that there is no deed or other instrument of record going to show the fact, and the certificate of the Auditor of the State or other proper officer, that the land has not been sold for taxes, and that none are due; and the affidavit of the party to the same effect on both these points."

Mr. Speaker, this is no donation or bounty which is asked in this bill. It is a well-ascertained right which is claimed, and in passing the bill we but discharge an obligation which the Government owes to the men who fought for the country. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. HUNTER. I merely want to state to the House that I have some knowledge of these lands myself. I wish the House to take into consideration the fact, that all subsequent laws granting bounty lands to soldiers have permitted them to locate their own lands. They have been permitted to select such lands as they thought fit. But by the first law granting bounty lands to soldiers of the war of 1812, the lands are located by the officers of the Government in particular portions of the country, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] has stated, and in those grants about five cases out of every seven proved to be entirely worthless. So worthless and of so little value were they considered to the soldiers that within ten years from that time these warrants, or rather these patents, (for they were not warrants at all,) were in many instances assigned with the whole interest in them for from $5 to $10 each. Since that time you have permitted the soldiers to enter their warrants upon the land themselves. I see no reason why those soldiers should not be placed upon the same footing with the others. I do not see why, if we have given them worthless land, they should not be permitted to exchange it for good land. I may be permitted to say, I own one of these tracts myself. Mine happens to be a good one; but there is not one tract adjoining that where I would give fifty cents for the whole one hundred and sixty acres. Now, these soldiers were entitled to good land. They were entitled to land fit for cultivation; and as we have at later periods given to other soldiers—soldiers of the same war, and of subsequent wars—lands which were fit for cultivation, I see no reason why these men should not come in with the rest, and when they can show that their land is unincumbered, be permitted to select good lands in the place of those which are worthless. I do not make these remarks out of any personal feeling or interest, because my land is good.

Mr. PHELPS. There has been legislation upon this subject at several different periods. The first act upon this subject was in 1826. This merely relates to the location of military land warrants in the district set apart within the limits of the now State of Arkansas. Subsequently, in the year 1840, the provisions of that act were extended to the military reservations in the States of Illinois and Missouri. The first act upon this subject only gave the benefit of an exchange of location to those who actually immigrated with a view of settling upon the lands; but the subsequent acts upon the subject extended the provisions of that law, and permitted the exchange of the lands to be made under the provisions of that bill, whether the soldier desired to settle upon the lands or not. Now, it is well known in the districts of land set apart for the satisfaction of these military bounty land warrants, both in the State of Arkansas and in Missouri, that much of the land was unfit for cultivation, and is mostly uninhabited.

In the State of Arkansas the greater part of the land in this military reservation district is barren and sterile, while that in Missouri consists mostly of large and extensive prairies, destitute of wood, which lands are not yet settled, and the donations of a quarter section, or three hundred and twenty acres, which were made by the acts of 1813-'14, if they happen to fall upon tracts of land remote from timber, in those wide and expansive prairies are almost entirely worthless, and the soldier receives no bounty at the hands of the Government.

Now, where this land is unfit for cultivation, upon that fact being proved to the register and receiver at the proper land office, I think he should be permitted to relinquish his right to the tract of land allotted to him by the Government, and select other lands in lieu thereof. I hope the motion to reconsider will prevail, and that the bill will pass the House.

The question now being upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. HENDRICKS demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL of Illinois, and FOWLER were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes not counted.

So the motion to reconsider prevailed.

The bill was then reported, as follows:

"A bill to authorize certain soldiers in the late war with Great Britain to surrender the bounty lands drawn by them, and to locate others in lieu thereof."

Mr. ORR. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The bill was accordingly read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I cannot withdraw it.

Mr. MARSHALL. I hope the gentleman will allow my amendment to be read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no objection.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

The provisions of this act shall apply to all cases where the lands, entered by the holder of a military land warrant of the Virginia military reservation, have been lost by eviction under a decree or judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States on account of the existence of a better entry or patent.

Mr. MARSHALL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion, and allow me to present the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I withdraw my demand for the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL. I will explain to the House the object I have in view, and the cases I propose to meet by the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is to recommit the bill.

Mr. MARSHALL. I will defer my remarks until that question is disposed of.

The House was being divided, when

Mr. ORR said: Before the question is taken I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter connected with the bill. The very contingency that I anticipated presents itself in the bill. In relation to lands which have been sold for taxes, in the States where they have been located, there is no provision in this bill which would prevent the same soldier coming to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and making proof to that effect, and getting land in lieu of that which has been already sold for taxes. I desire to call the attention of the House to the phraseology of the bill, which is this:

"Provided, That before receiving such new land, it shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that the land so allotted and patented to said soldier is unfit for cultivation, and that said soldier has never disposed of his interest in any said land by sale of his own, and that the same has not been taken and disposed of for his debts due to any individual, and that he shall release all his interest in the same to the United States," &c.

Now, I submit that this bill does not protect the Government in cases where the lands have been sold for taxes.

Mr. MARSHALL. I did not intend to yield the floor, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of inviting a discussion upon the merits of the original bill until after my amendment was disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is to recommit the bill.

Mr. MARSHALL. I supposed the question had been taken upon that motion.

The SPEAKER. A division was called for, but before a division was had the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] addressed the Chair.

Mr. MARSHALL. I yielded the floor to have a vote taken upon that motion.

Mr. STUART. I desire to say a word or two. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] says there is nothing in this bill to prohibit a man who has lost his lands, by having it sold for taxes, from laying claim for, and procuring other lands instead thereof. It is a sufficient answer to that to say that there is nothing in the bill that allows him to do it. The bill simply authorizes the entry of other lands in cases where the land is unfit for purposes of cultivation.

Mr. ORR. The point of difference between the gentleman and myself can be remedied at once, if he will allow an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If we insert in the bill, after the words, "and that said soldier has never disposed of his interest in said land by any sale of his own, and the same has not been taken and disposed of for his debts due to any individual," the words "or sold for taxes," it will cover the case and make the bill perfect. With the consent of gentlemen, I will move to insert those words.

Mr. STUART. If gentlemen will allow me a moment, they will see that that amendment will not answer the purposes contemplated by the bill. This land, though utterly worthless for the purposes of cultivation, may have been sold for taxes, and if we insert such a provision as that, it cuts off all remedy in those cases.

The object of this bill is to give a man land where he has drawn land which was utterly worthless for the purposes of cultivation, and that is the only object of the bill. Now, if you insert such a provision, you cut off a large class of cases, for there is not a more common case, than that lands owned by private persons are returned and sold for unpaid taxes, and in these cases, although the land may be utterly worthless and good for nothing, yet he could get nothing under this bill.

Now, sir, I will not object to a provision which shall allow a person, who has lost his land which was valuable in itself, by its having been sold for taxes, to enter the same quantity elsewhere, although, for myself, I doubt the propriety of it.

Mr. ORR. If I understand the position of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART], it is this: If the lands located are valueless, and have been sold, the soldier is then entitled to receive other lands.

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir.

Mr. ORR. That is what I supposed.

Mr. STUART. I ask the gentleman what is his objection? If the land was valueless, how does it alter the case, though it has been sold for taxes?

Mr. ORR. A sufficient answer to that is this: nearly all the soldiers who received bounty lands for services in the war of 1812 have had the warrants in their possession for thirty or forty years. Well, in the first place, the warrant placed in his hand notified him of the town, range, and section where his land was located, and if the soldier did not look after his interest, with a view of protecting it, and to save it from being sold for taxes can he or his heirs come into Congress with an expectation of receiving favor after the expiration of thirty or thirty-five years, and that the Government shall lose all that it originally gave to him, and a hundred and sixty acres in addition?

Mr. STUART. Let us look at that argument for a moment. The Government has given bounty lands to be drawn by lot. When that lot was drawn it drew land which was utterly worthless to the soldier, and utterly valueless to the Government. The Government, I apprehend, did not intend to turn off the soldier in that way, and no one knew that such worthless lands would be drawn by him. But such would be the effect of this bill. And what is the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR]? Why, that the lands have been held for thirty or more years, and that the Government has now lost them. Lost what? Lost a hundred and sixty acres of land that is under water and never was worth a cent, and utterly valueless for the purposes of cultivation. I have known numerous cases of that kind. I was written to during the Thirtieth Congress by a constituent of mine, inquiring about his military land warrant, which was located in the State of Arkansas; and this is but an instance of the many cases of soldiers living in New England, Pennsylvania, New York, and other States, who have drawn lands which were under water in Missouri and other western States. It would have cost at that time more than four times what the lands were worth to go and see where it is, or to learn anything about it. Again, the impression was almost universal that the lands were not subject to taxes, and the soldiers in almost every instance believed that there could be no taxes levied upon them, and that they would lie there until civilization and their convenience would permit them to go and look them up. When they went, sir, they found out their error, and that they were subject to taxation and had been sold for taxes, and, in many instances, that they were good for nothing for cultivation if they had not been sold.

This is one of the plainest cases of justice and right ever presented to a legislative body.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART], while he is making his remarks, that in many instances where the lands were sold for taxes, the parties knew at the time that they were worthless, and paid no attention to them. They were not worth even the taxes.

Mr. STUART. If it is proved that the lands are worthless for the purposes of cultivation, then the soldiers, that justice may be satisfied, ought to have lands that are good instead of them.

Mr. HEBARD. There seems to be a difference of views, Mr. Speaker, as to the extent to which the provisions of this bill should go. Now, sir, there is an amendment I desire to see made to this bill of a different character from those suggested. If there is any merit in this bill, I desire to place all the soldiers of that war who had bounty land upon an equality. Now, sir, if the soldier who drew a lot of land that is entirely worthless, and who has kept it in his hands is entitled now to have a valuable lot in exchange for it, I do not see why a soldier who has sold his worthless lot of land for a nominal price is not entitled to be put in as good a condition as the one who kept it. Nor do I see why the soldier who has had his lot which was worthless sold for taxes should not have his loss made up to him as much as the other, if the object of the bill be what I suppose it is. I therefore differ very much from the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] in relation to the purposes of the bill. If it is to be passed,

I desire to see it put upon that footing by which some substantial justice and equality shall be dealt out to all of this class of soldiers alike; and I would, therefore, have stricken out all that portion of the proviso with regard to cases where the soldier has sold his land, and where it has been sold for the payment of taxes or debts. The proviso is, that he shall in the first place establish the fact that the land was worthless for cultivation. I do not know what difference it makes to the Government whether he has received some merely nominal sum for it or not. If one class of soldiers is to be remunerated in this way, I do not see why all should not who have suffered alike.

Mr. ORR. If it has been sold, Mr. Speaker, that is the best evidence we have that the land was not worthless. If a purchaser has been found where it was sold for taxes, we have an evidence it was not worthless.

Mr. HEBARD. Whether that be a sequitur or a non sequitur, it is not the point I am arguing. The provision of the bill is, that the soldier, or his heirs, shall show the particular fact that the lot of land drawn was worthless. If the fact be established that the lot of land was worthless, I do not see that it should make any difference with the Government whether the title has been kept in the hands of the soldier or not. If he parted with the title of his worthless land, it must have been for a mere nominal consideration.

Mr. ORR. Let me make another suggestion to the gentleman. Suppose the soldier, under this bill, proves that the land was valueless in 1818 or 1819, when he received the warrant, and that it was sold for taxes, and went into other hands at, perhaps, one or two cents per acre; and suppose that tract of land is now worth five dollars per acre, how is the question to be settled?

Mr. HEBARD. That, perhaps, may be one of the contingencies very difficult to guard against. I suppose the object is to have the soldier show that he has not received that which the Government contracted to give. When he contracted to serve the Government as a soldier, it was provided that he should receive as a part of his compensation, one hundred and sixty acres of land. He expected that the lot of land he should receive would be of some value, and if he has received only worthless land after the performance of his duty, I do not see what difference it makes with the Government whether he has sold it, or it has been sold for taxes; but in the case the gentleman supposes, neither the soldier nor his assignee would be benefited by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. TUCK. I wish to say a word, by way of caution, to the House, in regard to the passage of any new bill providing for the giving away of the public lands. My record is very clear here for the last few years. I have voted against every scheme that has been set up for giving away the public lands, with the exception of the homestead bill of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON.] The more I reflect upon and examine into the extensive operation of the laws which have been passed, the more I am satisfied with the propriety of the course I have pursued. In order to impress upon the House the importance of caution in acquiescing in any claim for disposing of the public land, I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact: All will recollect that about the month of January last an important bill was under consideration here, the main features of which, as then supposed, referred to making provisions for the registers and receivers of the land offices; and the bill passed after a very patient consideration by the House. The provisions of that bill were supposed to have been thoroughly examined; but, sir, it was not understood, or if it was understood by anybody, it was carried through this House by a smuggling process. The great feature of the bill, as it was discussed here, was a proposition to give from $100,000 to $200,000 to the registers and receivers of the land offices.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am very anxious, as this bill affects my own State, to submit a remark or two in regard to it, and I would suggest to the gentleman from New Hampshire, as he is not discussing the question, to yield me the floor.

Mr. TUCK. I cannot give way.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will then make the question that, as the gentleman is talking about registers and receivers, who have nothing to do with the question, he is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is wandering from the question before the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object to the gentleman going on. I have called him to order.

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman has been called to order, he will have to take his seat.

Mr. TUCK. Cannot I proceed in order?

The SPEAKER. Strictly, under the rules, the gentleman cannot, only by a vote of the House.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will beg leave to call the attention of the Chair to the rule. When a member is called to order, it is in the discretion of the Speaker to require him to take his seat. If the Speaker shall order him to take his seat he cannot proceed without a vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman from New Hampshire will be allowed to proceed with his remarks in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. TUCK. I have a few words more to say in reference to the bill passed in January for the benefit, as was supposed, of registers and receivers. There was in the bill alluded to, inserted in a most cunning and unobserved connection, a proviso repealing "the last proviso of the ninth section of the act of February, 1847." This short, unobserved clause was not observed nor considered by the House, nor discussed, nor probably understood, by the Senate. Not a gentleman in either House referred to it in the discussion. Now, sir, I have in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, written at my request after that law passed, giving me an estimate of what would be the operation of the repeal of that ninth section aforesaid. The Commissioner says in this letter, that, according to the best estimate he can make, about two thousand persons will be entitled to warrants of one hundred and sixty acres each, and from one to two thousand persons entitled to warrants of forty acres each. This vast amount of land—380,000 acres by estimate—was secured by one line in a bill which purported to be for another purpose altogether. I have estimated, according to the present prices of warrants, the value of the land that will issue by the repeal of that section. It amounts to the enormous sum of $332,500. This magnificent appropriation was obtained without a knowledge on the part of Congress of what they were doing. The clause referred to was not discussed; but the proposition on the face of the bill, to pay registers and receivers $100,000 or $200,000 was the almost only feature that was spoken of. Certainly not one in twenty of the members had any conception of what has proved the great provision of that bill. I voted against that bill, and I shall give no sort of favor to this new proposition to give away another portion of the public domain.

Mr. JOHNSON. I must really call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels compelled to decide the gentleman's remarks are not in order.

Mr. TUCK. I have done.

Mr. HEBARD. I have but a single word more to say. When I yielded the floor to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. TUCK,] I did so under the supposition that he wished only to make a suggestion or to propound an inquiry. I had but very little more myself to say. My purpose, as I have before stated, in rising was merely to express a few views in relation to the bill. I did not mean to express by what I said whether I was in favor or opposed to the passage of the bill, but the amendments that would be necessary to make the bill acceptable to me, and to carry out the purposes which I suppose were the object of the bill. The amendment I have suggested would have to be made, in my opinion, to put the bill upon a footing of equality. I have not examined the case, nor am I in possession of all the facts which would justify me at the present time in giving a vote upon this bill. I am not as well situated as gentlemen representing other sections of the country, to know what frauds may be perpetrated, and what ones have been practiced in the location of these lots; but unless all of this class of soldiers can be put upon an equality, I do not see any propriety in disturbing the law as it now is.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I have some personal knowledge in regard to the rights of these soldiers. I lived in that day, and I have dealt somewhat in those rights. The first appropriation of public lands for the meeting of these bounty land warrants, was that territory between Illinois and the Mississippi river—one of the best territories, perhaps, which could be found in the whole western country. There was less waste land upon it, than on any other territory. This was drawn by the first soldiers who received their bounty lands; and I will now state it as a fact, that for two or three years, and while those lands were exempt from taxation under the laws of the United States, the current price of these rights in the market was $25. I have bought many a right for $10.

Mr. EDGERTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The motion to proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table is now the only one in order.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Can my colleague take the floor from me, to submit his motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that would not be strictly in order, until the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EDGERTON] is disposed of. It will be disposed of by the presentation of a single bill without a vote. The rules must be enforced strictly. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Does not the unfinished business of yesterday, the report on printing, which was postponed until to-day, come up and take precedence?

The SPEAKER. It will not take precedence of private bills, because this day is set apart for private bills.

Mr. FOWLER. If we proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table, will we take up private bills?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir, in their order.

Mr. FOWLER. I hope we will do that. It will take but a few minutes, and those bills ought to be disposed of.

Senate bill No. 185, an act for the relief of the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad Company, was then read the third time.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the Private Calendar.

The question was then taken, and upon a division, there were ayes 40, noes 76.

So the House refused to go into Committee of the Whole upon the Private Calendar.

THE REPORT ON PRINTING.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Is it in order to take up the printing matter?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I insist upon the regular order, and that we shall proceed with the bill just announced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the circumstances the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] may have a vote upon his proposition to proceed to another privileged question. It cannot be done without a vote of the House.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the subject of printing.

Mr. FOWLER. Not to-day.

Mr. CLEVELAND demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CLEVELAND and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 82, noes 45.

So the House agreed to take up the report of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STANTON. It is not my purpose to detain the House with a speech.

The SPEAKER. The pending proposition is to refer the subject to the select committee.

Mr. STANTON. I will content myself with merely stating, for the information of the House, that the Joint Committee on Printing, and the Select Committee appointed some time ago upon the same subject, have had several conferences in reference to the character which should be given to this bill. After a great deal of deliberation, and after consulting with the most intelligent and experienced printers of this city, of whose services they could avail themselves, they came to the conclusion as to the provisions which should be incorporated in this bill. They have drawn up a bill of that description, which the chairman of the Select Committee [Mr. MARSHALL] has under his care, and which he proposes to present to the House as a substitute for the bill now pending. I presume it will not be necessary to refer it back to the Special Committee or any other committee. The Joint Committee on Printing have agreed to the substitute which the chairman of the Select Committee has in his possession, and who will report it.

The SPEAKER. The pending proposition is to refer to the Select Committee.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The Special Committee on Printing have had this subject under consideration.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order while the motion to recommit the bill is pending. The motion pending is to recommit to the committee of which the gentleman from Kentucky is chairman, and it is upon his own motion.

Mr. MARSHALL. I will withdraw the motion to recommit the bill, in order that we may offer the substitute we have agreed upon for the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that there is an amendment in the nature of a substitute already pending to the bill.

Mr. POLK. Is it in order to move to lay the amendment upon the table?

The SPEAKER. That will carry the bill with it.

Mr. MARSHALL. Is it in order for me to move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert after the first section?

The SPEAKER. There is a proposition of that kind pending. The gentleman can move to strike out the whole of the pending substitute, and introduce his amendment in lieu of it. It is competent, however, to amend the original bill, section by section, first.

Mr. PHELPS. I would inquire what is the motion pending. Is it to strike out the whole of the bill, and to substitute?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] proposed a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. PHELPS. Is it not in order for the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] to move to strike out all after the first section, and to insert?

The SPEAKER. The pending proposition to do so would take precedence.

Mr. PHELPS. I understand the pending proposition is, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] propose to strike out all after the first section and insert?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Kentucky as offering a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. MARSHALL. I propose to strike out all after the first section and insert.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

Mr. MARSHALL. The substitute which we offer has been printed, but there are one or two amendments which I shall have to add. I will explain to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there is an amendment pending to the 5th section of the bill. It does not preclude the gentleman from Kentucky offering his amendment, but the Chair thinks that this amendment must be disposed of first.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

Provided, That no contract, agreement, or arrangement entered into by this committee shall be binding, or take effect until the same shall be reported to that House of Congress to which the printing belongs, and approved by the same; and where the printing relates to the business of both Houses of Congress, then it shall be reported to both Houses, and approved by them.

The question was then taken upon the amendment reported above, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The bill which has been prepared by the special committee, of which I am chairman, is a very long bill, extending to twelve pages of printed matter, and embracing a great variety of details. If there is no objection, I will explain its provisions during the course of my remarks, and express the views at the same time which I entertain upon the subject of the public printing. It is a subject to which I have given considerable attention; but from its complexity and difficulty, I am not certain that the information I possess is to be relied upon, or that the views I entertain as to the best mode of managing it are safe guides to proper results.

The first section of the bill under consideration repeals the resolution of 1846, which established the contract system, whereby the public printing was let to the lowest bidder. I am perfectly satisfied, from the experiments which have been made under that resolution, that the system should be abandoned.

The contract system was established upon the idea that it secured economy, and was the fairest mode of selecting the printer, since it seemed to present the largest field for competition among those who were desirous of employment in the business of Congressional printing. Experience has demonstrated the fact, that neither of these elements, upon which the system was founded in theory, appear to work well in practice. First, economy is not secured; because the work, when performed at all, has always been badly executed, and comes to Congress so tardily that the subjects to which the printed matter relates have either been disposed of before we receive the document, or have passed away from the attention of Congress, for the want of the information the document is supposed to contain. It must be apparent to all that this delay compels Congress to legislate in the dark, or not to legislate at all; and consequently that it is disastrous to that intelligent determination of questions which the public expects from such a tribunal as this; also, fatal to the practice of enlightened public economy.

Independent of these considerations, experience has shown that while contracts have been repeatedly given under the system, there is no instance in which Congress has not been memorialized, and appealed to for indemnity and remuneration for alleged losses of the contractors. Our files now contain such memorials from Wendel and Van Benthuyssen, from Ritchie, and we shall have another from Hamilton. Congress seldom resists such applications when urged with perseverance. The votes which have been taken in this and the last Congress, upon some of these applications, leave little room for doubt that whatever expectation may have been formed of realizing economy of expenditure by resorting to a contract with the lowest bidder, will be disappointed by the ultimate settlement with the contractor, who appeals from the hardships of his contract to the generosity and magnanimity of Congress.

The delay—the imperfect execution of the work—the inconvenience of legislating without the aid of printed matter, embodying the information submitted to the consideration of Congress, would seem to present sufficient reasons to abolish the system. The printing ordered by the last Congress is not yet completed—that ordered by this Congress has been delayed, as we all know, to a degree and extent which has been greatly inconvenient, and indeed prejudicial to the public interests. It will always be thus under that system. But, in the second place, the idea of enlarging the field of competition for the employment and securing fairness among bidders, has proved an error also.

The public printing was divided into five classes by the advertisements, with a view that different bidders might propose for a part only, or for parts, or for the whole, as might suit their desire and their capital. They who understand the character of the work, possess great advantages in forming their bids over printers who do not understand it. Such persons may bid for three classes, or for the whole, and by bidding low upon a class in which little is to be done, and very high upon a class in which much is to be done, may secure a contract, by reason of their average of the whole falling below the fair bidder for a single class who asks fair and living prices for that class. The same thing obtains when only a single class is bid for. Thus, the advertisements may be for proposals to print the fifth class—so much for what is to be done in one kind of type, and so much for what is to be done in other kinds of type. The printer who knows the probable quantity of each kind of type to be used in that class, will propose to set up for nothing per page in that type in which he foresees that very little will be required, and at a very high rate for that in which he sees that much will be required, and so takes advantage, by the average, of the fair bidder who looks to a compensation for whatever type may be used, and bids accordingly. The like advantages are taken in the rates of press-work, and whatever else appertains to the work. There are minutiae in this business which you and I cannot understand—which practical printers cannot, unless they are entirely conversant with the routine of Congressional printing—of which our clerks and committees know little or nothing, and the results of all our attempts to put the system in force, have produced the conviction, upon my mind, that the printers here in Washington can combine and confound us whenever it suits their interest or pleasure; and should some unfortunate wight catch a contract that results disadvantageously, Congress is then to be besieged for indemnity or remuneration, and yielding to the appeal, stands a first-rate chance to pay, in the settlement, a higher price for bad work than would have been requisite, under other circumstances, to have secured neatness, dispatch, and workmanlike execution of the same printing.

My own reflection upon the contract system has induced the conclusion that it is erroneous in the very principles upon which it is based. The principle is, that he is the best person to employ who will work the cheapest. The only criterion the system proposes whereby to judge the person to be employed, is the cheapness of the bid. As this is to be repeated at each Congress, by advertising anew for new proposals, and constantly referring the decision of the choice to the same standard, (the rate of the bid,) it will be seen that, no matter how faithfully the public printer may have executed his contract, or how much he may have expended in his preparation to do the work so as to suit the wishes of Congress, or how much Congress may desire to continue him in that employment, the system closes the door upon him, and upon Congress also, if any competitor shall have underbid him to the amount of five dollars. This fact makes the contract for the printing of Congress a most hazardous enterprise for a man of business. He must necessarily invest very extensively in materials essential to the conduct of his business, and must keep a large capital in movement to pay ordinary and extraordinary expenses. Should he fail to secure a renewal of the contract after his first term, the depreciation upon his stock will overbalance any legitimate profits he could make on a fair contract; for no property that I know of is so unavailable as old presses, half-worn type, desks, cases, and the ordinary fixtures of a printing establishment. Hence you find, practically, that the contractor is not prepared, and fears to prepare himself to execute the work with dispatch; for the law holds out no assurance of continuance in employment as a reward for fidelity to his engagement, but, on the contrary, proclaims that skill, honesty, and the proper performance of the contract, will all be borne away and overwhelmed by a bid, if it shall be ten dollars cheaper than the bid of the printer who may have invested his means as I have supposed.

This system is an appeal to the avarice of labor for employment. Government stands in the market with work to be done, and means to pay for it, asking laborers to compete for it; but, unlike a private individual pursuing his own interest, Government declares that it does not mean to choose among the competitors from a comparison of ability, capacity, and fidelity—the only test is cheapness. He who is worthless may succeed over him who is able, and faithful, and tried, and ready to proceed with the work. The result has been, and will be, that the incompetent and adventurous will succeed in procuring contracts they cannot fill, and soon fail to execute—public loss occurs—the Government suffers—while, not unfrequently, the contractor is ruined.

It may be replied that the Government secures faithful performance by taking bond with sureties from the contractor. Why, sir, how fallacious is such an idea! What are such bonds worth? Where have been the recoveries on public bonds during the whole history of the Government? Even when public funds have been embezzled by fiduciaries, the bonds have not secured a reimbursement, and more seldom have any contractors in any branch of service been successfully prosecuted for liabilities incurred. A public printer's bond! Why, Mr. Speaker, no suit could be instituted to mark the damages resulting from a delay in executing Congressional printing, and none will ever be instituted which would pay the costs of the prosecution. No system is wise, in connection with the public printing, which provides for a determination of the choice by the cheapness of the bid alone, and which deprives the employer of the right to judge from knowledge, of the ability and capacity of the employee to perform the service. No system can be wise when defaults under it are accompanied by no penalty which can be practically enforced, or when political partialities or the general magnanimity of Representatives may turn failures and losses under a contract into the basis upon which to found indemnities which will turn out to be heavy rewards. Congress will not pursue the obligor who has failed to perform a ruinous contract, and much less will it pursue innocent sureties. These considerations have induced me to recommend an entire change of the system.

Two methods of executing the public printing were suggested in lieu of the contract system: 1st. The establishment of a Government printing office under the direction of a superintendent. 2d. The employment of a public printer to execute the work, according to prices fairly remunerative, and to be regulated by law. The bill we have reported combines both these plans, yet adopts neither entirely.

Great objections exist to the adoption of the plan of a Government printing office. It establishes a printing office upon the means of Government, which may be used by those to whom it may be intrusted, for other purposes than mere Government printing—purposes which may make it a means of oppressing those who have engaged private capital in the same kind of business. Congress cannot watch the operations of such an establishment, and persons engaged in such an office will undertake, on private account, at leisure hours, a thousand jobs, which have no relation to public affairs, to the detriment of other printing establishments, in the city or out of it.

Immense outlays of money will be required to supply the wastage of material, where the Government is the source of supply. Experience proves, that when private interest watches the preservation of means invested, there will be a proper effort to prevent the wastage of the original stock, and, consequently, greater caution in the use of it. Were a printing office purchased by Government, still, a superintendent must be employed; journeymen printers must be the compositors; presses, and paper, and ink, must be the means of executing the work. If a profit is derivable from the use of presses, paper, and ink, by individual enterprise, it is urged that, by this expedient, that profit will be saved. But, in lieu of the profit saved, Government will expend large sums for ground and buildings, in salaries and wages, and be subjected to unusual wastage; for what belongs to the public will not be taken care of by persons engaged about a printing office.

Again: such an enterprise will cut off all who have invested their means here for the purpose of earning a livelihood by printing, and who looked to the patronage of Government, through its multiplied departments, as one of the supports for their trade. The special committee have compared the advantages and disadvantages to result from this plan, and have concluded to recommend against its adoption, and in favor of the election, by each House in Congress, of the public printer for the Houses respectively. No objection exists to this mode but the abuse which springs from the influence of political partialities. The dominant political party in each Congress will elect a political friend—in all probability the conductor of a central party newspaper. To such a person, when elected, profitable jobs of printing will be given, and, it is feared, occasions will be sought for the grant of extra allowances. Political parties are constantly changing in this Hall. The majority of to-day is the minority of to-morrow. So far as party patronage is concerned, the plan of electing a public printer is as fair for one party as another. The fear to be entertained is, that the ardor of party feeling may cause forgetfulness of the public interest in the struggle for power. Party fealty is often invoked to rescue a party favorite, or a party organ, from apprehended ruin; and then allowances may be made, for which there exists no necessity in the pursuit of genuine public interests. But, Mr. Speaker, what check can be placed upon a majority determined to take such a step? If you have the contract system, the extra allowance will be made in the shape of indemnity for alleged losses. If you have a Government printing office, it will be extended under some new form. The best remedy is to establish the rates beforehand, and by law, and then he who takes the printing will see what he may expect, and, as his work progresses, let him draw his pay, according to those rates. The only fear must spring from a distrust of the Representatives of the people; and, in a Government like this, if the people may not repose securely upon their Representatives in Congress, they cannot expect to rely upon any power known to the Constitution.

The bill provides for the appointment of a superintendent of the public printing, who shall be a practical printer, and versed in a knowledge of all that appertains to printing and book-making. Withal, he is not to have interest in any contract for paper, ink, or printing. Upon this person the bill imposes the duty of giving out the matter to be printed; of receiving it when printed; of examining the work and rejecting it when unfaithfully or improperly executed, and of attending to the dispatch with which it is done. He has a liberal salary allowed to him, and he is to be restrained from a violation of his official obligations by bonds and by penal sanctions.

The idea of the committee is, that the advantages to arise from a printing bureau are secured by this employment of a practical printer to take the general and particular supervision of this branch of the public business. He will be disinterested between the Government and the printer; but, should he attempt oppression, he may be removed from office, or his decisions may be reviewed by the Joint Committee on Printing. It is supposed by the committee that the same character of talent which enables a foreman of a heavy book concern to guide its operations in the business of publishing, would be able to render satisfaction in the office of superintendent of the Government printing. In order to reduce the printing to a system which can be regulated by law, the bill requires the departmental and bureau printing, as well as the printing of Congress, to pass through the hands of the superintendent, and that he shall register it both as it goes to and returns from the public printer, to the end that a complete exhibit, intelligible to the country, may be made of the amount annually drawn from the public Treasury on account of public printing. At present this class of expenditure is clothed under the title of "contingent expenses," both by Congress and the Departments, and there is great difficulty in understanding the subject. We want a plain tabular of the expense, made out, item by item, like a merchant's account, that the country may look upon it embodied in a single report. Economy may then be practiced when popular observation can be fixed upon the annual result, and when the Representatives of the people can see at one view how much is to be estimated annually for public printing. I do not know, you do not, and I doubt much whether one among us can say how much is spent for printing by this Government from year to year. We know that the sum paid for Congressional printing has swollen to hundreds of thousands of dollars; but I have not the glimmering of an idea as to how much the printing of the Executive Departments costs the Government. So far as I can see, it is dispensed by the heads of Departments and chiefs of Bureaus, without responsibility for waste, without accountability for extravagance, and at their own will. By the plan proposed, instead of being covered up under the heading of contingent or incidental expenditures, we shall have a business record, and a chance to fix proper responsibility upon whatever branch of Government may perpetrate abuse.

The superintendent is to execute bond for the faithful performance of his duty in the sum of $20,000, with sureties to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and should he violate his duty he may be prosecuted on his bond. But if he becomes interested in any contract relating to the furnishing of paper or relating to the printing, he may be fined, at the discretion of a jury, to the amount of $10,000, and may be imprisoned in the penitentiary for five years, besides forfeiting his place. Unless he should be capitally executed, no sterner penalty for a breach of duty could have been devised. The committee have provided by this bill, that the paper on which all public printing shall be executed is to be purchased by Government, under contract and by a sample. Experience has demonstrated that heavy speculations may be made in the article of paper, on which the public printing is executed. A public printer may engage to furnish paper of a specified quality, weight, and texture, but if the paper which he does provide falls a little short in size or weight, the decrease in price becomes a profit to the printer, illegitimately procured at the expense of the Government. These items, running through a heavy paper account, swell to thousands of dollars; and are so much abstracted improperly from the Treasury by an unfaithful public servant. This bill completely guards against such an abuse in future, by directing the superintendent to advertise for the annual supply of the paper, and to accept the bid with a sample, which shall be preserved. By that sample all the paper received under the contract must be compared, and to it must conform. Now, the examination of paper is made after the printing is executed upon it—then it will be examined by a disinterested person, and may be returned if it is not of proper quality, or shall fail to come up to the proper standard. The bids for the paper contract will be opened by the superintendent in the presence of the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, and the contract shall be awarded, under their supervision, to the lowest bidder, whose sample shall most nearly conform to the specifications in the advertisement for proposals. But, it will be remarked that the provisions of the bill are so guarded that the officer who issues the advertisement at the close of each Congress, will not be the officer who awards the contract; for the superintendent will go out of office at the commencement of Congress, and his successor will open the proposals after the election of a Speaker to the House. The public printer will receive paper upon his written requisitions on the superintendent. These will be filed away as vouchers against him, and he will be charged therewith. When the printed matter is returned, he will be credited by the amount of paper redelivered; so that the debits and credits on paper account of the public printer, as kept by the superintendent, will show, at a glance, the amount used in the public service, and the balance in the hands of the printer. We have been assiduous to provide all the guards and checks our own reflections suggested, and the experience of others acquainted with the subject, deemed necessary to the public interest.

Now let me turn to the rates of prices established by the bill. Under the resolution of 1846 the printing was divided into five classes, with the intent that these might be assigned, possibly, to various persons. When one person or firm shall be the printer for the House, and another for the Senate, as they will have the whole business to transact, there will be no longer any necessity for a division into classes. The bill, therefore, has abolished the classification of the public printing. The main point to which our attention was directed was the ascertainment of fair rates of compensation. The committee was not composed of practical printers, though several members had been editors; so we summoned to our assistance the best practical printers of all parties in the city. We invited Mr. Rives, of the Globe office, Mr. Gideon, of the Republic office, Mr. Towers, the foreman of the National Intelligencer, the foreman of the Union office, and the foreman of the Southern Press to come before the committee, in a consultation with the Joint Committee on Printing. Various rates and plans were presented, and the selection presented by the bill is the result finally determined upon. Since the determination of these rates, I have compared them with the prices of 1819. I find, that for "composition" our rates are nearly as high as the rates of 1819; but this is only a small item in the expense of the public printing, and the price cannot be objectionable. I know no good reason why a journeyman printer should not receive as sound wages in 1852 as he did in 1819 for setting type. The price of composition, I suppose, will fall to fifteen or twenty per cent. below the prices of 1819. Under the laws heretofore, the printer included paper in the estimates of prices. This bill excludes it. Press-work, folding, and stitching are embraced together, and, as compared with the law of 1819, I think these rates will fall more than fifty per cent. But it is the most difficult task in the world to assign fair rates. I frankly say to you, the more

I have studied this subject, the less I believe I have known about it. Printing may well be called a mystery, for when the printers talk of ems and quods, rule and figure work, small pica, &c., and tell me the modes of counting, I behold the mystery; and I become perfectly conscious, that in the attempt to establish rates and prices, we are most liable to err—indeed, that we are wholly in their power. The printers are as bad as a set of doctors. It is almost impossible to get them to agree as to what is fair; and when they do announce it, before you have gone two squares they meet you and make you believe, in one way or the other, that the rate fixed is all wrong. The rates we have reported, however, come nearest to what seems to be fair, as far as we can get at it, from the printers. Our object has been to afford fair, liberal, remunerative pay, and no more.

Mr. CLINGMAN, (interrupting.) I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky how this scale of prices compares with the scale which the Committee on Printing reported a few weeks since, at the time they proposed to give the printing to Gideon & Co. and Donelson & Armstrong? I have some idea of that scale, and I want to compare this one with it.

Mr. MARSHALL. Well, my impression is, that the prices allowed are about as high as those. Some of them are higher, but the deductions which are made from the printing of long numbers bring the aggregate somewhat lower.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understood on that occasion, from conversations with Mr. Rives and others, that the rates allowed then were at least twenty per cent. higher than Towers's bid—I mean that which Towers, at the beginning of the session, offered to do the public printing for. I wish to know how much these rates are above the standard that a practical printer is willing to do the work for.

Mr. MARSHALL. I will observe, in reply to the gentleman, that Mr. Towers was with us fixing these rates. The statement we derived from Mr. Towers at first, was a statement of what he thought fair. Subsequently, he informed me that his statement was based upon an improper calculation, and that he thought his statement was wrong. But he looked over this bill yesterday, and stated to me that it was all right, except that he thought we deducted too much upon the long numbers, and on the press-work he thought we had allowed seven cents too much per page. Rives thought the press-work not quite high enough, and the deduction far too small.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg leave to say that I had a conversation with Mr. Towers in relation to this point, after the discussion on the report of the committee, and Towers told me that the report of the committee was from twenty to twenty-five per cent. higher than the bid which he put in at the beginning of the session. I asked him if he was willing to do the work at his bid? and he said that he was willing to do it, and that he had offered the committee bonds to any amount that they might require, to do the work according to his bid. I then asked how it was he had subsequently given the committee the rates which they report? Well, he said he had put them at what he thought fair and reasonable rates on which the printer could make a profit, but that he himself was willing to take the work at the rate he formerly bid, which was at least twenty per cent. lower than this. I am now informed by a member of the Committee on Printing, [Mr. HAVEN,] that the rate reported in the bill of the gentleman from Kentucky, is higher than that which they agreed to pay to Gideon & Co. and Donelson & Armstrong. In relation to the rate of 1819, which has been referred to as perhaps within twenty per cent. of this, I have been informed by a printer that the rate of 1819 is from two or three hundred per cent. higher than the work can be done for now.

Mr. HAMILTON. All those original bids included the purchase of the paper.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understand that.

Mr. HAMILTON. And that last bid was upon the supposition that the paper would cost $7.50 per ream.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The value of the paper makes no difference with reference to the composition and other points. I want to understand these prices. I am willing to give what is liberal and fair, but not an extravagant price.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the prices—as in 1819—include paper, then it makes a great difference in the printing, as to what kind of paper is purchased; and when Congress reserves to itself the right of supplying such paper as it needs—such paper as it desires to have its documents printed on, it takes from the printer the chance of augmenting his profits, by supplying us with paper of an inferior quality, and consequently it behooves us, as we would wish to do right, and give him a fair profit, to give somewhat more for the composition when he is not to have a profit from supplying us with inferior paper, or the profit which may be secured by a skillful and lawful watching of the paper market. I believe that is the proper view of the matter.

Mr. ORR. I wish to make a suggestion which will throw additional light on what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman from North Carolina refers to the prices of 1819, and says that he understands from the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, that twenty per cent. deducted from the prices of 1819 would still leave a very high rate. According to a calculation which I made this morning, the prices for composition are about twenty per cent. below those of 1819. Now, the composition is merely a manual, mechanical operation, and of course the labor is as high now as it was in 1819, perhaps higher. But the prices for press-work, stitching, and folding in this bill, are about sixty per cent. below the prices of 1819.

Mr. MARSHALL. Some idea may be formed of the difference in the rates, when I say that we pay $7.81 for press-work which cost $21 under the law of 1819. From this $21 you must deduct the cost of the paper, in order to get the exact difference.

The bill contains a variety of details for which, of course, the committee do not claim any originality. We have taken them from the suggestions of practical printers. We have not allowed what printers call "broadsides," in the public printing, and for which they charge enormous prices. We have directed that the matter shall be put into octavo pages, and that the small nonpareil type shall be used, when necessary, for that purpose.

Feeling no interest in this matter except a desire to promote the public interest, I have submitted to the House my own judgment, under all the lights I could obtain. I should not be at all surprised if, after two or three years' experience, it should turn out to be a system as full of errors as others we have tried. But I have acted for the best, and with an honest desire on the part of the committee to make those reforms in the law which will be most calculated to check abuses, yet to subserve the public welfare. The task has been an unwelcome one, and the bill which is the result we submit now for the judgment of the House.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I desire to ask either the gentleman who sits before me, [Mr. HAVEN,] or the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] to give a short statement to the House of the comparative rates in this bill and that we have been discussing, introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Printing, [Mr. GORMAN,] and those paid to Gideon & Co. and Donelson & Armstrong?

Mr. HAVEN. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am able, I will answer the question of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.] I cannot give, in detail, all the information he asks for, but I can give some information upon the subject. Let me remark, in order that the House may understand the matter, for it has become somewhat complicated, that the prices in the original bill, now under consideration, being the bill introduced by Mr. GORMAN, correspond with the rates agreed upon in the contract entered into with Gideon & Co. and with Donelson & Armstrong, to remedy any neglect or delay in the execution of the contract with Mr. Hamilton. These contracts of course provided for furnishing the paper by the contractors, the same as is provided in the contract with Hamilton; that is, the contractors are to furnish the paper and printing at a given price, to be paid the contractors. In Mr. GORMAN's bill the paper and printing are put together at a given price, but the paper is to be furnished by the Government, and its cost deducted from that given price, and the balance paid to the printer: whilst in this bill, reported by the special committee, the paper is to be purchased and paid for by the Government, and the prices for printing only are fixed and to be paid to the printer; and in order to understand the comparison of the prices, these facts must be kept in view.

The prices to be paid Gideon & Co. and Donelson & Armstrong for both printing and paper, are precisely the same as those fixed by Mr. GORMAN's bill; in other words, their contracts and Mr. GORMAN's bill are the same in price, and hence, in answering the inquiry of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] the comparison may be made between that bill and the one from the special committee.

Now, upon turning to Mr. GORMAN's bill, page two, line six, it will be found that for composition per page, octavo, the price is, "for small pica, rule, $1.25," whilst, by turning to the special committee's bill, page seven, line twenty-six, it will be seen, for the same thing, the price is $1.50, an increase of one sixth above the contract prices of the committee with Gideon & Co. and with Donelson & Armstrong.

Again, in the eighth line, on page two, of Mr. GORMAN's bill, for composition per page, octavo, the price is, "for brevier rule, $1.75," whilst by turning to the bill of the special committee, page seven, line twenty-eight, it will be seen the price there fixed for the same thing is $2—an increase of one eighth above the contract prices of the committee and Mr. GORMAN's bill.

This rise in price is uniform upon the same kind of work through all the five classes of printing specified in Mr. GORMAN's bill. I cannot tell what the aggregate of this increase would amount to; that can only be determined by the quantity of work done.

I have looked over these two bills carefully, and I can find no instance where the bill of the special committee falls below the prices of the contracts with Gideon & Co. and Donelson & Armstrong, or Mr. GORMAN's bill; but in such instances as I have mentioned it goes above them.

Mr. CLINGMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from North Carolina permit me to say a few words in further explanation of this matter, and to correct the gentleman from New York in some of his statements? These items to which the gentleman refers, relate exclusively to the composition, and constitute comparatively an inconsiderable portion of the work. The type set up for one book will answer for one hundred thousand. In some two or three of these items, it is true, the two committees in their conferences agreed should be increased, over and above the prices fixed in the bill reported by Mr. GORMAN. But if the gentleman had gone a little further, and examined the prices provided in each bill to be paid for press-work, he would have seen that the bill of the two committees, now before us as the substitute, reduces the press-work down as low as thirty-two and a half cents. Again, if he will examine the deductions for long numbers in each bill, he will see that in the one presented by Mr. GORMAN, they amount to nothing, while in the substitute they are upon the bulk of the printing as high as twenty per cent. I will turn to the two bills and compare them.

Mr. HAVEN. While the gentleman from Kentucky is looking at his notes, I will remark, that in relation to this reduction of from ninety-five cents to thirty-two cents upon press-work, if he will look into these bills, he will find that this reduction may be accounted for in the fact, that in one case the contractor furnishes the paper, and in the other the Government furnishes it.

Mr. STANTON. I am aware that the cost of paper is to be deducted. But a little calculation will convince the gentleman that the cost of paper added to the prices fixed for press-work in the substitute, will not make them anything like equal to the prices allowed in Mr. GORMAN's bill. In his bill the prices of press-work are regulated according to the character of the job, and range at three dollars and seventy-five cents, ninety-five cents, and ninety cents. All these are higher than the prices of 1819, which were uniform upon all kinds of work at eighty-seven and a half cents. In the substitute they are also uniform, and reduced as low as thirty-two and a half cents for all descriptions of work. The cost of the paper, taken from the prices of Mr. GORMAN's bill, will not reduce the cost of the work to anything like as low a figure as we have fixed it in the substitute now before the House.

Then take the deductions provided in the substitute for long numbers, and it will be seen that they are much greater than in the bill of Mr. GORMAN. They are as follows:

- "When the number exceeds five thousand and does not exceed ten thousand, two per centum."
- "When the number exceeds ten thousand and does not exceed twenty thousand, five per centum."
- "When the number exceeds twenty thousand, twenty per centum."

In Mr. GORMAN's bill in no case does the deduction exceed five per centum. The difference between a deduction of five per cent. upon the cost of eighty or ninety thousand copies of the Patent Office Report, and twenty per cent., as provided by the substitute, is a vast item, and will make a very material difference in the aggregate of pay to be received by the public printers.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It is not necessary, I presume, that the gentleman from Kentucky should go into all these items. I should like to ask this question: What difference will there be in the printing of this Congress—for the gentleman can form an idea of the amount—between the prices proposed in the bill of the special committee and the original proposition, about which we have had so much discussion here—I mean the contract with Gideon & Co. and Donelson & Armstrong? I should like to know of the gentleman from Kentucky whether there would be a difference in the amount for the present Congress, and what the difference would be?

Mr. STANTON. I will answer the gentleman very cheerfully as to what my judgment is upon the subject. I believe that in consequence of the reduction in the price of press-work, as I have before explained, and the great difference in the per cent. of deductions provided in the two bills, the aggregate to be paid would be less, under the substitute, than under the bill presented by Mr. GORMAN. The prices contained in his bill are identically the same as those contracted by the Joint Committee on Printing to be paid to Donelson & Armstrong and Gideon & Co. The only increase of rates over the prices fixed in those contracts, provided by this bill, is upon a few items of composition, being a very inconsiderable portion of the work, while the reduction of the prices of press-work, and deduction for long numbers, are upon the heaviest part of the public printing, and make the provisions of the substitute more favorable to the Government than the original bill. This is my judgment upon the subject of the gentleman's inquiry, and I have faith to believe that it will be found correct.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] who still holds the floor, I desire to say a word or two in relation to the bill now before the House, in order, first, that the prices in this bill may be the better understood, as I think I can explain them, and, further, to do justice to myself in the position I have previously occupied upon the printing question during this session. To illustrate, as far as I can—and I hope I may do so intelligibly—from my limited experience upon the subject of printing, and information I have been enabled to glean, and compels me to say that I regard this as an equitable bill. I have taken some pains to ascertain the number of "ems" in a page of the different sizes of type provided for, and to be used in printing documents by this bill.

In the first place, small pica plain, that is, unruled, is provided for in this bill. There are sixteen hundred ems of small pica plain to the page.

A MEMBER. What do you mean by ems?

Mr. FLORENCE. It is a method the printers have for measuring their work. They set up the type at so much per thousand ems. It is measured by a certain rule the printers have, I do not understand myself. I believe, however, it is one thousand squares measured by the letter m type of the font of which the matter is set up. The price paid for the mere labor of composition would be about sixty-six and two thirds cents per page. According to this estimate, it would leave for the printer elected according to the provisions of this bill, for wear and tear of the type, superintending, investment of capital, office rent, and other incidentals to be provided for, about thirty-three and one third per cent. In this is included the cost for proof-reading, which is an important item in the expenses of a well-regulated printing office. It will be necessary to insure accuracy, in the public printing, to have a clean proof-reader, as he is called, and to have the proofs read properly, and correctly. No other will answer the purpose. As I said, a page of small pica, for which one dollar is provided for composition, contains about one thousand six hundred ems. Fifty per cent. additional is paid for rule work. For brevier, plain, $1 50 is to be paid, a page of which contains two thousand eight hundred ems; and the price is increased proportionately for rule work.

To better explain, I submit so much of the bill as relates to the payment for composition of the peculiar type to which I have referred, with the number of "ems" opposite it, and also prices for other composition, which I will read:

"For reports of committees and the Journals of both Houses, with indexes, and the Executive documents of each House, embracing messages from the President, reports from the Executive departments, bureaus, and offices, and documents and statements communicated therewith, with indexes; resolutions and other documents from State Legislatures; memorials, petitions, treaties, and confidential documents for the Senate; for composition per page, octavo—

For small pica plain, one dollar.....1,600 ems.
For small pica rule, one dollar and fifty cents...1,600 "
For brevier plain, one dollar and fifty cents...2,800 "
For brevier rule, two dollars.....2,800 "

"For nonpareil rule three dollars and seventy-five cents.
"For the composition of tables larger than octavo size, per one thousand ems, seventy cents; but the page of octavo size shall contain not less than one thousand six hundred ems when printed in small pica; and the body of all plain matter shall be so printed, except extracts, yeas and nays, and addenda, which shall be printed with brevier type. All rule and figure work shall be printed in royal octavo form, with small pica, each page containing not less than one thousand six hundred ems, if the matter to be printed can be brought into pages of that size with that kind of type, so as to be read with facility and convenience. If it cannot, it shall be printed with brevier type, each page containing not less than two thousand eight hundred ems; and if it cannot be brought into a royal octavo page with brevier type, so as to be understood with facility, it shall be printed with nonpareil type, each page containing not less than four thousand two hundred ems; and when it cannot be brought into a royal octavo page with nonpareil type, so as to be read with facility, it shall be printed with brevier type in a broadside, showing the whole table at one view, and be so folded that it can be bound in a royal octavo volume.

"When matter is leaded, the composition shall be counted as if the matter were printed solid, and not leaded."

This contains, I believe, so far as payment for composition is provided for, all that is of interest at this time.

The prices thus provided for in this bill to be paid to the printer who may be elected by this House, if the bill becomes a law, are, in my estimation, only equitable and fair, and are not, as far as I can judge, extravagant.

But, sir, I desire to call the attention of the House to the necessity of a change or an alteration of considerable importance, which ought to be made. The bill provides that when the number of copies to be printed exceeds a certain amount, a reduction in the price shall be made; when the number ordered exceeds 5,000 and does not exceed 10,000, a reduction of two per cent. is to be made. Now, sir, I think that 10,000 copies of any document is no more than a printer ought to be paid for. That is the number ordinarily ordered to be printed, I believe. It is the usual edition, and I would not, between five and ten thousand, reduce the two per centum which the bill, as reported, now requires. But when the number exceeds 20,000, the reduction to be made, provided for in this bill, is twenty per centum. That, in my estimation, is entirely too small an amount. In the first place, there would be a very strong inducement to obtain the printing of a large number of documents; for, when as many as one or two hundred thousand were ordered, if a reduction of only twenty per cent. was made, the printer would make a very large sum of money. Indeed, sir, he would realize by the printing of one document, a handsome fortune.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will not take up any more of my time than is necessary.

Mr. FLORENCE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I had forgotten that I was occupying his time. I will say but one word more. I hope this alteration will be made, and when it is made, I think it will be an equitable and fair bill, as far as prices are concerned, at least such is my conviction, from the hasty examination I have been able to give it since it has been upon my desk. I desire that the bill should be amended by striking out the word "twenty" and inserting "forty."

Then, Mr. Speaker, I think another very important feature has been omitted, and that is, the present contractor has not been properly cared for in this bill.

I have in my hand an amendment, which, if in order, I would present, or offer it as an additional section to the bill, providing for the settlement of the accounts of A. Boyd Hamilton. It is as follows:

That upon the surrender of the existing contract for executing the public printing, by the present contractor, his accounts for work already done, and that necessary to be done before a printer is chosen under this act, shall be paid for at the rates provided in this act.

It is no more than justice to the public printer that such provision should be made for his relief.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania indulge me in a single remark? I wish to say that the select committee determined to have nothing to do with any public contractor, and there is a clause in this bill which embraces exactly this whole subject. It provides "that nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the cancelment of any contract now or heretofore entered into with any printer under the laws heretofore in force or to abrogate his rights in any way, without his consent."

That is caring for the public contractor, as I understand it. We have left him alone.

Mr. FLORENCE. He has been let alone. If he had been let alone before, I apprehend we would have had less difficulty upon this subject of the public printer. But because he was not let alone, because, before he fairly commenced his work, he was assailed, and suspicion attached itself to him from common rumor, that he could not execute the printing, that I ask that provision may now be made for him, and when the proper time arrives—for it is not the proper time now—as I am occupying the time of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] I will offer what I deem to be a proper proviso in the matter.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will yield the floor a few moments to the gentleman before me, [Mr. CHANDLER,] who, I know, has had experience upon this matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. Having been called upon, in the absence of the chairman of the Special Committee on Printing, to look carefully into the business, I will say that I consider there are three ways in which the House can accomplish its printing, and I presume that whatever improvement could be made upon the plan, at present we consider that the mode now adopted is exploded, and that we must abandon it. I have considered, with great care, the plan of providing a public printing office, and, though I believe that will be found, hereafter, the best, yet I believe now we are not the best prepared for it. The plan here proposed is that which I believe remains to us alone for adoption; and the details, as presented by the chairman of the committee in the bill before us, have been prepared with much care, and after consultation with practical men.

Reference has been made to the bill presented by the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses. We paid very little attention to that in our inquiries, perhaps because that gentleman, with a candor which distinguishes him on this floor, avowed himself friendly to a particular person. Though willing, I know, to do justice to all, he did, indeed, profess a kind regard to Mr. Gideon, and a due respect for the right of Mr. Hamilton, (the public printer;) but he avowed, nevertheless, a stronger attachment to Major Donelson, then of the Union newspaper, as if he would have realized the remark—"Amicus Socrates, amicus Plato, sed amicus Major veritas;" that is to say, he was a friend to Gideon, he was a friend to Hamilton, but he was a greater friend to the Major. I make the translation solely for the benefit of the reporters; of course, the House does not need it.

I call the attention of the House to what I said before upon this matter, that is, in taking the difference between the two prices of composition, care must be taken to estimate the value of the paper, and I now repeat what I before said, to illustrate: If we are to give any person $100 for printing, and reserve from that $50 for our paper, it then remains for us to say what that paper shall be. But if we allow them the $100, and authorize them to procure the paper, we shall be constantly annoyed with complaints, whether just or unjust, of the want of conformity in the paper used to the sample upon which the contract was made. There may, Mr. Speaker, be injustice in members of Congress as well as contractors—and that legislation must be regarded as best which, while it allows to the contractor a generous profit upon his labor and outlay, secures to the Government a fulfillment of its wishes without violence to the feelings, or injury to the purse of either party. Not only is this right to purchase the paper reserved to this House, but there is a provision in this bill—and I call the particular attention of this House to it—for the appointment of a superintendent of the public printing, and authorizing that superintendent to contract for the paper, and without his action not one dollar's worth of paper is ever to be purchased by this body.

No large book establishment in the country, I understand, pretends to carry on printing, without having a foreman or superintendent, especially devoted to that part of the work.

It is not necessary that I should go into a detailed plan of the prices here. They have been carefully arranged under the eye of practical men. I have only to say that the plan here proposed is as near right as any we are likely to come to, until we have tested it and found its weakness or error.

It is plain that the prices of the classes of printing are so arranged, that if a separate printer should be elected for each class, the compensation would be equal in proportion to the amount done. The House will recollect that in the contracts hitherto made, inconvenience and disappointment have resulted from a want of such an equality.

I repeat, before leaving the floor, for the use of which I have to thank the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, that the utter dislike which Congress has recently manifested to what it calls the contract system, compelled the select committee to regard that as inadmissible for the present, and hence directed their attention to other modes. A careful investigation led to the belief that whatever may be the claims upon the attention and approval of Congress of a plan to establish a Congressional or National printing office, this House is not yet prepared for the adoption of that plan. Five years hence it will present itself in a more acceptable light. The plan proposed, then, is the only one which seemed to commend itself to the committee by its general utility and its acceptability by Congress. The state of the Congressional printing, and the feeling of the Committee on Printing, suggest the necessity of immediate action; and, let me say, I cannot doubt that, should a change be made, that this Congress will, with its accustomed liberality, see that the contractor does not suffer by the change which may militate greatly against his private interest. I have no strong preference for one plan over another—for this over any on the table. Only having assisted in procuring information upon which the bill is founded, I am willing to try to remedy existing evils, and place the printing of Congress where it will be done creditably and advantageously.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will not detain the House long. I have risen with a view of making a motion. We have occupied a great deal of valuable time, during the present session, with this subject. It is too late now to justify us in consuming much more time upon it. The public printing is utterly neglected; the Patent Office Report, the President's Message, and all other documents which we ought to have received several months ago, we have not yet had. We have now before us a bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Printing. We have a substitute, or an amendment in the nature of a substitute, offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JENKINS,] and, in addition to that, we have before us the bill of the Select Committee. Now, in my opinion, we had better pass any one of these three bills rather than leave the matter in its present condition. My objection, at an early period of the session, was, that the action of the Committee on Public Printing looked only to a temporary expedient, instead of such a change in the law as I thought was necessary, and that their action was, in fact, in violation of the existing law, and wrong in principle. Since that, they have brought in a bill. They have given us their scale of prices. It seems that the scale of prices recommended by the Select Committee is not materially different from theirs. Gentlemen differ a little as to which is highest, but there is no material difference in the rates.

I submit, therefore, to the House, that we had better come to a vote upon this question. I do not care so much which of the three systems is adopted. I will vote for either one rather than let the matter rest where it is. I trust, therefore, that gentlemen will sustain the previous question, and then select one of these three propositions, though neither of them accords with my own preference as heretofore expressed in the debate. Not, however, being able to get what I wish for, I will consent to do what is the best thing now practicable.

Mr. ORR. If the gentleman [Mr. CLINGMAN] proposes to demand the previous question, I should like to make a remark or two before that is done.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. ORR. If we refer to the debates in the Congressional Globe, it will be seen that the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] the chairman of the select Committee on Printing, as well as myself, have for three years been strenuous advocates of the contract system. We have done everything in our power to have it executed. I believed when we commenced at it, that we could succeed. I have become satisfied, from the experience of the present session, that it is impracticable in consequence of the circumstances which surround us here. A contractor comes forward, enters into a contract, and is unable to perform it. When you desire to have recourse upon his sureties, for the purpose of holding them responsible for his failure of performance of his contract, they are found to be insolvent.

The public printing is delayed. We are now in the eighth or ninth month of the session. We have been here since December, and only eight copies of the first and second parts of the President's message have been delivered to the members of this House, and of the third part not a single copy. It is apparent, then, that something must be done, that some change must be made, and when the Committee on Printing made their report the other day, I objected to that report on this ground—and I think the report of the Special Committee obviates the objections I then had—that the joint committee, in fixing the scale of prices, allowed the price of the paper to go into the compensation. The difficulty growing out of that is this: Suppose the paper was worth six dollars a ream, and the work to be put upon it worth six dollars. That would make twelve dollars the Government would have to pay for the ream, the printer getting six dollars for his labor. But if the paper rose to seven dollars a ream to-morrow, the printer would only get five dollars for the same labor, and if the paper should fall to five dollars a ream, the printer for the same work would receive seven dollars. So you perceive, that under that system there would be no regular scale of prices, and that the compensation of the printer would depend upon the contingency of the price of paper. That I regard as a serious objection, for the reason that if the paper costs six dollars to-day, and seven to-morrow, the printer, getting six dollars for his work to-day, and five to-morrow, would come into Congress and say: "The work I put upon the ream of paper which cost seven dollars was as great as that put upon the paper which cost only six dollars, and I want to be compensated."

Now, I want to adopt a system, under which, when the printer makes up his bill, and they are passed by the superintendent, or by the Committee on Printing, that there shall be the end of it.

I do not desire that claims shall be presented, year after year, appealing to our sympathies and generosity for alleged losses in doing the public printing. That difficulty is obviated, it strikes me, by the bill presented by the select committee. I have not been able to look closely into the scale of prices, as it would take a good deal of time to make the estimates. There is this fact, however, which the House should take into consideration: There are not perhaps half a dozen members upon this floor who are competent to judge of the prices. I confess myself incompetent. Whether they are fair or extravagant, you have at last to depend upon the report which your committee submit, and they have to depend upon the testimony of printers submitted to them. Now, I have no doubt it is a difficult matter for them to arrive at precisely the correct prices. Printers have different ways of estimating their prices. The Select Committee, I learn, had great trouble in fixing definitely prices. Of those who submitted estimates for the various classes of work, one proposed to allow twenty-five cents per page for composition and press-work; another thirty-two cents. The one proposing to do the work for twenty-five cents says, if you go beyond twenty thousand long numbers, you should not deduct more than fifteen per cent.; whereas, the other, proposing to do the work for thirty-two cents, says you may deduct forty per cent. for all above twenty thousand.

I propose, if it is in order, to move one amendment to the bill, and with that amendment incorporated into it, I will be entirely willing to vote for the substitute. It will relieve us, I think, from all difficulty, and give a fair scale of prices to the printer, by which he will be liberally paid for all his labor and responsibility.

The superintendent proposed to be appointed by this bill will have no other duty to perform than to contract for and receive paper, and inspect the printing as it progresses. If there should be any neglect or fraud on the part of the printers, he can make his report to the Joint Committee on Printing at once, and the remedy can be applied. The Government purchases the paper, and the House is relieved from three quarters of all the difficulty growing out of this whole subject by that very thing; for when twenty or thirty thousand copies of a document are ordered to be printed by the House, the printer prints about twelve hundred and fifty copies upon good paper, the contract paper, and then prints the balance of the copies, which we send to our constituents, upon paper costing one or two dollars less per ream, relying upon the generosity of the Printing Committee not to enforce strictly his contract to furnish paper according to the specifications, for the long numbers, which may be printed for general distribution. But when the Government pays for the paper, and buys the whole of it, the printer has nothing to charge for except setting the type, doing the press-work, and the folding and stitching. It is impossible that there can be any great fraud perpetrated upon us in that way. This superintendent, if he discharges his duty, when he receives paper under the contracts which he makes, can weigh every bundle, to ascertain with certainty if it comes up to the weight stipulated in the contract. There is, therefore, no chance for the Government to be defrauded in the purchase of paper, or, if he discharges his duty, in the execution of the work. And it is stipulated further, that the superintendent shall be obliged to enter into bonds of $20,000, for the faithful performance of his duty. If he fails in the discharge of his duty, that bond is forfeited, and its penalty enforced upon him and his sureties; or if there is any fraud or collusion between the printer with the superintendent, or with any other person, he is liable to indictment, and punishment in the penitentiary of this District. The bill is as well guarded as it can be, and I think it ought to pass.

With the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] I would move an amendment to the bill. My amendment will come in after the one hundred and second line.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from South Carolina that an amendment at this time can only be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. ORR. If the amendment is not now in order, I would be glad if the Chair would suggest any way by which it could be introduced before the call for the previous question is sustained. My amendment is to strike out twenty per centum, and to insert in lieu thereof forty per centum.

Mr. HAVEN. I object to all amendments, if the previous question is to be called upon this bill.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the previous question be called, I trust the House will not sustain it. The bill needs to be perfected in a few of its details.

The SPEAKER. On inquiring of the Clerk, the Chair understands the amendment pending is only one in the first degree, and it is therefore open to amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] is a substitute for the entire bill reported by the Committee on Printing, and the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is to amend the original bill by striking out all after the first section, and it is therefore open to amendment.

Mr. ORR. I propose, then, to strike out twenty, and insert forty per centum. There is but one document to which this will apply, and that is the Patent Office report. I think that the largest number of extra copies of any document that has been ordered to be printed since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor was fifteen thousand, except the Patent Office report. I believe that there was one hundred thousand of the agricultural part of that report ordered to be printed the first session of the Thirty-first Congress, and seventy thousand of the mechanical. The number that was ordered to be printed the second session I do not remember.

Mr. HOUSTON. As the gentleman from North Carolina intends calling the previous question, I will, with his permission, call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fifth section of the bill, where it provides for the delivery of the printing to the two Houses of Congress. It occurs to me there is too much discretion—too much latitude left. There are two or three classes of printing which ought to be delivered sooner than is provided for in the bill. As the bill is now, the public printer is required to execute each job of printing within thirty days from the date of its receipt.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That same difficulty struck me, but I take it for granted the chairman of the Printing Committee will attend to that.

Mr. HOUSTON. The point is this: The fifth section provides that the public printing shall be returned to the House within thirty days after the printer has received it. It may be sent to us sooner. For instance: to-day we ordered the printing of a bill which we may require on Monday morning. In all the old contracts it was provided that if the matter to be printed did not exceed eight pages it should be upon our desks the next morning; and it seems to me important that some such provision should be made in this bill.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I will suggest the following amendment, which will cover the gentleman's objection, to come in after the word "superintendent," in the fourth line of the fifth section:

Except bills, reports, and joint resolutions, which shall be returned as the Clerk of the House and Secretary of the Senate shall require.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. That is right. I will accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. With the gentleman's permission I will say, that there is one thing in connection with this matter to which gentlemen who have occupied the floor have not alluded, but which I think should recommend this bill of the Special Committee to the favorable consideration of the House. It is a fact that may not be known to all, that the Committee on Printing employs a clerk who receives a compensation of some three or four dollars per day. His time is occupied upon this work. At the short session of Congress, when we adjourn on the fourth of March, but very little public printing will be executed, and ever since the law of 1846 went into operation the House and Senate, by joint resolution, have had to appoint a person to supervise this public printing, and to settle and adjust the accounts of the printer during the recess of Congress. The appointment of a superintendent provided for by this bill obviates that difficulty. In that particular the bill is really a matter of economy to Congress, the House, and the country.

Mr. HAVEN. If the gentleman from North Carolina has determined, whilst he has the floor, to demand the previous question, before he demands it, I ask his permission to make a brief statement.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Certainly, sir.

Mr. HAVEN. Mr. Speaker, I think I discover a determination on the part of the majority of this House, to pass the bill reported by the Special Committee, and offered as an amendment here. I do not suppose it will be of service to the public, that I should endeavor to combat that determination. The bill has been favored with the support of its friends, but those who think it impolitic, unwise, and uncalled-for, have already been admonished that the previous question is ready, and the majority have prepared to save them the trouble of endeavoring to show why it should not pass.

As one of the Committee on Printing, I wish it understood by the members here, and by all persons elsewhere taking any interest in this matter, that this bill (reported by the Special Committee) proposes to create a new office—a superintendent of the public printing, and to pay him $2,500 per year; and in addition to that, it provides for an actual increase of expenditure, and prices for printing; it proposes to pay the printer a higher price for his labor than the price fixed by the contracts made by the Committee on Printing with Gideon & Co. and with Donaldson & Armstrong, for doing the work that Mr. Hamilton should fail to perform. In some instances it increases those prices one sixth, and in no one case does it go below those prices. I am anxious to have this statement particularly understood, because the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] who has just addressed the House, and the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] by whose courtesy I now occupy the floor, as well as the gentleman from Indiana across the way, [Mr. FIRCH,] at a previous period in the session, charged, or at least very broadly intimated, on this floor, and gave the country to understand, that the members of the Committee on Printing had entered into a combination, to give to their political friends, and for political purposes, the printing, at enormous prices, regardless of what was fair, equitable, and just; and it was also strongly intimated that such combination was to break down Mr. Hamilton, he being, as alleged, an obstacle in the way of accomplishing the desired object.

Hence it is I desire the House shall understand that the proposition in favor of which they are now called upon to vote increases, and does not decrease the price and expenditure for printing. It is an increase in price on the committee's contracts.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, made some remark not heard by the Reporter.

Mr. HAVEN. This bill provides for an increase of prices above the prices agreed to be paid by the Committee on Printing, under the contracts with Gideon & Co. and Donelson & Armstrong, and for agreeing to pay which that committee was arraigned by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] somewhat berated by my friend [Mr. ORR] from South Carolina, and very strongly suspected by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FIRCH.]

Again: it is now assumed by gentlemen here that the system of printing by contract with the lowest bidder has failed and should be exploded. I deny the fact. It has never been fairly tried. I insist there is no necessity for such an assumption; the system has not failed, and I desire the House to understand that its own action has tended to discredit it. I am not of much experience in Congress, and I am not well versed in the history of this subject previous to the present session; but I do know, sir, that if there is any reason why the contract system does not in every respect meet the expectations as well as the necessities of Congress, that reason is to be found in the course adopted by the House itself, and not in the contractor, much less in the acts of the Committee on Printing. The Committee on Printing made provision more than three months ago, by which any printing of either House which was neglected or delayed by the public printer, or which he failed to perform, should be executed by responsible men—by Gideon & Co. and by Donelson & Armstrong. These gentlemen gave bond in heavy penalties, and with perfectly responsible sureties, which are now held for the Government for doing the work—for doing it well, too, and on paper weighing not less than fifty pounds to the ream, and at prices in several respects much below those proposed by this bill of the Special Committee.

I say this in justification of myself, as a member of the Committee on Printing. I speak for no one else. There are your contracts, valid and binding, and there is ample provision for remedying any neglect or delay by the public printer, at prices cheaper than you are about voting. Let the House order its printing, and direct the number of copies of each kind it desires, and instead of one establishment to do it, you have three, ready and under bonds to do it. But pass either this bill from the special committee, or that reported by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] or the substitute of my colleague from New York, [Mr. JENKINS,] in a form to suspend those contracts, and you will not only open the door to claims for damages by the present public printer, but you will make the Government liable for damages to the gentlemen who hold the contracts last made. It is true there is considerable printing ready for the press, and yet unexecuted, but it is also true that the delay is owing to the House, and not to the Printing Committee. Full three months ago, the House members of that committee made a report in reference to the printing of the mechanical part of the Patent Office report. They reported that in their judgment it was expedient to order the printing of 50,000 copies. I advised the House then, and also in March last, that so far as I was concerned or charged with any duty as one of the committee, I was determined the present system should be executed, and that the committee would be sure to provide means, full and ample, for remedying any neglect and delay by the public printer; and that this would be done at the risk even of being deemed troublesome and pertinacious by the House—that the committee would discharge their duty under the law, and then leave the responsibility with the House.

The House have neglected and refused to act upon our report to order the printing to be done, and prevented the delivery to the printers of such as has been ordered, by questioning the power of the committee to make the contract. Let the House now order its printing, and cease its opposition to the contract made by the committee, at prices below those provided by this bill—contracts perfectly valid and binding, and which, if the committee had not consummated, they would have been derelict in duty.

If these contracts are violated or repudiated by the House, and a printer is elected to take the work from the contractor, the contractor will come here and set up claims for damages, according to the prices of 1819, or some other incomprehensible system of prices that does not afford an approximate means of guessing what the printer would be entitled to. Why, about this whole subject of prices and mode of computation, the chairman of the Special Committee [Mr. MARSHALL] tells us he knows nothing, and he believes the most of that committee know nothing, and the more he looked into it the less he knew about it. [Laughter.]

I admit, now, and I have charged heretofore, that the printing which comes here from the public printer is not done upon paper of the quality called for by his contract. How is this to be remedied? We have deducted ten per cent. from his contract price, as one means of remedying it.

The bill of the special committee proposes to appoint a superintendent of public printing, and that he shall purchase and inspect the paper. If you appoint a superintendent, according to the proposition of my colleague, [Mr. JENKINS,] he will inspect the printing, and the paper together, as they come from the printer. He would then reject bad paper, and bad printing too, as he would reject bad paper under this bill from the paper maker; in either case, it all has to pass under his eye, and stand the test of his judgment. But both the paper and printing may well be inspected by, and subjected to the judgment of a superintendent, and Congress still adheres to this contract system.

It is further said the superintendent is to keep samples of the paper that the maker is to furnish, and he is to reject the paper offered if it does not conform to the sample. Why, sir, the Committee on Printing now have samples according to which the printer is to furnish paper—a superintendent can test the paper as it comes from the printer by these samples, as well as he can test it as it comes from the maker by his new samples.

The truth forces itself upon my mind that this bill from the Special Committee only tends greatly to complicate the matter; and, in my judgment, neither of these measures under consideration ought to pass.

If the House is willing to stand up to this business, as I insist the Committee on Printing have hitherto stood up to it—if it will be content with the contract made by the committee to remedy the neglect and delay—if it will order the printing done and withdraw opposition to the committee's arrangements, the work will be quickly, and well done, and below the prices fixed in this bill. From indications here, if any of these new schemes receive the sanction of Congress, one of these contractors will be chosen printer by Congress, and you will gain no other benefit by this bill but that of hiring him over again at increased prices, and trusting thereafter to the activity and resources of one man, instead of having the services of the three establishments now provided.

I insist there is no excuse, much less necessity, for abandoning or changing the present system for a new and untried experiment. The contractors engaged are ready, willing, and anxious to do the work. They are men of character and standing, and have given abundant and responsible security.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York, who is a member of the Committee on Printing, says they have made contracts with Donelson & Armstrong and Gideon & Co. to execute the printing, and that they have their bonds for their proper execution of those contracts?

Mr. HAVEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. I would inquire whether, under the conditions of these bonds, the committee are bound to give these contractors any part of the public printing, except such as it may determine Hamilton cannot do?

Mr. HAVEN. Why, of course not. As a committee, we are not authorized by the law to take from the public printer any printing, except such as we shall determine he has neglected or delayed, or is unable to perform.

Mr. JONES. Then, Mr. Speaker, I think we cannot keep two establishments waiting to execute printing on the failure of another to do so after a certain time.

Mr. HAVEN. One of the benefits of our contracts is, that we do not keep any establishment waiting, but we pay the contractor for the work he does at contract price. This very bill of the special committee, by its fifth section, allows the public printer to retain every piece of the printing for sixty days before you can take it away from him, even if, during that time, he has not commenced it; and at the end of that time we are authorized to look about us and begin to try and get somebody else to commence it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I cannot give way further to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JONES. One question further. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] if he does not consider that this House has virtually repudiated the contracts made by that committee with Donelson & Armstrong and with Gideon & Co.?

Mr. HAVEN. I do not—I think the House has not the power to rescind those contracts. That question may be more satisfactorily answered after the House passes upon the amendment which provides that no agreement hereafter made by the committee shall be binding, until after it is reported to and approved by the House. The House seemed particularly to favor that amendment, from which I infer that they desire, hereafter, to withhold from the committee a power they clearly now possess under the law, of making a contract that is binding without the sanction of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I regret the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] insists upon his right to the floor now. I would like about ten minutes more to put myself right, as one of the Committee on Printing, and explain the relative demerits of these several schemes. This subject, involving as it does not only the printing of Congress, but of all the Departments, and of the Census, and involving vast amounts, and the abandonment of a system that has never had a fair trial, ought not, in my opinion, to be disposed of in this summary way. Nobody has been heard in opposition to it.

I am of the opinion that neither of these bills or propositions ought to pass, but that the present system should be retained and vigorously executed. If it is to be abandoned, we ought, in preference to anything now before us, to take up the bill of my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. DORTY,] and perfect that, and pass it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have given the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] as much time as I can afford to give him. It is necessary that I should say a word or two in reply to him. He says that I heretofore arraigned the Committee on Printing. It is true, that I did arraign their action, (I use the term in no offensive sense), but I do not propose at this time to recur to that controversy. Nor shall I enter into the dispute which exists between him and his colleague on the Committee on Printing, [Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky,] who says that the rates in the bill of the Special Committee are lower than those of the contract which he and the Printing Committee made with the Republic and the Union. He says, on the contrary, that the prices in the bill of the Special Committee are higher than those reported by the Committee on Printing. I leave those two gentlemen, members of the same Printing Committee, to settle that matter between themselves. I take it for granted, as I before said, that there is a little difference between these two rates. Upon what ground did I arraign the committee? Why, we had a law requiring them to let the printing to the lowest bidder; and in plain violation of that law, those gentlemen came up here again and again, and reported to us that when Towers offered to do the printing for certain rates, they had agreed to give other men twenty or thirty per cent. higher, and thereby release the public printer and his sureties, and thus deprive us of any claim upon them arising out of the breach of his bond. I objected to a proceeding by which, in plain violation of the existing law, they were taking upon themselves to give this printing to these two favored establishments at a high rate. The point was not whether the prices were merely high or low. A majority of this House, by repeated votes, sustained the proposition that they had no authority to make a general arrangement for the future printing and contract with Donelson & Armstrong and Gideon & Co., and give them an advance upon the previous prices greatly beyond what responsible men were willing to do the work for. That was the point between us. Whether I am right or wrong, it is not material to inquire at this time; but that question is one which I am ready to meet whenever the resolutions of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] come up.

But I do not want to bedrown into that controversy now. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN] says that he wishes time to defend that committee. He has made several speeches during the session on the subject. The gentlemen from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] another member of the committee, has also spoken several times on it. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] has made, I think, nearly a dozen speeches in defense of the committee, and I suppose that by this time the House will understand what their conduct has been. I do not propose to repeat my charges against them. They may go for what they are worth with their replies, both being fully before the country. I do not concur with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] that you can carry out the contract system as they were proposing to do it. I beg leave to call the attention of the House to a statement of fact made to me by Mr. Rives. When we were examining the subject he informed me that the paper for the Patent Office Report would cost $50,000 if furnished according to the quality required by the contract made, but that if such paper as that upon which he prints the Globe, which looks nearly as well, were used, he said that the paper could be had for $35,000 only, and that the paper upon which they had printed our documents at the last session would not in fact cost more than $25,000; so that by this means, without cheating us to a greater extent than we had been accustomed to, the contractor would make one hundred per cent., or $25,000, on that item alone, viz: the purchase of the paper for one document. Yet, sir, I declare to you, that when I looked at the two documents separately, I scarcely perceived the difference between the two kinds of paper. Mr. Rives thus assured me that in printing the Patent Office document, which cost some $63,000, $50,000 would be necessary to buy good paper, and they might substitute such paper as we were furnished with during the last Congress at $20,000 to $25,000 only. You must remember that under the old system, as sanctioned by the Committee on Printing, the contractors had the furnishing of the paper, and thus were able to make a large sum out of it, though the rates in other respects were not high; while the public printer under this bill of the select committee can make no profit in that way; and hence, even if the rates are as high as those recommended by the Committee on Printing, when they proposed to contract with the Republic and Union, still in this respect the contract is much worse for the printer. I have said this merely in vindication of my own course upon this question, and in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman before me, [Mr. HAVEN.]

As I stated before, I take it for granted that the House ought to come to some decision upon this question. I know I have occupied too much of its time upon the question, and yet the members of the committee have heretofore consumed tenfold more time than I have, or any other member of the House. We have, I repeat, three propositions fairly before us—that which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] reported in a bill—

Mr. HAVEN. I beg leave to state to the gentleman that I disclaim having any part in that bill, or any other bills.

Mr. CLINGMAN. As he was a member of the committee which reported the bill, I supposed he had been for it, but he now informs me differently, and that he did not sanction it individually. We have also his colleague's [Mr. JENKINS] substitute before us. It may be a good bill, but I give no opinion upon it. And last of all, we have the proposition reported by the Select Committee. Had we not better, under all the circumstances, at once proceed to a vote, and select some one of these three plans? With a view of bringing the House to that line of action, I move the previous question.

Mr. KING, of New York. I hope that the previous question will not be withdrawn.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Several gentlemen have been asking me to withdraw the demand for the previous question. I must insist upon it, and let a majority of the House sustain it or not, as they see fit.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope and earnestly pray that the previous question will not be sustained, and that we may have a chance to offer such amendments as are proper to the bill.

Mr. POLK demanded tellers on the second; which were ordered; and Messrs. POLK, and FULLER of Maine, were appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 64, noes 59.

So there was a second, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. CLINGMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be put, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the motion made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] to amend the bill of the special committee by striking out the words "20," and to insert "40," in the clause providing that when the number of copies shall exceed 20,000, there shall be a reduction of twenty per centum.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I hope the Chair will state distinctly the various questions before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated the first question to be upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] to the bill reported by the Special Committee. The next question will be upon that bill as an amendment to the original bill; and if that does not prevail, the next question will be upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] for the original bill. The question is now upon the bill reported from the Special Committee by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL], as amended as an amendment to the original bill. It is as follows:

Strike out all of the original bill after the first section, and insert the following:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a Superintendent of the Public Printing, who shall hold his office for the term of two years, and who shall receive for his services a salary of $2,500 per annum; and who shall give bond with two sureties to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, in a penalty of $20,000, for the faithful discharge of his duties under this law. The said Superintendent shall be a practical printer, versed in the various branches of the arts of printing and bookbinding, and he shall not be interested directly or indirectly in any contract for printing for Congress or for any department or bureau of the Government of the United States. The first Superintendent under this law shall hold his office until the commencement of the Thirty-third Congress, and the Superintendents thereafter appointed shall hold their offices for two years, commencing with the first day of the session of each Congress.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said Superintendent to receive from the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives all matter ordered by Congress to be printed, and from the several chiefs of departments and heads of bureaus all matter ordered by them, respectively, to be printed at the public expense, and to keep a faithful account of the same, in the order in which the same shall be received, in a book or books to be by him kept for that purpose. He shall deliver said matter to the public printer or printers, in the order in which it shall be received, unless otherwise ordered by the Joint Committee on Printing. He shall inspect the work when executed by the public printer or printers, and shall record in a book or books, to be by him kept for that purpose, the dates at which the returns of said work are made, and whether the same is executed in a neat and workmanlike manner, upon the paper furnished to the public printers by said Superintendent, and the amount allowed by said Superintendent for the said printing. It shall be his duty to supervise the execution of the public printing, to inspect the work when executed, and to see that the same is done with neatness and dispatch; to report every failure or delinquency of duty on the part of the public printer, and from time to time to report the said delinquencies to the Joint Committee of Congress on Printing. He shall issue his certificate for the amount due to the public printer for such work as shall have been faithfully executed, which certificate shall be made payable to the public printer at the Treasury of the United States, and shall not be assignable or transferable by indorsement or delivery to any third party. Said certificate of the Superintendent shall be a sufficient voucher for the Comptroller to pass, and for the Treasurer, upon the order of the Second Comptroller, to pay the same.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said Superintendent of the public printing to advertise annually, in one or more newspapers of general circulation in the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, New Orleans, Louisville, and Cincinnati, for the space of sixty days prior to the first of December, for sealed proposals to furnish the Government of the United States all paper which may be necessary for the execution of the public printing, of quality and in quantity to be specified in the said advertisements from year to year. He shall open such proposals as may be made in the presence of the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, on the first Tuesday of December annually, provided a Speaker shall have been elected, or as soon thereafter as a Speaker shall be elected, and shall award the contract for furnishing all of said paper, or such class thereof as may be bid for, to the lowest bidder, whose sample, accompanying his bid, shall most nearly approximate to the quality of paper (size, weight, and texture all considered) advertised for by the said Superintendent. The sample offered with the bid accepted shall be preserved by the said Superintendent, and it shall be his duty to compare these with the paper furnished by the public contractor; and he shall not accept any paper from the contractor which does not conform to the sample preserved as aforesaid. It shall be the duty of the Superintendent of the public printing to deliver the paper for the printing of the United States, upon the requisitions of the public printer or printers, and to charge him or them therewith; and as the printing is returned and passed by the said Superintendent, he shall credit the public printer with the quantity used in the public service. It shall be the duty of said Superintendent to have the requisitions of the printer and the returns of paper by the printer balanced at least once in each year, and in default thereof to report the same to Congress for such proceedings as Congress may direct. In default of any contractor under this law to comply with his contract in furnishing the paper in proper time and of proper quality, the Superintendent is authorized to advertise for proposals, as hereinbefore provided, and award the contract to the lowest bidder; and for any increase of cost to the Government in procuring a proper supply of paper for the use of the Government, the contractor, in default and his securities, shall be charged with, and held responsible for the same, and shall be prosecuted upon their bond, by the Superintendent, in the name of the United States, in the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the public printer shall be required to execute each job of printing intrusted to him within thirty days from the date of its delivery by the Superintendent, except bills, reports, and joint resolutions, which shall be returned as the Clerk of the House or Secretary of the Senate shall require, unless, for good reasons shown, the Superintendent of printing shall extend the time. And should the printer detain any matter longer than thirty days, a deduction of five per centum shall be made by the Superintendent, from the account of the printer, for such job; and an additional deduction of five per centum for every additional detention of twenty days. If the public printer shall detain such matter for sixty days, the superintendent shall withdraw it entirely, and shall employ another printer to execute the same with promptness, upon the terms provided by law; and in such case the public printer shall not be allowed therefor.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Superintendent of the public printing shall not be, directly or indirectly, interested in the business of the public printing, or in any material to be used by the public printer, or in any contract for furnishing paper to Congress or to any department or bureau of the Government of the United States. For any violation of this provision, the Superintendent of the public printing shall forfeit his office, and may be indicted before the district court for the District of Columbia, and if found guilty, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary of the District of Columbia for any term not less than one nor more than five years, and in addition thereto may be fined in any sum from one to ten thousand dollars.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That when any document shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such document shall be done by the printer of that House which first ordered the same. And whenever the same person or the same firm shall be printer for both Houses of Congress, and both Houses shall order the same document to be printed within three weeks of the same time, composition shall be charged but once for said document; and no sum shall be paid to said printer for altering the headings from the form in which he printed them first to the form or forms in which such document shall afterwards be printed.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That there shall be elected a public printer for each House of Congress, to do the public printing for the Congress for which he or they may be chosen, and such printing for the executive departments and bureaus of the Government of the United States as may be delivered to him or them, to be printed, by the Superintendent of the public printing. The following rates of compensation shall be paid, from time to time, for such printing as may be ordered by Congress:

1. For bills and joint resolutions—

For composition per page, fifty cents.

For press-work, folding, and stitching, for five hundred and eighty copies, thirty-two and a half cents per page; and at the same rate per page for any greater number not exceeding one thousand copies.

2. For reports of committees and the Journals of both House, with indexes, and the executive documents of each House, embracing messages from the President, reports from the executive departments, bureaus, and offices, and documents and statements communicated therewith, with indexes; resolutions and other documents from State Legislatures; memorials, petitions, treaties, and confidential documents for the Senate; for composition per page, octavo—

For small pica plain, one dollar.

For small pica rule, one dollar and fifty cents.

For brevier plain, one dollar and fifty cents.

For brevier rule, two dollars.

For nonpareil rule, three dollars and seventy-five cents.

For the composition of tables larger than octavo size, per one thousand ems, seventy cents; but the page of octavo size shall contain not less than one thousand six hundred ems when printed in small pica; and the body of all plain matter shall be so printed, except extracts, yeas and nays, and addenda, which shall be printed with brevier type. All rule and figure work shall be printed in royal octavo form, with small pica, each page containing not less than one thousand six hundred ems, if the matter to be printed can be brought into pages of that size with that kind of type, so as to be read with facility and convenience. If it cannot, it shall be printed with brevier type, each page containing not less than two thousand eight hundred ems; and if it cannot be brought into a royal octavo page with brevier type, so as to be understood with facility, it shall be printed with nonpareil type, each page containing not less than four thousand two hundred ems; and when it cannot be brought into a royal octavo page with nonpareil type, so as to be read with facility, it shall be printed with brevier type in a broadside, showing the whole table at one view, and be so filled that it can be bound in a royal octavo volume.

When matter is headed, the composition shall be counted as if the matter were printed solid, and not headed.

For press-work, folding, and stitching of royal octavo size—

For twelve hundred and fifty copies, thirty-two and a half cents per page, and at the same rate for any greater number not exceeding fifteen hundred copies.

For press-work, folding, and stitching of each table larger than royal octavo size—

For twelve hundred and fifty copies one dollar and twenty-five cents per page, and at the same rate for any number not exceeding fifteen hundred copies.

The following deductions on account of folding and stitching copies reserved for binding shall be made:

For royal octavo size, per page, for each hundred copies, one quarter of a cent; for each table larger than octavo, one quarter of a cent; and the following additional charge shall be allowed for trimming, folding, and stitching, and inserting each map, chart, diagram or plat in the copies not reserved for binding: for every hundred copies, ten cents.

There shall be allowed for the press-work on treaties, reports, and other documents, when ordered to be printed in confidence, for the use of the Senate, at the following rates:

For the press-work, folding, and stitching of sixty-five copies, six cents per page when of the royal octavo size, and one dollar per page, for sixty-five copies, when the matter cannot be contained in the royal octavo page in any type hereinbefore specified, and allowance shall be made at the same rates for any greater number of copies than sixty-five, and not exceeding one hundred.

3. For tabular statements of the orders of the day, lists of yeas and nays, circular letters, and miscellaneous printing ordered by Congress, not hereinbefore specified—

For composition for plain work, per thousand ems, fifty cents.

For rule and figure work, fifty cents per thousand ems.

For press-work, folding, and stitching one hundred copies, per page—

For royal octavo, or any smaller size, ten cents.

For quarto post, twenty cents.

For foolscap and any larger size, twenty cents.

But the following deductions shall be made from the press-work, folding, and stitching additional numbers to the number usually ordered by Congress of matter included in the foregoing specifications, to wit:

When the number ordered exceeds five thousand and does not exceed ten thousand, two per centum.

When the number exceeds ten thousand, and does not exceed twenty thousand, five per centum.

When the number exceeds twenty thousand, forty per centum.

Press-work, folding, and stitching of all printing not herein provided for shall be done by the ream; the rate shall be two dollars per one thousand when printed on one side, and four dollars per thousand when printed on both sides; when any quantity less than a ream is ordered it shall be counted and settled for as one ream.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the regular numbers of documents ordered by Congress shall be printed in octavo form, on paper weighing not less than fifty-six pounds for every four hundred and eighty sheets, and measuring twenty-four by thirty-eight inches; and the extra numbers shall be printed on paper weighing not less than forty-five pounds for every four hundred and eighty sheets, and measuring twenty-four by thirty-eight inches. The paper for any other species of printing ordered by Congress may be of such style and quality as the Superintendent of the public printing may deem suitable and proper.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the public printer or printers may be required by the superintendent to work at night as well as through the day upon the public printing, during the session of Congress, when the exigencies of the public service require it.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the same prices shall be paid for printing for the Executive Departments that are paid for printing for Congress, except for printing post bills, which shall be printed on paper not less than sixteen by twenty-six inches, and for printing on parchment; there shall be paid for printing the post bills at the rate of one dollar per thousand sheets, and at the rate of ten dollars per thousand for printing parchments; but nothing shall be allowed for altering post bills when the alteration consists in the mere change of a postmaster's name; and nothing herein contained shall prevent the heads of Executive Departments from employing printers out of the city of Washington to execute such printing for any of said departments as may be required for use out of Washington, when the same can be executed elsewhere as cheap as at the rates herein specified, increased by the cost of transporting the printed matter to the State or States where such matter may be required for use in the public service.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That a committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be appointed by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House, to be called the Joint Committee on the Public Printing, which committee shall have a right to decide between the Superintendent of the public printing and the public printer in any dispute which may arise as to the propriety of the decisions of the Superintendent making deductions on account of work which the Superintendent may refuse to receive, or which, in his opinion, may not be done with proper dispatch, as required by law; and the said committee shall pass upon the accounts of the Superintendent of the public printing. Said committee shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay in the execution of the public printing, provided that no contract, agreement, or arrangement entered into by this committee shall take effect until the same shall have been approved by that House of Congress to which the printing belongs; and when the printing delayed relates to the business of both Houses, until both Houses shall have approved of such contract or arrangement. All motions to print extra copies of any bill, report, or other public document, shall be referred to the members of the Committee on Printing from the House in which the same may be made.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That all acts or joint resolutions conflicting with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the cancellation of any contract now or heretofore entered into with any printer under the laws heretofore in force, or to abrogate his rights in any way, without his consent. Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the printing of the census, but the same shall be done as may be provided by law hereafter.

Mr. CLEVELAND demanded tellers on the adoption of this amendment; which were ordered, and Messrs. CLEVELAND and ORR were appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 99; noes not counted.

So Mr. MARSHALL's amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the substitute offered by Mr. JENKINS.

Mr. KING, of New York, demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall immediately be chosen, by joint resolution in both Houses of Congress, a superintendent of public printing, who shall be a practical printer, and shall hold his office during the present Congress, or until another be appointed in his place; said superintendent is hereby clothed with all the authority conferred in and by said joint resolution upon the Secretary of the Senate, Clerk of the House of Representatives, the President or Vice President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the authority conferred upon the Committee on Printing in and by the second section of said joint resolution, and he is hereby required to perform all the duties conferred by said joint resolution upon said officers, and each and every of them, except the duties of the Committee on Public Printing mentioned in the third section of said joint resolution.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Superintendent, when so appointed, shall take the oath of office prescribed in the second section of the act of the 3d of March, 1791, for the clerks and other officers, and shall execute to the United States a bond, with two sufficient sureties, to be approved of by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the penalty of ten thousand dollars, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of his office. The said Superintendent shall thereupon procure the printing necessary to be done before the close of the present session of Congress, or which may have been begun but not performed substantially, according to contract, upon such terms as he may deem most advisable, and as shall best promote the public interest; and, for that purpose, the said Superintendent is hereby authorized to purchase the requisite paper for said printing.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said Superintendent be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract for and purchase all paper for the printing of both Houses of Congress during his continuance in office. That contracts for paper shall, at all times, be separate from contracts for printing, and the same person shall not be allowed to contract both for printing and furnishing the paper. The contracts for printing to be done, and paper to be furnished, after the close of the present session of Congress, shall be let and entered into in the manner prescribed in the first section of said joint resolution, and shall embrace the paper and printing for the residue of the present Congress only.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That said Superintendent be, and he is hereby, authorized to decide upon the performance or non-performance of all of said contracts, and whether the contracts be performed in due time, and to declare the same forfeited for non-performance. The contracts to be entered into for printing shall contain a stipulation that the printing shall be done in a reasonable time, which time may be designated, as occasion shall require, by the said Superintendent, which conditions shall be inserted in each contract. Upon declaring any contract forfeited for non-performance, the Superintendent shall serve a written notice thereof upon the defaulting contractor, specifying the particulars in which such failure of performance consists; and the Superintendent shall thereupon immediately proceed to relet such contract, in the manner provided in the said first section of said joint resolution as herein amended; but he shall not relet such contract to such defaulting contractor. Said Superintendent shall forthwith cause the contractor so failing to perform his contract, and his bail, to be prosecuted, in the name of the United States, for the damages arising from such failure.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said Superintendent shall personally superintend the business intrusted to his charge; he shall keep the samples of paper and printing upon which the contracts are let; he shall keep an accurate account of the paper furnished and the printing done, with the contract prices thereof, and all expenses pertaining to the said office; he shall make a full report of his doings at the opening of each session of Congress, and as often as Congress or either House shall direct, and shall be entitled to receive a salary of $2,000 a year for his services.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That within thirty days before the adjournment of any Congress, both Houses shall proceed to choose a Superintendent of public printing, who shall possess the powers herein conferred upon the said superintendent, and shall perform the like duties; said Superintendent shall be entitled to the like salary, and shall hold his office for the period of two years and until another be chosen; he shall take the same oath of office, and execute a like bond with sureties; and all the provisions of this act and of said joint resolution shall apply to all Superintendents of public printing, and the paper to be furnished and the printing to be done. So much of the said joint resolution of the 3d of August, 1846, as is inconsistent herewith, is hereby repealed.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abernethy, Babcock, Barrere, Bennett, Brenton, Briggs, Burrows, Carter, Chapman, Cleveland, Cobb, Dockery, Doty, Eastman, Evans, Fitch, Floyd, Fowler, Grey, Harper, Hays, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Horsford, John W. So the substitute was rejected.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, was read the third time.

Mr. POLK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The question now being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. CLINGMAN moved the previous question, which was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. HAVEN demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. CARTTER called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HAVEN and GAYLORD were appointed; and a count being had, the tellers reported 37 in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken upon the passage of the bill, and it was decided in the affirmative; yeas 91, nays 56; as follows:

IN SENATE.

Monday, August 2, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, dated the 31st ultimo, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 29th ultimo, in which the Secretary states: First, that, by a letter of instructions to Mr. James Collier, as collector at San Francisco, dated April 3, 1849, he was appointed the depository of the public moneys at San Francisco, under the provisions of the act of the 6th of August, 1846; but it does not appear that he ever acted as depository, or had any moneys placed in his hands as such; and no special depository has been appointed at any other point on the Pacific coast.

Second, that the fifteenth section of the act of 6th August, 1846, alluded to, authorizes the depositaries to receive to the credit of the Treasury of the United States, any moneys due and payable to the Treasury of the United States which may be tendered to them; but no returns were ever made by Mr. Collier, as public depository. T. Butler King, the collector of San Francisco, was subsequently, on the 10th of May, 1851, appointed depository at that port, and has had deposited with him in that capacity, agreeably to his official report, the sum of $870,597 54—the whole of which was deposited by him, as collector, to the credit of the Treasury of the United States, except the sum of $20 71. These returns included the quarter ending March 30, 1852.

Third, that the returns of money in the hands of the depository at San Francisco, first appeared in the Treasurer's monthly statement for the week ending November 24, 1851, which statement was published on the first of December following; and it was the first publication which announced in that mode, that a public depository had been established at San Francisco.

Fourth, that the amount on deposit could not have been given at any earlier period, because the first return on which the account was opened on the Treasury books, was dated San Francisco, 14th October, 1851, and was only received in time for the above publication.

Fifth, that, on the 3d of April, 1849, James Collier gave a bond as public depository, under the act of August, 1846, in the sum of $50,000, and that T. Butler King gave a bond, on the 30th of June, 1851, under the same act, in the sum of $100,000. It is only collectors and receivers who, by the construction of this act, can be made depositaries.

Mr. WELLER. I move that the report be laid on the table, and be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. SEWARD presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the directors of the Sodus Point and Southern Railroad Company, held at Newark, New York, in favor of an appropriation for the further improvement of the harbor at the mouth of Great Sodus Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the memorial of John Gray, interested as owner in the fishing-schooner Mary of Brooksville, praying to be allowed fishing bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of Wyer G. Sargent, owner of the fishing-schooners Two Brothers and Olive Branch, praying to be allowed fishing bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FELCH presented the petition of Robert Johnston, praying that patents may be issued for certain land warrants in his possession, and procured by him in the names of the parties who were entitled to receive them, but who cannot now be found; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, praying the construction of a ship-canal around the Falls of the river St. Mary; which was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. STOCKTON presented the petition of E. A. Williams and William D. Ligon, praying to be relieved from their liability as sureties on the official bond of Purser William H. Kennon, of the United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THE MEXICAN BOUNDARY QUESTION.

Mr. WELLER submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report made by Lieutenant Colonel Graham, of the Topographical Corps of Engineers, on the subject of the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, together with all the papers in his Department on that subject.

SUPPRESSION OF SMALL NOTES.

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of the 7th of July, 1838, for the suppression of small notes within the District of Columbia, as, in addition to the provisions of said act, to authorize justices of the peace for the county of Washington to hear and decide in cases brought before them, by any informant, of infractions of said law; and in case of its violation by a city corporation, to authorize the fines thereof to be levied and collected of the mayor thereof.

INTEREST OF PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. BORLAND submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the names of the several agents employed by the Department other than officers of the United States, for the payment of interest on the public debt and pensions since the 4th of March, 1849, together with a statement of the last settled accounts of each of such agents, with date thereof, showing the amount due to or from the United States.

Resolved further, That the said Secretary report what length of time unclaimed dividends of interest are allowed to remain in the hands of agents, after the same are due and payable, and how often said agents are required to render their accounts, and what security, if any, is required for the faithful performance of the trusts confided to them.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE LAWS AND DEBATES OF CONGRESS.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I rise to what I conceive to be a privileged question. I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the joint resolution from the House of Representatives, entitled "A joint resolution for the distribution of the laws of Congress and the debates thereon," which provides for the transmission of the Congressional Globe and Appendix through the mails, free of postage, was passed. I think, perhaps, that resolution ought to be amended a little. At any rate, I, as well as some other gentlemen, wish to have a little time to examine it. I move to reconsider that vote, and also that that motion lie on the table. I should prefer to have the consideration of the motion to reconsider passed over until I can look into the subject a little further.

Mr. BADGER. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania will find himself rather in a difficulty in pursuing that course. He had better withdraw the motion that the motion to reconsider lie on the table for this reason: Suppose the Senate agree to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; then, if it is desired to amend the resolution, the question will have to be taken, on reconsidering the vote by which it was ordered to a third reading. If, then, the motion to reconsider lie on the table, and is taken up at a future day if agreed to, it will be more than two days after the resolution was ordered to a third reading; and then, unless by unanimous consent, the motion to reconsider that vote cannot be made. It will be better to dispose of this motion to reconsider, at once, because, unless the motion to reconsider the vote by which it was ordered to a third reading be agreed to, the resolution cannot be amended.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table, and hope the vote will be taken on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. WALKER. I should like to hear some reason given by the Senator, why we should reconsider the vote. The matter was spoken of pretty freely on Friday, and it seemed to be a very fair decision of the Senate that they would pass the resolution which would permit the Congressional Globe and Appendix, containing the laws and debates of Congress, to pass through the mails free of postage. Now, here is a motion to reconsider the vote, without any reason, being given except a desire, on the part of the Senator, to defeat it ultimately. This, then, I take to be a test question, and I hope, if the vote is to be taken upon the reconsideration, it will be deemed a test question by the Senate.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. President, if I understand the purport of this resolution correctly, the editor of the Congressional Globe and Appendix can append as many advertisements to it as he pleases. That is one reason for reconsidering the vote. Another is this: we have already the right to transmit the Congressional Globe and Appendix through the mails free of postage. Each member of the Senate receives some twelve or fifteen copies, and we have a right to transmit those copies through the mails free of postage. This is going beyond that, and confers an extraordinary privilege which I think ought not to be granted. I am opposed to it on that ground.

Mr. WALKER. I suppose we knew that the Senator was thus opposed to the resolution at the time we adopted it. One of the objections which he makes is, that the editor, or publisher, of this work can append to it as many advertisements as he pleases, and transmit those advertisements with the Globe and Appendix through the mails free of postage. If I understand the reading of the resolution it is, that the Globe and Appendix, containing the laws and debates, shall be transmitted; but I apprehend the editor would find himself charged postage upon advertisements if he undertook to insert them. But suppose we, as members of Congress, can send through the mails, free of postage, those numbers which we receive, how is it with the heads of the Departments? How is it with the departments of the States? They have to bear an enormous postage, if the States avail themselves of this work. If others, who are disposed to keep it as a useful work in their libraries through the country, for the information of the public, get it through the mails, they have to pay an enormous sum for postage. This publication does not fall within the class of "newspapers," nor that of "periodicals;" it, therefore, cannot go on the terms of such works, but, as I understand it, it passes through the mails at the charge of so much per ounce. Take, for instance, the Globe and Appendix of the last long session, which were four large volumes, I believe the postage on them was some $23. You can ordinarily buy the work itself for $6, though I believe those four volumes cost more than that; but, at all events, the postage is some four or five times the cost of the work itself.

I believe that there have been some petitions introduced this session praying Congress to take some efficient steps to disseminate through the country, the laws of Congress and the debates thereon. I know I received a long and very sensible letter from a gentleman in connection with a literary institution in New York, requesting that I should introduce a proposition that there should be sent to the literary institutions of the different States, various copies of this very work, and that it should be sent free of postage. Now, we are proposing to do what there seems to be an interest in the community in favor of our doing. For one, I am in favor of the Globe and Appendix going free of postage. I believe it is more in favor of popular rights than any proposition that has come up here. That we have the franking privilege is not a compensation to the people. It is not such a right as they wish to avail themselves of to obtain this work, and the whole series of it, to place in their colleges, academies, schools, and various departments of the State governments. We can furnish no such facilities to the people as this. But they will subscribe for the work when it does not cost four or five times the original cost for postage. I do hope, as I said before, that this question may be deemed a test question, and the vote as a final one; and for the purpose of making it as much so as lies in my power, I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not propose to discuss this question, because I believe it underwent a discussion satisfactory to the Senate on Friday. I think at least, the reasons for and against it were very well stated. I now rise only for the purpose of saying that the objection which the Senator from Pennsylvania has urged can, under the very terms of the joint resolution, have no existence here. Advertisements cannot be incorporated in the laws and debates of Congress, and that is the description of publication to go free of postage. The Post Office has decided that this publication is not a newspaper. It is the authenticated and accredited debates of this and the other branch of Congress, made in pursuance of an appropriation of the very money which we pay out for them. Now, shall we circumscribe the limits within which they shall be spread before the country? That is the object, and the whole object of the joint resolution, and if it shall pass as it now is, it will protect it from any such objection as the Senator from Pennsylvania has supposed.

Mr. BORLAND. I regret very much to feel constrained to differ with my honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] upon this question, as I very rarely do differ with him on any question. I think, however, that he is mistaken in the view he has taken with regard to this subject. It will be out of the power of the publisher of the Congressional Globe, for the reasons stated by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN], and the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. WALKER], to put advertisements into that paper, and also for other reasons. That paper has been published many years, and such a thing as the insertion of advertisements has never been attempted, and the proviso to the resolution expressly excludes the Daily Globe from being sent through the mails free of postage.

But I would go even further than this resolution goes. I would, if it depended on my vote, strike out the proviso excluding the Daily Globe from being sent free of postage, because it would circulate through the country far and wide the proceedings of both Houses of Congress immediately upon their occurrence. The representatives of the people and the States would then, on the very day, or the next after their transactions have been recorded, have the power of communicating them to their constituents. Their intercourse would be direct and immediate, and their responsibility perfect beyond anything that has ever been attained in the administration of this department of the Government. I hope, therefore, that no objection will be urged.

Mr. BRODHEAD. This is a joint resolution providing for the distribution of the laws of Congress, and the debates thereon. Now, who looks into the Congressional Globe and Appendix for the laws of Congress? The laws of Congress have never been printed in that publication yet. Why speak about circulating the laws in the Congressional Globe and Appendix? The people do not look into them for the laws; they rather look into Little & Brown's edition for that purpose. Besides, the debates in Congress are published in other papers than the Congressional Globe and Appendix, and why is it that you propose to give the publisher of the Congressional Globe and Appendix the privilege of sending them through the mails free of postage, when you deny the same privilege to the publishers of other papers containing the debates? I can see no reason why this privilege should be extended to the Congressional Globe and Appendix, and denied to other papers published in the city of Washington.

I am willing to put this publication on the footing of newspapers. People throughout the country, subscribing for newspapers, are obliged to pay postage on them; and why should not the Congressional Globe and Appendix be put on the same footing as newspapers? I am willing to vote for such a proposition, but beyond that I am not willing to go; nor am I willing to vote for this joint resolution extending a special privilege.

Mr. ADAMS. I was not present at the discussion of this subject, and have not, therefore, had the benefit of the opinions expressed by Senators; but it would require very little time for me to make up my mind on the subject.

The joint resolution is intended in reality for the extension of the franking privilege. Before I give my vote in favor of such an extension, I must receive a little more light than I have at present. Instead of extending the franking privilege, if it depended on my vote, I would abolish it, and place members of Congress on the same footing as other citizens of the United States in that respect. I repeat that the joint resolution is intended for the extension of the franking privilege—nothing more and nothing less. Perhaps, as it is said, that extension will be for the benefit of the country; but I shall not argue the question now. It is not my intention to procrastinate the discussion, for I merely rose to say that I would rather vote in favor of curtailing than extending that privilege. I hope to see the day when it will be abolished entirely, and that members of Congress may be compelled, as other citizens are, to pay postage on all documents, excepting those which are addressed to them on public business. The privilege should not go beyond that.

Mr. BAYARD. No one more freely admits the general accuracy of this publication than I do. But I shall vote for the reconsideration of the resolution, as I voted against the resolution on a previous day. This is a private enterprise, for the publication of which the Government of the United States pays. The resolution proposes that Congress shall undertake to permit the circulation of this publication through the mails, without any consideration of any kind. We are asked to send through the mails, free of postage, this publication, on the ground that it disseminates information. I would ask Senators whether, because you purchase Little & Brown's publication of the laws of Congress, you will on that ground send them through the mails free of postage, independently of the numbers which you purchase for distribution or for governmental purposes? I contend that we should not. On what principle can you refuse the same privilege to other papers, of a different character? This may be an important publication. So may thousands of others. You distribute agricultural books, published by authority of Congress, by franking them. But, suppose an individual chose to reprint your agricultural reports—for you foster certain works by purchasing a number of them—and should come here and ask you to send them through the mails free of postage; surely you would refuse to do it. I cannot conceive why you should give a gratuity to a private individual, without the remotest consideration. I shall therefore vote for the reconsideration.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] tells you that you cannot incorporate advertisements with this work, and that no evil of that kind can grow out of its being sent free of postage. If this publication is periodical, that is, if it is first published in numbers, there is nothing in the resolution which will prevent the sending of advertisements in sheets, in the form of wrappers upon the papers themselves. Nothing in the resolution could prevent the sending of advertisements in that form; and though the publication might remain the same, the object of advertising might be accomplished, through it, and tend greatly to the profits and emoluments of the proprietor.

Again, we have been told by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] that the postage on this newspaper is enormous, and that it cannot pass through the post office as a newspaper. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] gives an answer to that when he says that it may be sent as a newspaper, either in numbers, or bound, if you will, paying the same postage which newspapers pay. You can, therefore, put it on that footing, because I think it should pass as a newspaper if sent in numbers. I do not, however, see on what principle Congress can possibly grant a gratuity to the publishers of this newspaper, excellent though I admit it to be, which tends simply to have the effect of making a payment in advance by them. If you concede this privilege to this publication, you cannot refuse it to others in which the laws of Congress happen to be printed. Other publishers will ask the same privilege on the ground that they are disseminating information among the people; and I do not know but that the laws of Congress will be disseminated in a better form in that mode.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to say a word in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania. By the words of the resolution, it is provided that the laws of the United States, and the debates thereon, shall be transmitted through the mails free of postage. The resolution has no reference to what has been done heretofore. It refers exclusively to what is to be done, and under that provision the laws are to be connected and published with the debates to which their consideration gives rise.

Mr. BUTLER. Those gentlemen who have given attention to this subject, can, perhaps, state whether there is any limitation as to the quantity of these books to be transmitted through the mails. It is said this publication does not come within the class of newspapers or periodicals usually circulated as newspapers; and that therefore it ought not to be subject to the present postage laws. If that is so, it must be regarded as a law book, like any other law book; and what would prevent the publishers of this book from sending off large quantities to New York, or Philadelphia, or Charleston, and advertising them for sale as books are advertised in bookstores? While, then, we are disseminating, as we suppose, useful information to the people, I think it is an indirect mode of giving one set of booksellers an advantage over others. In other words, the resolution is a mode of giving this book a preference over all others. The only security that I know of to prevent the Treasury from being taxed for its dissemination is, that the people are not inclined to read newspapers containing these debates. If there is any one thing that I have learned with regard to the habits of the people in this respect, it is that they are very indifferent as to the proceedings of Congress, and, as I think, for a good reason—a reason which I have formerly stated.

Mr. BAYARD. I give to the joint resolution a different construction from that of the Senator from Maine. It provides for the free circulation of a specific publication of known character. It provides that "the Congressional Globe and Appendix, which contain the laws and the debates thereon"—and everybody knows they contain them—"shall pass free through the mails, so long as the same shall be published by order of Congress." I say there is nothing whatever in this resolution preventing the attaching to each number of the Congressional Globe of one or two sheets of advertisements outside. That would not alter the character of the publication; nor would it be excluded under the terms of the resolution. But from the very proviso which excludes the Daily Globe, it would be implied that there was no other exclusion than that expressed in the resolution. I submit to the Senate, beyond all question, that under this resolution, there is nothing in regard to this publication to prevent what is done in England and this country universally as to all magazines. You will find in them some five, six, eight, or ten pages of advertisements attached to the cover of the book; but that does not alter its character, or render it liable to any other or different charge from what would otherwise be imposed upon it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I understand that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania moved a reconsideration of the vote by which this joint resolution was passed, on the ground, among others, that the publisher of this paper may, at any time he sees proper, append advertisements to what is known as the Congressional Globe—that he may abuse the privilege that we confer upon him by adopting that mode. Now, I undertake to say that if he should adopt that course, Congress will have the power of refusing to publish its debates and proceedings in that paper; and would, as a matter of course, use that power.

We profess to have in view cheap information, and the dissemination of it among the people generally; and I ask how can it be done more effectually and more practically than by the general distribution of the Congressional Globe and Appendix? In no way, to my mind, in as cheap a form.

The Senator from Pennsylvania is mistaken when he says that the Congressional Globe does not contain the laws. It does contain the laws, and in their most interesting form. It contains them as early as they are introduced, with the amendments moved, and the comments of members and Senators upon them. It contains the laws, the debates, and the votes upon the laws, in a shape that enables people to understand them. And if we desire to give the people early information, and to give it to them in a shape in which it can be understood, we can do it in no other way, in my judgment, so readily as is proposed through the medium of this publication.

The postage charged upon this work is more than the price of the work itself, and that necessarily prevents hundreds and thousands of persons from subscribing to it.

Mr. BRODHEAD. At this point of the gentleman's remarks I would like to make an inquiry. I would like to know whether the proprietor of this paper cannot now send it through the mails in numbers to subscribers? Do not subscribers now receive it, paying no more than newspaper postage?

Mr. BRIGHT. I will reply to the gentleman's question by stating what is my understanding of the matter. I understand that the paper on which the work is printed is of a weight requiring the payment of a large amount of extra postage. While the paper costs three dollars a year, I understand that the extra postage is over four dollars a year; that is, the extra postage is greater than the amount charged by the proprietor for the paper. Besides, this is not a political paper. I ask the gentleman to turn to a number of it, containing an advertisement, a political allusion, or anything that is not germane to the proceedings of Congress. He cannot do it. It is a correct, succinct, straightforward statement of the proceedings of each House every day. I voted, on Friday last, to relieve it of this tax, believing that I was benefiting the mass of the people, and not the proprietor. For that reason I shall vote against the reconsideration.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] has stated that he has called for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider, in order to make the vote on that question a test vote. So far as I am concerned, I shall not vote upon it as a test question. I am strongly inclined to the opinion that some measure of relief is proper with respect to the Congress-sional Globe and Appendix. Indeed, I think that is very clear. But suggestions have been thrown out, which are entitled to very great weight and consideration, whether this joint resolution proposes the proper measure of relief; and even if the measure of relief is in itself proper, whether some safeguards are not necessary to be appended to the resolution to guard against any abuse. This is, therefore, I think, a very clear and proper case for a reconsideration, in order to bring the subject again within the power of the Senate. In voting for the reconsideration, I express no disposition to vote against some proper measure of relief for the Congressional Globe and Appendix.

The question being taken, by yeas and nays, on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, resulted—yeas 18, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Brodhead, Butler, Chase, Clarke, Davis, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Hunter, King, Miller, Soule, Spruance, Toucey, and Underwood—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Borland, Bright, Brooke, Cass, Charlton, Clemons, Dawson, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Felch, Foot, Gwin, Hamlin, Houston, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Meriwether, Morton, Norris, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Sumner, Upham, Wade, Walker, and Welton—28.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone the prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill "making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30th, 1853." I understand that the House have agreed to our amendment to the resolution for adjournment, thus fixing the day for the 31st of this month. That being the case, I think we ought to go on with the appropriation bills.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion until the river and harbor bill, which lies on the table, can be taken up, read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce. It is a bill which will require some time for that committee to consider it, and I hope it will now be taken up and referred.

Mr. HUNTER. If it could be referred at once, I should make no objection; but I think it will give rise to debate.

Mr. DAVIS. I think there will be no debate now.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think there will be no debate on the simple question of reference.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to postpone the prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senator from Virginia will allow me to submit a motion to take up the river and harbor bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I must insist on the question being taken on my motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I hope the Senate will vote down the motion, for the purpose of taking up the river and harbor bill.

The motion to take up the Indian appropriation bill was not agreed to, there being, on a division—aye 18, noes 20.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move now to postpone the prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill of the House of Representatives, "making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers."

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time by its title.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have an amendment, in the form of an additional section, which I propose to offer when the bill comes up. I ask leave now to lay it on the table informally, in order that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT. If such is the pleasure of the Senate, it will be received informally, and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection. The motion to refer was agreed to.

TEXAN DEBT.

Mr. TOUCEY. I ask that the motion to reconsider the vote referring the memorial of James Hamilton, for himself and others, to a select committee, be now taken up.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the motion to reconsider the said vote.

Mr. TOUCEY. Mr. President, at the request of a Senator—a member of the Committee on Finance—I have submitted a motion for the reconsideration of the vote referring the memorial of James Hamilton to a select committee. I moved to refer the memorial to a select committee, on the ground that it was an isolated proposition. I was aware that there were petitions praying that Congress would assume the debts of Texas, and perhaps one or two of a different character, which have been referred to the Committee on Finance. But this proposition is merely that Congress shall modify the proviso in the boundary act, so that those creditors of the State of Texas who are willing to receive their debts and discharge them, may have an opportunity to do so without being dependent upon one other, or any number of other creditors who may be unwilling to do so. It struck me that this was a proposition by itself, which it was proper should be referred to a select committee. But, at the request of a Senator, I have submitted a motion to reconsider the vote referring it to a select committee.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I understand the distinct proposition now is to refer this memorial to a select committee. I shall vote for that reference; but it is proper that I should say here that I have learned from sources to be relied on, that the Committee on Finance, or some of the members of that committee, have supposed that General Hamilton, in making this application, either intended some disrespect to that committee as a committee, or violated what they regard as parliamentary decorum. I can assure every member of that committee that General Hamilton had not the most distant idea of violating parliamentary courtesy, or of showing any personal disrespect to the members of that committee.

General Hamilton represents constituents who claim about $2,000,000; and I believe that, in the course he has taken, he has consulted entirely the dictates of duty. I believe it has been his object to reach, under the dictates of his duty, the justice of the case as far as his constituents are concerned.

Sir, I do not see why the Committee on Finance should claim, as a matter of right, jurisdiction over this subject. If General Hamilton supposed for a moment that they were to decide against him by a foregone conclusion, he would not consult his duty to his constituents if he were not to have his memorial referred to a committee that would give him a hearing. I do not know how that is; but I rose merely to assure the Committee on Finance that it was not his purpose in any way to violate any of the usages of this body, or to show any disrespect to that committee. But he was bound, under the highest obligations of duty, to place this matter in a situation where he could have justice done according to his views.

I am not going now to debate the question whether the creditors of Texas, who ask the favor of receiving their money and being dismissed, are to be controlled by those who say, "You shall not receive your money, and shall not be dismissed." Why, sir, if they are to be placed in that situation, it is high time that General Hamilton should seek another committee. He stands in that way before the community, endeavoring to have justice done to his constituents, according to the judgment of Texas, and their own views in accepting the money, which is provided for them, and which is in the Treasury.

I presume that a select committee would be quite as impartial as the Finance Committee. I have no imputations to make upon any committee; but the question which General Hamilton has raised is altogether a new question. The matters they have before the Committee on Finance, I believe, do not touch the specific question which he puts. All that he can say is in the spirit of that interrogatory—"Doth our law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth?" He wishes to have a committee that will hear him. It seems to me that this is a modest request. I may have occasion to say something hereafter in regard to the matter, but I say now, in the utmost fairness to all concerned, that it is very desirable that this should be disposed of, not as a political question, not as a mere money question; but it should be disposed of according to those rules which should regulate a court of justice.

Mr. President, as long as the grant of $10,000,000 to Texas assumed a political aspect and complexion, you know what were my opinions upon it, and my relations to it. I do not hesitate now to say that I believe it was the fulcrum upon which the lever of the compromise rested. I do not hesitate to say that I opposed it because I believed it was a most efficient means of bringing about that compromise—a compromise that will be violated as soon as there is a temptation to the strong to do it. But that is out of the question now, and therefore it is that I look upon this matter with a view to right and justice as far as regards a distribution of the money which was appropriated for the benefit of the creditors. General Hamilton has asked this favor, and I think it reasonable. I may not understand what are the views of the Committee on Finance, and I ought not to anticipate them; but I wish to hear if any objection can be made to referring the matter to a select committee, or whether it can be asserted that the Finance Committee has any prior right to jurisdiction over the subject.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. President, I desire to correct the honorable Senator from South Carolina in one particular, and that is in reference to the question which, among others, has been submitted to the Committee on Finance. There are memorials before that committee directing their attention to the very question presented by the memorial of General Hamilton. Numerous memorials have been presented during the session in regard to this complicated subject, all of which have been referred to the Committee on Finance, one of the regular committees of this body. That committee have been engaged, during the last three or four months, every week, more or less, in examining those memorials. They have decided, by a regular vote, upon the very question presented by the memorial of General Hamilton, and that is as to the propriety of repealing the proviso of the boundary act, which retains $5,000,000 of the debt of Texas in the Treasury. The committee were, four to one, of the opinion that the prayer ought not to be granted; and the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] was directed to prepare a report in accordance with this decision, and to report a bill declaring what the committee were in favor of.

Now, sir, I submit to the Senate whether it is right—whether it is proper to take the business from a regular standing committee of the body, after they have agreed upon a report, and before that report is submitted to the Senate, and refer it to a select committee? After the honorable Senator from Maryland shall have made a report, it would be proper for the Senate, if they disagree to the report, to vote it down and adopt the substitute proposed by the gentleman who petitions us here. But until that is done, I think it would be unparliamentary—it would be doing injustice to the committee who have the matter in charge, and have been months laboring upon it, to take it from them and refer it to a select committee. If it be in order, I move to refer the memorial to the Committee on Finance, where all the other papers relative to the subject now are.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the honorable Senator that the first question is on reconsidering the vote by which the memorial was referred to a select committee. If that vote should be reconsidered, it will then be in the power of the Senator to make any other motion with regard to it.

Mr. RUSK. I ask the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER called for the reading of the memorial, and it was read.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, I know the difficulty under which I shall labor in being heard by the Senate. The impatience with which they listened to the reading of the memorial of General Hamilton admonishes me that, in the few remarks I desire to make, I shall, perhaps, meet with but very little attention. I cannot blame the Senate, because we are now thrown into the last month of the session with most important business upon our hands.

I do not regard the presentation of the memorial of General Hamilton, and its reference to a special committee of this body as at all reflecting on the Committee on Finance. I think if the members of that committee will themselves review the matter, when all things are considered, they will not regard it as at all reflecting upon them; if I thought it did reflect upon them, as a matter of course I should be the last man in this body who would do anything which I regarded as offering any discourtesy to that committee, or any one of its members. But if I am correctly informed as to what that committee have agreed upon, I shall offer a strenuous opposition to the adoption of the report which I understand they are about to make. I shall be bound to do that; first, because I do not believe that the committee are correct; and in the next place, because, if what I have heard of the report be correct, it will reflect upon the State I represent, and greatly embarrass an already complicated question which I hope to see soon settled fairly.

Sir, that we are thrown into this discussion now is no fault of mine. Upwards of six months ago several memorials were presented upon the subject of the Texas debt, many of them reflecting upon that State; and they were then referred to the Committee on Finance. I knew it was a matter of feeling in the State of Texas; I knew it was a matter of feeling amongst the creditors of the State of Texas; I knew it was a matter very much attended to by the letter-writers; I knew that Texas was commented upon by the newspapers; and I got up here in my place then and begged the committee to furnish us with a report by which the whole question of this debt and this reservation would be brought before us, in order that, while we had time, the matter could be coolly and calmly discussed. We have no such time now. It is a long case, and a complicated one—one which requires a good deal of thinking in order to come to a right conclusion. In the first place, in the boundary act there was inserted a proviso that $5,000,000 of the $10,000,000 granted to the State of Texas for a large amount of domain should be reserved in the Treasury till the claimants filed their releases to the United States.

Mr. HUNTER. I rise to a point of order. This is a simple question of reference. Whenever the committee shall report, it will be in the power of the Senator to speak as to the merits of the case.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. RUSK. I am offering reasons why the vote should not be reconsidered.

Mr. HUNTER. The motion to reconsider the motion to refer cannot open a wider question of debate than the original motion to refer; and I imagine that this debate would not be in order under the original motion to refer. My object is to save time. We have appropriation bills before us upon which we ought to act. I should be very happy to hear the Senator when the committee reports.

Mr. RUSK. Will the honorable Senator, as a member of the Committee on Finance, tell me when they will report? I have understood that they have been ready to report for three weeks; and they have had the papers in the case for six months; that is long enough, in all conscience, for Texas to remain silent under the imputations cast upon her.

Mr. GWIN. I will make another suggestion to the Senator from Texas. The Committee on Finance have referred that subject to one of its members, and he is not now present. If there is any charge to be brought against the Committee on Finance, it must affect particularly that member. I hope the Senator, therefore will agree to let the subject go over till to-morrow, when that Senator will be in his seat.

Mr. RUSK. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BUTLER. I am perfectly willing to let it go over till to-morrow; but I give notice that when it comes up, I shall not yield to any other considerations than a sense of justice, but shall discuss it as long as I please.

Mr. GWIN. I move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN CALIFORNIA.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill supplementary to the act approved March 3, 1851, entitled "An act to ascertain and settle private land claims in California," which was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. GWIN said: This bill, Mr. President, is one of a series of measures which I have proposed, to settle land claims in California, bring the agricultural lands in that State into cultivation, and to secure our citizens in the uninterrupted occupancy of the gold mines.

My policy may be classed under three heads:

The 1st contained in the act of the 3d of March, 1851, to examine and settle land claims in California, of which the measure now under consideration may be considered a part.

2d. To grant donations of the public lands to actual settlers and cultivators, with large grants for the use of schools; and

3d. Leave the gold mines undisturbed by Congressional legislation.

With the exception of this bill, my views have been sustained by the Senate with great unanimity. It is true, my donation measure was changed into a preemption bill, for reasons I stated at the time it was under consideration, with the distinct declaration that if the "homestead bill" did not pass, I should introduce a proposition changing the preemptions in California into donations. My object was to give the rights of property to the settlers in California with the least possible delay, and the preemption act which passed the Senate has done that in the most effectual manner.

The measure now under consideration is for the benefit of another class of settlers, and as it has not met with the sanction of the Land Committee of the Senate, and has been subjected to severe animadversion in California, I propose to review my course in this body, show its consistency, and establish its justice to every class of my constituents. The claimants under foreign land titles, the miners, and settlers on the public lands have been cared for, and the class to be protected by this bill, are the only citizens of California who are thus far left without the protecting shield of this Government. Their claims are founded on justice and equity, as I will show, and whether this bill passes or not, they will assert their rights under the preemption act which has passed this body, and will become a law, and their rights will be protected before the Supreme Court of the United States. They may be forced, by the rejection of this measure, into a fierce contest with the claimants under foreign titles, but their ultimate triumph is certain, or we must reverse the policy and action of this Government from its organization to the present time. The actual settler and cultivator of the soil has been the favorite in our legislation ever since the adoption of the Constitution. To them the nation has looked for its power and greatness, and it has not looked in vain. While the policy of Spain, France, and Great Britain permitted the building up great monopolies of the public domain, the policy of the United States is, and has been, to grant small tracts to actual settlers and cultivators, and hence the cause in part of the slow progress of colonization by these Governments as compared to our ours.

I will now proceed to the examination of the question before the Senate.

There is no subject, Mr. President, to which my attention has been directed with more concern since I became a member of the Senate of the United States than the condition of the land titles and claims in California. The necessity for their speedy adjustment upon fair and liberal principles was too obvious to require comment; and the Senate will bear me witness that I spared no effort, from my entrance into this body, to secure the passage of a law, so general and comprehensive in its provisions that it would do justice to all classes of titles and claims in our State.

Had the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo succeeded a nation in sovereignty, in whose territory, and among whose people the machinery of political and social institutions were in such full operation that all the land titles derived from Spain or Mexico had been consummated, and were "perfect" before the Mexican Government had abdicated, no legislation of Congress would have been necessary to adjust and settle our land claims. No higher sanction or guarantee could be given to any title of that description than the TREATY itself, the supreme law of the land, and consequently no act of Congress nor any judicial affirmance could impart additional strength, vigor, or security to any perfect grant, which, as the highest evidence of title that could exist, would be sufficient to vindicate the owner's right of property in any controversy which might arise before the courts of the country. Had this been the condition of our landed interests when California became an integral part of the American Union, the interposition of Congress would have been as unnecessary as it was in respect to titles in the town of Boston after the Declaration of Independence, or subsequent to the definite treaty of peace in 1783. But how wholly different were the titles in California at the period of its acquisition by this Government! The cause of this is plainly seen in the fact of the distance and isolation of the territory from the seat of the viceroyalty of New Spain, the languid management of political affairs, the entire absence of commerce and revenue, and consequent tardy settlement of the country.

The revolution that terminated the authority of Old Spain, led to but little improvement in this respect. The intercourse between the Supreme Government at the capital of the Republic and its distant department was irregular and unfrequent. The authorities of Old Spain, as shown by the first instructions of the Viceroy Bucareli in 1773, respecting the distribution of lands, and the regulations sanctioned by a royal order in 1781, established a system, the object of which was to promote white settlements, and, through the instrumentality of religious missionaries, to domesticate and civilize the Indians. To accomplish this object, the power was delegated and exercised of granting small lots for cultivation and inhabitation, and this policy, with modifications, was continued and enlarged by the decrees of the Mexican Congress in 1824, and the regulations of 1828 for colonizing the territories of the Republic.

Yet the written histories of California show how slow was the progress of population and settlement, and how limited was the development by actual cultivation of the agricultural capacities of the country; for we find that in the year 1831 the white population of Upper California did not exceed 4,500,* and that of the Indians in the twenty-one missions 19,000; and the whole grain productions of the country in that year was only 40,200 fanegas, or about 115,500 bushels. It appears, also, that there was no increase of population in 1835, and that in 1842 it had increased to 7,000; and in 1845 to 15,000, with 4,000 domesticated Indians; and that at the close of the year 1847, being about a year and a half after the American flag was hoisted at Monterey, the number of inhabitants, exclusive of the wandering tribes, was 16,000 whites and 4,000 domesticated Indians.

When we consider the sparseness of the population of the country at different periods under the Spanish and Mexican rule, and at the last change of Government, its meager quantity of grain productions in consequence of the very limited extent of actual cultivation, and that the exercise of the granting power for agricultural purposes was of course regulated and restricted to the wants and demands of the people, we may readily conclude how inconsiderable must have been the area of lands held for cultivation in California under the laws of Spain and Mexico. This class of titles is beyond the reach of difficulty, because there is no interference with them, and their validity will never be disputed. But there is a class of large claims, honest in their inception, generally of more recent origin, which were conceded for pastoral purposes or cattle ranges, and still another class, wholly illegal, false and fraudulent in their inception.

We were admonished of this state of affairs just before and after the ratification of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, for we find in the testimony taken by the Military Committee of the Senate of the United States, in February, 1848, (Sen. Rep. Com., No. 75, 1st sess. 30th Cong.,) to which I have alluded on a previous occasion, it is stated from "credible report," that "the California authorities were granting and selling the missions and the public domains;" that "in some cases these lands were so conveyed simply as grants, 'in others as rewards for services rendered to the Government, and in others for amounts of money that had been advanced or were paid to the Government;" that "in this way nearly all the missions south of San Luis Obispo, the mission of San Raphael, in Sonoma, and some of the large islands on the coast were granted;" that "many of these were hastily made, without the usual legal forms, and wanted the usual legal formalities," and that these mission grants "ought not to be considered valid," and that there were "in the public archives deeds and titles of some of the lands which were so conveyed away by the government of the Territory." About nine months after the ratification of the treaty was exchanged, we find it stated in the official report, bearing date March 1, 1849, of the Secretary of State for the Territory, that "a large number of land titles in California are very indefinite with respect to boundaries, the grants being for so many 'sitios,' 'criaderos,' &c., lying between certain hills, streams, &c., as shown by rough sketches attached to petitions;" that "these sketches frequently contain double the amount of land included in the grants. And even now very few of these grants have been surveyed or their boundaries definitely fixed," that "some of the land titles given by the Californian government contain conditions respecting their sale, &c., which are not only onerous to the holders, but contrary to the spirit of our laws;" that these "onerous conditions should be removed by act of Congress;" that "a number of the grants of land made by the Governors of California have never been confirmed by the Territorial Legislature;" that "in some cases that body has positively refused its approbation"—in some cases it had "merely declined to act until furnished with certain information respecting the amount asked for, its boundaries, &c.; in others again, the petition, though before the Legislature, was not reached previous to its final adjournment in July, 1846; and it is probable that some of these titles through carelessness were never submitted to that body for approval," and it had "been alleged by very respectable authority, that certain titles to land were given by Governor Pico after the United States had taken possession of the country, and made to bear date prior to the 7th of July, 1846;" that "these grants have, of course, never been confirmed by the Territorial Legislature, for that body adjourned on the 8th of July, the day after our flag was raised at Monterey; nor have they been recorded in any book of records among the government archives, although, it is said, they purport to be so recorded;" that "in settling land titles in this country, a broad distinction should be made between titles of this kind, and those which were given in good faith by the California Governors, previous to our taking possession of this country, but which have failed to receive the requisite confirmation for want of action on the part of the Territorial Legislature," (Ex. Doc. No. 17, 1st sess. 31st Cong., p. 122;) and (page 129) "that the mission lands and other property which have not been sold in accordance with the provisions of law, are still the property of the Government, and may be disposed of accordingly;" that "such was the legal condition of the missions of California, when on the 7th of July, 1846, the American flag was raised in Monterey, and the country taken formal possession of in the name of the United States;" that "soon after General

"Kearny assumed the civil government in California, representations were made to him, from the most respectable sources, that the grants and sales of mission property by Governor Pico, just as he was leaving the country, were without the authority of law, and that, though evidently made after the 7th of July, 1846, they had been antedated in order to give them the semblance of legality;" that "these titles were not recorded in the usual books of records in the Government archives; but purported to be recorded in some other book, which as yet has never been found," and that "speculators had bought up these doubtful titles, and now demanded to be put in possession of their property."

Yet, the "confidential agent" of this Government, sent out by the Government in July, 1849, reported in the face of all these facts, and of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, defining what a "perfect grant" is, that the land claims in California were "mostly perfect titles"—as perfect a piece of imposture and deception as was ever attempted to be practised at the expense of Government, upon an enlightened people, and designed, as subsequent events have shown, for ulterior and sinister purposes, resulting in the establishment of an extensive scheme of land monopoly, sustained by a vigorous and numerous class of speculating adventurers, with whom an issue is now to be made by the National Legislature for the protection of the dearest personal rights of the people of California, and the best interests of the Federal Government.

By the treaty of 1848 with Mexico, the absolute fee in the soil of California passed to the United States, excepting such tracts as had been carved out as private property by specific and well-defined boundaries, and rested upon consummated or perfect titles. In the case of Wiggins, at the January term in 1840 of the Supreme Court of the United States, it is declared, in regard to this class of titles, to be "the established doctrine of this court," that they "are intrinsically valid," and "need no sanction from the legislative or judicial departments of this country." But what is the doctrine of that court in respect to grants unaided by an actual survey to sever them from the public domain, and as to their standing in court in an action of ejectment?

In the case of the United States vs. King et al., in 1845, the validity of an instrument of writing in the nature of a grant for certain land from the Spanish Governor-general of Louisiana, came under investigation, and its validity as against the title of this Government to the same land, under the treaty ceding Louisiana to the United States, was discussed and considered. The Supreme Court, referring to the grant from the Governor-general of the province, held that it had not the "aid of any authentic survey to ascertain and fix the limits of the land, and to determine its location;" that "the instruments themselves contain 'no lines or boundaries, whereby any definite and specific parcel of land was severed from the public domain,'" and declared that "it has been settled by repeated decisions in this court, and in cases, too, where the instruments contained clear words of grant, that if the description was vague and indefinite," as in that case, "and there was no official survey to give it a certain location, it could create no right of property in any particular parcel of land, which could be maintained in a court of justice." At the same time the court referred to several decisions in which this doctrine had been advanced, and stated that, "after such repeated decisions upon the subject, all affirming the same doctrine, the question cannot be considered an open one in this court;" that "the land claimed was not severed from the public domain by the Spanish authorities, and set apart as private property, and consequently it passed to the United States by the treaty which ceded to them all the public and unappropriated lands;" that "if these instruments were regarded as grants, and it" appeared that "the original claimant had originally selected this very district as the place where the grant was intended to be located; and emigrants introduced by him had been settled upon it in performance of the conditions of his contract; and if it had been held that he had thereby acquired an equitable right to have the quantity of land mentioned in the paper of 1797, laid off to him at this place, still it would be no defense against the United See report of 17th July, 1848, of Mr. Buchanan, Secretary of State, (Ex. Doc. No. 70, 1st sess. 30th Cong.,) in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives, in which his report as to the population of the country in 1845 is based on the estimates of our late Consuls at Mazatlan and Monterey, and on a statement of Colonel Fremont, as to the population at the close of the year 1847.

"States." The court then referred to the cases of Chouteau vs. Eckhart, and Hicky vs. Stewart, in regard to imperfect titles, and stated that "these decisions stand upon the ground that such titles are not confirmed by the treaty itself, so as to bring them within judicial cognizance and authority;" that it "rests with the political department of the Government to determine how and by what tribunals justice should be done to persons claiming such rights;" that "if, therefore, this controversy was in a court of equity, and no suspicion of fraud rested upon the claim, yet it could not be supported against a grantee of the United States, because Congress has not confirmed nor authorized any other tribunal to determine upon its validity;" but that the case then under consideration was "in a court of law, the petitory action brought by the United States," being "in the nature of an action of ejectment, in which the decision must depend on the legal title, and that title under the treaty of cession being in the United States, an equitable title, if the defendant in error could show one, would be no defense."

This, and other decisions bearing with equal force upon the same point, establish the doctrine beyond controversy, that in no case in which a claimant has not a complete legal title from the former Government, can he sustain a claim in a court of law to a specific parcel of land against the United States, or against any settler who may hold a title from this Government. What control then does Congress have over the subject, and what, in the opinion of the court, are its obligations and duties?

In the case of Chouteau vs. Eckhart, the court held in regard to incomplete titles derived from the Spanish authorities to land in Upper Louisiana, that Congress "acted as the successor of the general intendency, and had the same discretion to confirm, and the sovereign power to perfect the incipient right, or to reject it, that the Intendent General had; each exercising sovereign power in regard to the claim, with full authority to award, or to refuse a perfect title,"—sanctioning and adopting at the same time the doctrine of the Missouri courts, which maintained that such inchoate claims "were not changed in their character by the treaty by which Louisiana was acquired; that the treaty imposed on this Government only a political obligation to perfect them, that this obligation, sacred as it may be, in any instance cannot be enforced by any action of the judicial tribunals, and that the legislation of Congress from 1804 to the present time has proceeded upon this construction of the treaty, as is manifested by the modes adopted to investigate the claims through boards of commissioners, and then acting on them by legislation."

In the case of Les Bois vs. Bramell, it is maintained that "the granting power was in a great degree political, and altogether the exercise of royal authority, and of course subject to no supervision but of the same high authority itself," that "by the treaty the United States assumed the same exclusive right to deal with the title in their political and sovereign capacity, nor could the courts of justice be permitted to interfere,"—that, "if they could, and by their decrees complete the title, all power over the subject might have been defeated, not by the courts of the Union only, but by the State courts also,"—and, that "therefore the contemporary construction, and practical understanding of the treaty for forty years has been, that claims like the plaintiff's had no standing in a court of justice until confirmed by Congress or its authority."

But, in coming down to the recent decisions of that high tribunal, where enlightened reason has so clearly and conclusively expounded our obligations and duties respecting foreign and incomplete titles, we find that in the case of Menard's heirs vs. Massey, January term, 1850, the court treats of a state of things analogous, and almost identical with that now under consideration. It is assumed by the court, and truly, "that by the third article of the treaty by which Louisiana was acquired," (the same in terms with the ninth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo,) "and by the laws of nations, the inhabitants of the ceded territory were entitled to be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their property. But in what property? To such an interest in it, if land, as they had when the country changed owners; and that interest being of a character requiring royal sanction before the Spanish Government would recognize it as divesting the public title, our Government, as the successor of Spain to the public lands, gave the same construction and effect to concessions and orders of survey, holding that the title of the King's domain passed by treaty to the United States, notwithstanding the existence of such concessions. Yet, to the full extent of any equity in the claimants, the Government adopted means to satisfy the claims; and as the sovereign power could not be sued as legal owner, boards of commissioners were created, with liberal powers, to investigate every description of claims, and report on them to Congress, for the sanction of sovereign authority; and by this means many claims were confirmed, the legal title added, and incipient concessions completed into perfect and conclusive titles against the Government. Then, again, Congress provided that special courts should be organized, in which the Government might be sued, in a prescribed form, and decrees be made for or against claimants; but no suit could be maintained in an ordinary action of ejectment, or for title of any kind, on a concession and an order of survey, for want of legal title to sustain it." That "such claimants were not regarded as owners of land until the real title was delivered completed"—in the language of the Spanish regulation No. 18. Had the courts of justice been allowed to hold otherwise, and to interfere in the matter, and to decree titles to claimants in equity, or to enforce their claims at law, and oust the United States indirectly by suing persons found on the land, little or no occasion would have existed for boards or special courts, to adjudge respecting the validity of claims; as the ordinary tribunals could have settled all controversies under State laws, declaring such claims cognizable in the State courts. It was therefore manifest that claims resting on the incipient steps must depend for their sanction and completion upon the sovereign power; and to this course claimants had no just cause to object, as their condition was the same under the Spanish Government." That "no standing, therefore, in an ordinary judicial tribunal has ever been allowed to these claims until Congress has confirmed them and vested the legal title in the claimant. Such, undoubtedly, is the doctrine assumed by our legislation. To go no further, the act of May 26, 1824, allowing claimants a right to present their claims in a court of justice, pronounces on their true character."

Then, in the case of the United States vs. Reynas, January term, 1850, we have a clear exposition as to the class of titles which Congress authorized the courts to adjudicate under the acts of 26th May, 1824, and 17th June, 1844, conferring power on the courts in several States of the Union to examine and confirm titles derived from the Governments that preceded the United States in sovereignty. In that case, it was insisted that the petitioner, holding the evidences of a perfect title from the Spanish authorities, was permitted to show that he fell within the class of persons whose rights are protected both by the treaty of 1800, at St. Ildefonso, ceding the province to France, and by the treaty of 1803, ceding it to the United States; and who are specially referred to in the act of 26th May, 1824, delegating power to the judicial tribunals to confirm claims.

To this the Supreme Court responds, that "In answer to this pretension of right under the act of 1824, it might perhaps be sufficient to observe, that if this right be asserted in virtue of a perfect Spanish title, it would seem to be comprised neither within the mischief nor the remedy contemplated by the statute. The mischief intended to be provided for by the act of 1824, was the inchoate or incomplete condition of titles having a fair, just, and legal inception under either the French or Spanish governments of Louisiana; but which, by reason of the abdication or superseding of those governments, and by that cause only, had not been completed. The remedy was the permission to bring such titles before the courts of the United States, and thereto render them complete, and to establish them by proof of the legality and justice of their origin and character. Such, then, being the mischief declared, and such the remedy provided by the statute, it is difficult to perceive the reason or authority for bringing before the courts, merely for supervision, titles alleged to be 'already perfected under the unquestionable and competent authority of either Spain or France. With regard to titles so derived and so consummated, there is no provision made by the statute. None could be requisite; and there could, with reference to such titles, be nothing for the courts to act upon—nothing which it was competent for them to consider." And in the case of the United States vs. Power's heirs, (11th Howard's Reports, page 580, December term, 1850,) it is held by the Supreme Court, in reference to the claim to SUR ISLAND, that if it "had found this to be a legal and perfect title, then the rule laid down in the case of Reynas, at the last term, would apply, and compel it to dismiss the petition for want of jurisdiction, because the act of 1824 did not confer power on the district courts to decide on perfect grants."

We have here a full judicial exposition of the scope and intent of the act of Congress of the 26th of May, 1824, for the adjustment by the courts of claims to lands founded on foreign titles in Missouri and Arkansas, as extended to Florida by the act of May 23, 1828, having been revived for Missouri and Arkansas by the act of June 17, 1844, and extended to embrace similar titles in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama. These and other decisions of the same tribunal establish the fact beyond controversy that the laws of Congress for the investigation and confirmation of titles from France, Spain, and Great Britain do not confer jurisdiction on the courts to take cognizance of, or act upon, any "perfect title," because such titles are already adjusted, being perfectly protected by the treaty itself—that their jurisdiction is only extended to inchoate titles or incomplete concessions, and that the Congress of the United States, as the successor of the authorities of the former Governments, have a right to act with these titles as they deem just and proper, either by confirming them in whole or in part, according to the extent of their equity; and carrying that equity into a complete legal title, or where they are destitute of merit rejecting them altogether, and disposing of the land covered by them as portions of the public domain.

These are the principles which have been laid down, recognized, and promulgated by the highest judicial tribunal known to our Constitution and laws, and were before Congress, and the people of California, and the whole American Union, before and at the passage of the act of March 3, 1851, to "ascertain and settle the private land claims in California." That is one of a series of measures which I advocated with whatever zeal and ability I could command, with the great object in view of ascertaining and separating by survey every honest Spanish or Mexican claim in California from the public domain; so that we might deal with the former according to the principles of equity and good conscience; and with the latter by granting donations to meet the wants of our people. Now, what are the rules prescribed by that act for the guidance of the commissioners and the courts in their decisions? It orders them by its 11th section to be governed by the "treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; by the law of nations—the laws, usages, and customs of the Government from which the claim is derived; the principles of equity, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, so far as they are applicable." Let us inquire what the operations under this law must necessarily be upon all and "any town-lot, farm-lot, or pasture-lot, held under a grant from any corporation or town to which lands may have been granted for the establishment of a town by the Spanish or Mexican Government, or the lawful authorities thereof," or "to any city, or town, or village-lot, which city, town, or village existed on the 7th day of July, 1846." We find by the fourteenth section it shields every title of this class, and provides for its confirmation in the simplest and easiest manner possible, by ordering that the mere fact of the existence of said town or village on the 7th July, 1846, "being duly proved, shall be prima facie evidence of a grant to such corporation, or to the individual under whom the said lot-holders claim." The production of proof, then, on the single point mentioned, will operate to produce an absolute confirmation of every "town-lot, farm-lot, or pasture-lot" of that class in California; and the decisions of the Land Board in that case, under any right or just administration of the law, will be treated as final by the proper law authorities of our Government, who will have no reason or motive for prosecuting an appeal from them before the courts. This provision of the law will, it is believed, cover and confirm all titles to solaras or building-lots, and the suertes or agricultural lots, held under the Spanish regulations of 1773, 1781, and 1791. The other provisions of that act will extend equal security to every settled four hundred vara lot, being of about twenty-seven and three quarter acres; and those of less extent, held under the regulations of Governor Figueroa, in 1834, for secularizing the missions, the fifth article of which allowed "to every individual head of a family, and all those above twenty-one years, although they have no family, a lot of land, whether irrigable or otherwise, of not exceeding four hundred varas square," nor less than one hundred out of the common lands of the missions. All equitable claims of greater or less extent, that may have had their origin under the decrees of the Mexican Congress, in 1824, and the regulations of 1828, for colonizing the territories of the Republic, or which may have otherwise lawfully originated under the authority of Spain or Mexico, where the boundaries of the same have been fixed and established, and where they have been reduced into full possession according to those boundaries, and that possession kept up by the claimant, or those lawfully holding under him, will be fully protected and secured under this law in every acre of his claim.

By a right administration, then, of the act of 3d March, 1851, every title or claim of the classes mentioned will be confirmed, surveyed, forever separated from the public lands, and included in a patent, carrying a full legal title from the Government of the United States to whom the fee had passed in virtue of the treaty of cession. Should there be a failure of the board, or of the courts, to recognize or confirm any meritorious or equitable claim, because of the failure of the owners to give reasonable attention, or from causes not controllable, I shall feel bound, so long as I hold a place in the public councils, to seek the interposition of Congress to give efficacy to any such claim by special legislative enactment.

From the report already referred to, dated March 1st, 1849, of the Secretary of State of California, it is shown, from the documents and laws to which he had referred, (Ex. Doc. 17, 1st sess. 31st Cong., House of Reps., page 128,) "that the lands granted to Indians were merely for the use of themselves and their descendants; that they could in no way dispose of them, but, when abandoned, they reverted to Government."

I will again call the attention of the Senate to the fact, which I have already mentioned, that the white population of Upper California, in the year 1831, including the inhabitants in the free towns of Los Angeles, San José, and Branciforte, and in the several missions under the Presidios of San Francisco, Monterey, Santa Barbara, and San Diego, did not exceed 4,500* white persons, (and it was the same in 1835,) and that the aggregate grain produced for the same year was about 115,500 bushels; and it will appear that, if the Governors of Spain and Mexico, instead of giving only the heads of families an agricultural lot, or a suerte, had given to every white inhabitant—man, woman, and child—a lot 400 varas square, or about 27½ acres, the quantity of land thus distributed for agricultural purposes would not exceed 135,000 acres.

Taking the population of 1842 at 7,000† whites, and supposing a like grant to each, the whole area would be less than 200,000 acres; and if we take, exclusive of Indians, the whole population of California at the end of the year 1847, to wit: 12,000 native, white, and mixed bloods, and 4,000 Americans, English, and French, and give each one a lot of that extent, the whole quantity of land conceded would have been about 444,000 acres.

As I have already shown the equitable title to every town-lot, farm-lot, or pasture-lot, every four hundred vara lot, and all other tracts of greater or less area which are fixed in boundaries and held in full possession, and which have originated under the laws, decrees, or regulations of Spain or Mexico, will be fully protected and secured by the act of 3d March, 1851.

But there is another class of titles wholly different from these, being Mexican grants or concessions for tracts of as high as eleven leagues, or 48,708 acres each, and others of less extent. These "sitios de ganado mayor," which literally means "a place for large cattle," are used also for designating a square league; and this class of claims I will now consider. They are the same I have already alluded to as being particularly treated of in the official report, dated 1st of March, 1849, of the Secretary of State of California, (Ex. Doc. No. 17, House of Representatives, 1st sess. 31st Congress, page 128,) as "a large number of land titles in California," which "are very indefinite with respect to boundaries, the grants being for so many "sitios," "criaderos," (place for breeding cattle,) &c., "lying between certain hills, streams, &c., as shown by rough sketches attached to the petitions," these "sketches frequently" containing "double the amount of land included in the grants," of which grants "even now" very few have been surveyed, or their boundaries definitively fixed. These are the tracts ranging in size from 2,200 to upwards of 48,700 acres, even if confined to the precise quantities of land specified in the grants; but where doubled in quantity in the rough sketches, as stated in the official report alluded to, would give the largest of this class something less than 100,000 acres each.

There are one hundred and sixty odd claims of this class, out of a little over two hundred, that have been brought before the Board of Land Commissioners, which, in the aggregate, call for more than three millions of acres, and if the estimate of the law agent be correct, that there are from fifteen hundred to two thousand claims, and the residue should bear anything like the same ratio, we shall have from twenty-five to thirty-five millions of acres of our most valuable agricultural lands covered by these cattle-range concessions, and that too for a white population, at the charge of Government, of sixteen thousand souls, including about four thousand American, English, and French, who came there about the period of the revolutionary movement. So here we have an actual native white population in California at the change of Government of about twelve thousand persons, equal to—say two thousand heads of families—whom we are called upon to regard as the grantees from Mexico of millions upon millions of acres of land, the choicest, finest, richest in the world, both agricultural and mineral—and with the official statements I have read to the Senate impeaching these claims, we are required to regard them as "perfect," and exclude from settlement on the lands thus claimed the half million of hardy enterprising settlers, the most energetic, brave, and enterprising people in the world, who have shaken off the political and social lethargy of ages from this land, and are now busily engaged by their industry to make its deserts blossom as the rose, and laying broad and deep the foundations of republican institutions on the shores of the Pacific.

Is there any man now prepared to face the Senate of the United States, and to stand up before the enlightened people of California, and with the record before him of the colonizing policy of both Spain and Mexico, and their practice of limiting the settlement tracts to small quantities—showing the terms and conditions of their pastoral concessions—and maintain that these incomplete cattle-range concessions should be held in absolute right of property, and that a population of but little over a fifth of the inhabitants of the present city of San Francisco, should be the lords in absolute fee of the greater portion of the richest soil in California, capable of maintaining millions of people. Is there any one with the facts spread out before him so blinded by gambling, reckless, dishonest speculation, who is willing to dare public intelligence, confess either his idiocy or corruption and depravity, by maintaining that there is anything in the colonizing policy of the Government that have passed away which would justify such assumptions, or sanction such a state of things as this?

The voice of the country, through its councils, will respond that American valor contended, and American blood was shed for no such bootless prize as this, but for a princely national domain, destined as the future home of millions of our countrymen. The policy of Congress is now fixed and established by general and special legislation, and the duties and obligations of our Government, under treaties by which we acquired the former provinces of Louisiana and Florida, are written out too distinctly upon the statute-books to be mistaken; and those duties, as shown in the enactments of Congress, have been sanctioned, expounded, and enforced by the courts of the Union as the lawful ordinances of the political power. And what do they command our Government to do, as the successor of Spain and Mexico, in relation to claims of this class? They command that such incomplete concessions for immense bodies of land, shall be examined, and that they shall be confirmed if found meritorious, and where the tribunals shall be satisfied that they would have been completed by the Governments that preceded us, but not to the prejudice of the rights of others, for that is the condition and the great principle which pervaded the policy of Spain since the foundation of the Spanish land system in the Americas, and which was continued by Mexico—that is the principle of reason and justice, and has been deliberately recognized in the general acts of Congress, already enumerated, of the 26th May, 1824, (11th section,) for the adjudication of claims by the courts; as extended by the act of 23d May, 1828, and 17th June, 1844, in the second section of the act of 4th July, 1836, the last acting directly upon the reports of commissioners, and confirming claims subject to sales by this Government, and certain locations within their limits. This is the principle recognized in other special legislative acts, and finally in the fifteenth section of the act of 3d March, 1851, for the adjustment of land claims in California, which provides that the decrees, &c., under it "shall not affect the interests of third persons."

Now, what are the "interests of third persons," existing when this law passed, which this Government is bound to protect? Among others, they are those interests which have grown up by reason of the actual settlements of hardy, industrious emigrants, who occupied small lots of land for which the legal title has passed to the United States by virtue of the treaty, but which are now claimed by incomplete concessions for immense quantities of land, with loose and indefinite limits—concessions which Spain or Mexico could have rejected at any time; and which this Government, as their successor, could reject, but which, to the fullest extent of their equity, should be confirmed, yet subject to the superior equity of the settler, whose labor and industry has given a thousand-fold additional value to the unoccupied and uncultivated agricultural lands in California, the most of which is covered by these concessions.

The bill I have already presented, and which is now before the Senate, as a supplement to the act of 3d March, 1851, for the adjustment of California titles, is designed for the protection of the actual settlers in the little spot of earth they have made the home of themselves and families, made valuable by the labor of their hands, and upon which they have earned a subsistence by the sweat of their brow. Yet, desiring to deal with the owners, original or present, of these grants in a spirit of justice and liberality, I propose that provision be made for an equivalent in public land elsewhere in cases where their equities justify a confirmation.

The equivalent which this bill provides is in accordance with the general precedents of legislation, by requiring it to be taken on lands subject to entry at private sale so as to avoid interference or conflict with settlers who may be preëmptors or with selections under laws of Congress in satisfaction of grants for the benefit of the whole State. The large sums that have and will be appropriated for surveys in California will bring immense amounts of land into market, out of which those selections can be made.

Let this measure be adopted, and under an energetic administration of the act of 3d March, 1851, and of the proposed supplement, our land claims will be speedily settled and quieted, and the whole energies of our people will have full play when released from the incubus which now hangs over our titles. The settler will get his home in virtue of a confirmation from the Board, and patent from the Government, instead of being pillaged and driven from it by the remorseless speculator. The land claimant himself will find that this measure will remove difficulties otherwise insuperable to him, because, by dealing in tenderness and justice to the rights of the settler, the latter, instead of resistance and controversy in battling for his homestead, will have no reason to interfere, but will leave the claimant to the liberality of a Government disposed to pursue a generous policy in the recognition and confirmation of foreign titles where the rights of private individuals are not prejudiced. But let the injustice and cupidity of the monopolist speculator, under pretext of law and of right, but in violation of both, attempt to seize upon the fruit of the honest labor of others and appropriate it to himself, let him seek to expel and drive off the settler from his cabin and take away his home, and then he will find the giant awakened in his strength—the giant of enlightened public opinion—which will deal with him according to his deserts. Then he will encounter the resistance, in every form, of those men who, smarting under a sense of the injuries they have sustained, will demand of the tribunals a rigid discharge of duty in the investigation of such titles when in prejudice of their rights, and it will take no prophet to predict their doom in the fate of the enormous grants of Bastrop and others, which, having been suspended over the country for half a century, retarding and repelling settlement, at last have fallen under the decrees of justice, as rightfully administered by the Supreme Court of the United States, and by recent acts of Congress, the lands covered by them in Louisiana and other States are at last laid open to sale and settlement.

One of the resolutions adopted by acclamation by the late Whig Convention in California, denounced this bill as an attempt to rob the citizens of California of their property. The author of that resolution is the nominee of the Whig party for Congress; and thus by adopting the resolution and nominating its author, the party are responsible for his opinions. This cry of "robbery" is raised against an effort on my part to prevent speculators from laying hold, under fraudulent or imperfect titles, with ill-defined, vagrant, or floating limits, of the land made valuable by the industry of the unwary and industrious settlers, to drive them from their homes and despoil them of their property. The "robbery" consists in the recognition of the rights of honest settlers to the small spot of ground inhabited and cultivated by them, and to protect them from mercenary and unscrupulous speculators who are seeking to swell their ill-gotten and bloated fortunes by the sacrifice of honest industry. Such denunciations, like a spent ball, fall harmless at my feet. The authors and instigators of these attacks are known to, and will be appreciated by my constituents. Of them, personally, I have nothing to say. Of their acts and opinions, I speak boldly and fearlessly, and shall not fail, on all proper occasions, to expose their efforts to rob the settlers and extort from them the rewards of their labor. Their personal attacks will not deter me from holding them up to the detestation of the people of California and of this Union, that they may be pointed at with the finger of scorn, and that the public reproach may follow them for their nefarious plots against the rights of the settlers in my State. But I do not hold the great mass of the Whig party responsible for this act of the convention, but fully acquit them of any participation in the denunciation of a measure to protect interests common to and inseparable from the great body of our people. Let us test the doctrine of this Whig candidate for Congress, as to the rights of property of the claimants under incomplete Mexican titles, (and my bill interferes with no other class,) and see its bearing on the future prosperity of the State. Let it be tested by a single example. There is a spot in California known as the Suisun valley, than which nothing in the wide domain of nature is more beautiful. It possesses a climate unsurpassed in salubrity, as genial as any on the shores of the Mediterranean, and almost rivaling the spot in the land of flowers which the ancient cavaliers sought as a region of perpetual youth. Its soil is of boundless fertility, and its scenery as magnificent as the Alps. It is no fancy sketch to say, that its spring and summer succeed each other to the exclusion of the rigors of winter, and that nature here holds out everything in exuberant abundance that can contribute to the comforts of man. In this valley, I learn by late advices from home, that near ten thousand acres are in cultivation, and will likely yield more than half a million of bushels of grain, fourfold the quantity of the annual grain product, as I have before shown, of the whole of Upper California under the Mexican Government. This is the result of the labor of some three hundred emigrant settlers who traveled there, thousands of miles through forests, over plains, mountains, precipices, and rivers, and here they have settled and located and built cabins, and spread around them the comforts of home and of civilization.

And how is this scene of happiness to be dissolved? The title of this Government to this soil, and theirs under it, is denied, and the power of the United States which they uphold and strengthen on the distant shores of the Pacific, is invoked to crush and destroy them. And this is the doctrine which the Whig candidate for Congress sanctions and sustains. If the title under the Mexican grant to Suisun valley is complete, my bill does not and cannot interfere with it. According to the decisions of the Supreme Court I have just read, it cannot be examined before the board of commissioners which was established to complete titles, not to waste time in perfecting what was already perfect. If the title is perfect, it is fortunate for these industrious settlers that the owner of this claim is a gentleman of liberal views and generous impulses, one able and willing to make them recompense for the value their labor has given to his land.

It is against the doctrine, that incomplete claims convey a perfect title to property, that I contend, and ever will contend. And with such an example before him, who is so lost to every sense of justice as to defend such a policy? Who is there with mercenary rancor enough to pursue such settlers, and denounce and stigmatize them in opprobrium as "squatters?"—a class of men whose triumphs are everywhere written upon the face of this continent—the men, bold and adventurous, who fled from the tyranny of the Old World, and at Jamestown, Virginia, the Plymouth rock of Massachusetts, and St. Mary's, in Maryland, laid the foundations of the settlements which have spread over the broad bosom of this mighty Republic from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the icy regions of the north to the tropics, before whom forests have disappeared, under whose hands cities have arisen, with whom the arts and sciences are in their highest development, by whom tyranny in every form, political, social, and religious, has been overthrown, the dignity, glory, and independence of man has been asserted and maintained, and the American Republic advanced to the front rank of the nations of the earth! This is the class of men whose interest I am proud to advocate; to whose cause every faculty I possess shall be devoted, and for the protection of a small portion of whom I invoke the sanction of the Senate to the measure I have presented.

MR. WELLER. As my colleague [Mr. GWIN] has given notice that he does not intend to press the consideration of this bill to-day, I will content myself on this occasion by saying that I regret very much that I am not able to bring my mind to the conclusion that this bill is calculated to advance the real interests of the people of California. I cannot get rid of the opinion that the first section of the bill conflicts with the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. I cannot divest my mind, I say, of that impression, because, if these claims which may be presented before the land commissioners are valid, they should be confirmed. In the decision of that question—the question of the validity of the claims—the board must be governed by the rules laid down by the act of Congress passed on the 3d March, 1851. This requires that the board shall be governed by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, by the law of nations, together with the usages and customs formerly existing under the Spanish and Mexican Governments, and by the principles of justice and equity. I can readily imagine that a claim may be presented to the board of commissioners, which is incomplete, in which the grantee may not have performed all the requirements of the Spanish and Mexican laws; but that person may have a just and equitable title through the occupation, improvement, and enjoyment of that which is covered by the original grant. I believe that after a grant has been made to any person—no matter what may be the extent of that grant—if he has taken possession in good faith, and enjoyed, improved, and occupied it, thus substantially complying with the terms of the grant, he is entitled to have it confirmed. The Government of the United States should do what justice and honesty would have required from the Mexican Government. If that Government, under the usages and customs which prevailed, would have been required to secure the land to the grantees, then our Government is bound to respect it. The extent of the grant cannot affect the question.

I need not say that I believe it would be manifestly unwise for the Government of the United States to make large grants of the public domain to individuals. I am entirely opposed to that policy, and the records of the past will show, so far as I have been connected with public affairs, that no one has been more favorable to those measures which would tend to the benefit of the actual settler than I have. My opinions were fully expressed more than eleven years ago, on that subject, in the House of Representatives, of which I was then a member.

The following is an extract from a speech made by me in the House of Representatives, February 3, 1841, (Congressional Appendix, vol. 9, page 145:)

"There is another subject introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELT], to which I beg leave to refer. I allude to the 'prospective preemption law,' which I rejoice to learn was passed by the Democratic party in the Senate on yesterday, and is now in this House for its action. It has been denounced here as a 'humbug, designed to catch votes,' and gentlemen have volunteered the assertion that we did not desire its passage. Now, sir, what is this bill? It is simply a proposition to give the settler upon the public lands the right of preemption, and differs only from the law heretofore passed in the fact that it is prospective in its operation. It does not propose to give the public domain to the settler, but to allow him to take that portion on which he has settled and built a log-cabin at the Government price, within a limited period. It is a measure for the benefit of the poor man—for the humble tenants of the log cabins; for those who may be driven by poverty from the older States, and who may go with no bank-bills perhaps in their pockets, but with strong arms and honest hearts to hunt for themselves and their families a home in the far West. Sir, if this was a measure for the advancement of the pecuniary interest of speculators or bankers, it would not meet with the opposition it does from Whig gentlemen. Although loud in their professions of attachment to the poor man when office is to be obtained, in their legislation little regard is paid to their interests. Gentlemen have denounced these settlers as 'lawless squatters,' and 'land pirates,' and told us that the United States marshal ought to be sent with a military force to dispossess them. Sir, if a banker (as is the case every day) swindles the community out of millions, the act goes unwhipped of justice; but if a poor man settles down upon the public land, and endeavors by his industry and frugality to procure a livelihood for his children, you would raise a military force to turn him off and deprive him of the little improvement he had made. This may be Whig policy, and Whig justice; but I venture the assertion, the American people are not prepared for such doctrine. In the estimation of these Whig orators, to cut down a few trees in a dense and almost unbroken forest belonging to the Government, for the purpose of cultivating a few acres of corn, is a most heinous offense; whilst they suffer the bankers to violate the laws, make sport of their legislation, acquire wealth by their violations, and ride in proud triumph over the ruin and desolation of the laboring man. Sir, there is a point beyond which forbearance ceases to be a virtue; and the time will come when this great money power, which is eating out the substance of the people, must be checked by legislation, or the land will be deluged in blood. The day of retribution is at hand, and we be to that legislator who seeks to aggrandize the few by the oppression of the many."

"The preemption bill is a favorite measure with me, and entails all the sympathies of my nature. It affords me the most sincere pleasure to do all in my power to advance the interests of the hardy and enterprising emigrant, who, abandoning the home of his fathers, the worn-out, worm-eaten land of his nativity, has taken up his abode in the rich valleys of the far West. Sir, I would rather be recognized as the champion of such men than hold the highest office within the gift of my country. Let these men have the encouragement of the Government—the promise that within a limited period they shall be permitted, at the present price, to purchase the land on which they reside; and with industry and enterprise, the rude cabin will soon give way to the comfortable dwelling, and the wilderness be made to bloom and blossom as the rose. By the passage of this act, many in the old States of this Union, who now feel from day to day the cutting lash of penury and want, and who have families growing up around them without the ability to supply them with even the necessities of life, would emigrate to the West, settle down on your lands, and soon surround themselves with all the comforts of life. In this way you would not only contribute to their happiness, but in making them the owners of the soil, increase and strengthen their attachment to the Union, and thus lay the foundation for the permanent prosperity of the country broad and deep in the affections of the people. I would much rather, for my own part, make a gift of the public domain to actual bona fide settlers who would improve the country, than to see it falling at the Government price into the hands of speculators."

But that policy which would be unwise and impolitic in the present condition of the affairs of this Government might have been both wise and politic in California when under the dominion of Spain. It was a very difficult thing to settle that country at that time, as well as when under the Government of Mexico; and it might be necessary to the cultivation of these lands that large grants should be made, for they were almost worthless, and used chiefly for pastoral or grazing purposes. Such a policy, however necessary or proper then, would, beyond all question, be unwise and impolitic now. The wants and necessities of our people demand an entirely different policy, as we are desirous to have as many landholders as possible.

By the terms of the treaty of peace, we agreed to see that the people were protected in the enjoyment of all their just rights. We have undertaken, by the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, to say that the people in California shall be protected in the free enjoyment of their legal and equitable rights; that the title of their property shall not be disturbed; in other words, that property which they fairly and justly held under Mexico, should be respected by us.

The first provision of the bill which my colleague has submitted, is, that although the title may be confirmed, if there be a defect or any informality in that title, although the board of commissioners may have decided in favor of it, upon the principles of equity, yet if the settler has occupied and improved eighty acres, he shall hold it; and the grantee shall have a floating title given him to eighty acres elsewhere. I think this would violate the spirit, if not the letter of that treaty which we made with Mexico. Now, I think if these grants are confirmed, the grantee is entitled to the possession of the particular land which is covered by that title. There may be reasons why the original grant would be desired; for we all know that we attach oftentimes a fictitious value to property because of its location, its natural position, or simply because it suits us. If these grants have been made in good faith by the proper authority, and have been occupied and enjoyed by the proprietor, although he may not have complied with all the technical provisions of the law, I hold that it is the duty of the Government to protect him in his right to the particular land which is covered by his title.

There is the point in regard to which my colleague and myself differ. There may be, and probably there are, fraudulent grants in that country. There are many grants, I know, in California, the boundaries of which are indefinite, undefined, and uncertain; and wherever a discretion is left to be exercised in adjusting the boundaries, I would have that discretion so exercised as to bring down the grants to the very smallest portion, acting upon the principle that it is against the public policy that land should be held in large tracts.

But if the title be a good one, you are under the highest of all obligations of a political character, the plighted faith of the Government, to confirm it. If it be fraudulent, or tainted with fraud, unjust, or of a doubtful character, it should be rejected. A Government, no more than an individual, can maintain its character for integrity by taking advantage of a mere technical defect in a title.

There are titles which will be found incomplete in some particulars. If there are substantial defects the title must be rejected. In regard to the grant made in the Suisun valley, to which my colleague has referred, I have only a remark to make. There are between two and three hundred settlers there, and I believe the grant contains some twenty-four thousand acres, a considerable portion of which has been settled upon, and they have had the undisturbed enjoyment of all the fruits of that rich and valuable land for two years. But I will not discuss the title to this grant, for the reason that I am in the position of counsel myself for the settlers, and must, as such, resist in the courts the confirmation of it. It is not becoming in me, therefore, to express any opinion as to the legality or validity of that title. But if it be a good title, made by competent authority, and the grantee took possession and improved in good faith, and has complied with all the substantial requisitions of the law, that board must confirm it. But what will be his position under this bill if his title should be confirmed? He will find all the land susceptible of cultivation in the occupancy of other persons, and he must take his certificate for twenty-four thousand acres, (if that be the amount of the grant,) and locate it upon the public domain. Could he find land as rich and valuable unoccupied elsewhere in that State? I am confident he could not. Would this be a substantial compliance with the terms of the treaty, "to maintain and protect him in the free enjoyment of his property?" I think not. To compel him to locate lands elsewhere than the place covered by his grant would, in my judgment, be a violation of our treaty obligations. It would be a breach of plighted faith.

This is the first time I have been compelled, from a sense of duty, to differ with my colleague, whose time and energies have been devoted to our State. There is much, very much, in the argument of my colleague which receives my cordial assent. I know the difficulties under which we labor in that country, and it is natural that we should sometimes be unable to see alike in respect to the best method of meeting those difficulties. But I do not wish to discuss this subject unless it should be pressed upon the Senate. For the present I only desire to put myself right before our common constituency.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to say a word in reply to my colleague. I do not mean to go into the legal argument of this question again, but I undertake to say, that whenever the time arrives when he gives us his views at length, I shall be able to demonstrate the truth of what I have asserted to-day, that the board of commissioners created by the law of the 3d March, 1851, according to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, have no power to act on a perfect claim under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. If these are perfect claims, the treaty confirms them. I shall, if I have not, establish beyond controversy, that by the decision of the Supreme Court, such claims as my colleague has referred to never have been adjudicated by a board of commissioners, and never can be. If the commissioners in California decide claims on the principle that they have jurisdiction of perfect titles, their action will be reversed by the Supreme Court. The claims they are to adjudicate are equities, and being so, come within the political power of this Government. This cannot be denied; and in that view I contend that you should regard the equities of those who, by their manual labor, have made the land valuable, as well as the equities of large land claimants. There are equities on both sides; and while I am willing to extend equities to the few large owners of land, I wish also to provide for the hundred thousand citizens who have no lands at all. I have stated here and elsewhere that every perfect claim is confirmed independently of the board of commissioners by the treaty, which is the supreme law of the land; but where there are imperfect claims, I say that Government has the power of controlling these equities so as to see that no injustice is done to the equities of the actual settler and cultivator of the soil.

As to the hardships that will follow the passage of this law, that is an old story. We have heard the same time and again from a distinguished member of this body, now no longer here, [Mr. Benton.] He represented that the act of the 3d of March, 1851, which contains the same principle contended for in this bill, would despoil the people of California of their property and drive them out of the country in hopeless despair. But in answer, I then said, and now repeat, the Mexican inhabitants, with all these conflicts with their land claims, are worth millions more than they were before the country was annexed to the United States; and if they have perfect titles they will retain their lands; if they have incomplete titles, they must rely on the equity in their favor and not oppose similar equities to those who have made the lands valuable by occupation and cultivation.

My colleague says that many of these claims are covered with settlers—that the claimants have no land left. I know of but one such—that in Suisun valley—and I believe it is the only one. But suppose there are such cases; if the title is incomplete, why should not the claimant go elsewhere and get unappropriated agricultural land, more than equal in value to those he claimed before they were made valuable by the labor of American citizens? What did Suisun valley produce until these settlers commenced cultivating it? And what injury has the Mexican claimant sustained if his claim is perfect? He will go to the courts and get his rights. But if he relies on the equity of an inchoate claim, he must respect the equities of those who have added tenfold to the value of the land by settling on and cultivating it.

I now renew the motion to lay the subject upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the prior orders be postponed, for the purpose of taking up the bill "making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30th, 1853."

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the committee to strike out the following:

"For the payment to the Shawnees of moneys due them under and by virtue of the treaties of the 7th of November, 1825, and 8th of August, 1831, between the United States and the two divisions of said tribe of Indians, the same being the net balance received into the Treasury for the sale of their lands in Ohio, $66,245 93: Provided, however, That said tribe of Indians shall first express their assent, that the payment of the above sum shall be made equally to the whole tribe, rather than to either division thereof."

Mr. HUNTER. This claim of the Shawnees is based on the following statement of facts: The Missouri Shawnees, as they were called, who were located at Cape Girardeau, held some sort of a grant from the Spanish Government, covering a territory of twenty-five miles square. In 1825, they desired themselves to remove on account of having troublesome neighbors, and the Government was also in favor of their doing so. At the time there was another band of Shawnees living in Ohio, on reservations which belonged to them. It was stipulated by the treaty of 1825, that a tract of land, fifty miles square, should be set aside for the Shawnees—should be set aside west of the State of Missouri. This tract was dedicated by the treaty of 1825 to the Missouri Shawnees and the Ohio Shawnees together. The Cape Girardeau Shawnees moved to, and occupied, a tract of fifty miles square on the Kansas river; and in 1831, a treaty was made with the Ohio Shawnees, by which it was stipulated that the Government should reserve seventy cents per acre from the sales of their lands, and give them the residue, amounting to something like $30,000, in which these Ohio Shawnees alone were interested. It was also stipulated that the Government would patent to them one hundred thousand acres of land, which they were to hold as long as they continued to be a tribe, and resided on the reservation formerly given to the Missouri Shawnees. It is to be observed, that by the treaty of 1825, this territory was given, not only to the Missouri, but also to the Ohio Shawnees. The Ohio Shawnees moved to it in 1832, and lived there in common with the Missouri Shawnees, from that time till 1844. It was then that they, for the first time, made a claim for a separate tract of land. Before that time, the agent, Mr. McCoy, had written to the Department that it was more suitable to their tastes and their wishes that they should all live in common than that a separate tract should be designated for the Ohio Shawnees; in other words, that it would be better that they should receive the common benefit of the one million six hundred thousand acres, than to have one hundred thousand acres set apart for them, and thus lose all title to the residue. In pursuance of this advice, in 1844—although I do not discover that we were bound to do so by any treaty—the whole one million six hundred thousand acres were patented to the Shawnees, with this reservation: The reservation in the patent, is this:

"Subject to the right secured to the Ohio band of the Shawnees by the second article of the agreement and convention made and concluded at Wapahkonetta, in the county of Allen, in the State of Ohio, on the 8th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1831."

So that the treaty of 1825 reserved to the United States the right to locate these Ohio Shawnees within the fifty miles square, and when the patent was made in 1844 to the Missouri Shawnees, the same right was reserved in the patent; from which it appears that if it was desirable, the United States has the right, according to the treaty of 1831, to patent this one hundred thousand acres to the Ohio Shawnees. But according to the information given by Mr. McCoy, they preferred—and probably the same thing would be true now, if the alternative were given them—to hold the whole of the 1,600,000 acres in common, rather than take the 100,000 acres in a separate tract. At any rate, it is in the power of the United States to give this separate tract of 100,000 acres, and it is very probable that the other Shawnees would agree to it, because the Missouri Shawnees would be better off if they held the 1,000,000 acres in their own right than if they held the whole in common with the Ohio Shawnees. But whether that be so or not, it seems to be in our power to patent the 100,000 acres to the Ohio Shawnees. This claim came up for the first time in 1844, under Commissioner Crawford, and he decided against them. He decided that the Ohio Shawnees had no claim to other land than that which had been given them. An attempt was made again, when Mr. Lowrie was the Commissioner, and he refused to grant it, on the ground that it was settled already; and when Mr. Mix was Commissioner, he also refused to grant it. It has now been opened, for what reason I know not, and it has been estimated for and now appears before us.

The only ground on which this claim has been put with any show of right, was that which seems to be taken by the Commissioner, to wit: that the United States had incapacitated itself from fulfilling its treaty stipulations with the Ohio Shawnees, by giving this patent of 100,000 acres. It has not done so. On the contrary, the right was reserved in the treaty of 1825, and in the patent itself.

If any one had a right it would be the Missouri Shawnees, but I believe that in point of fact neither of them is entitled to it. It was a reservation of land made by the United States, for the benefit of the Shawnees. It is to be presumed it was for the benefit of the Missouri Shawnees, for why should they undertake to provide a home for the Ohio Shawnees? A reservation, therefore, must have been made on the part of the United States, as is shown by the consideration of the amount over and above seventy cents per acre retained by the United States when the treaty was made. To show that there is a claim of that sort, there is a petition filed by the Missouri Shawnees—a petition under which they claim that if any compensation is made it should be made to them. It is true, that the petition never was presented to the House, but it was sent to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas,] by a very responsible man—Colonel Mitchell, of Missouri.

In that it appears that this is the claim which the Shawnees make, probably being induced to do so, by the consideration that the Ohio Shawnees had set them to work on the ground that if this compensation belonged to either it belonged to them; and in point of fact, if it belongs to either, I believe it does belong to them. But it does not belong to either. The patent given to the Missouri Shawnees, gave them four times as much land as they ceded; to wit, a tract fifty miles square, and then there was a reservation that the United States may provide a home for the Ohio Shawnees when they choose to remove.

Not only did the United States do that, but they went further than they were bound to go. They gave them not only the treaty, but the patent also, so that these Indians hold by a higher title than any other Indians.

Under these circumstances, it seemed to us that neither portion of the Shawnees could raise a legitimate claim to this amount, and that if anything was due, it was not proper to pay them now, until it was ascertained to which band of Shawnees it was due. My own opinion is, that neither should be paid.

Mr. ATCHISON. This question is involved in doubt and uncertainty, in my opinion. If it was a question to be settled by the bare face of the treaty, I am rather of the opinion that this claim on the part of the Shawnees of Ohio, for $66,000, is a good claim. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] has stated substantially the contents of the treaty between the United States and the Missouri Shawnees in 1825, and between the United States and the Ohio Shawnees in 1831. It is true those Shawnees in the State of Missouri held what they called and understood to be a grant from the Governor General of Louisiana, the Baron De Carondelet. But I examined this claim the other day. I do not read French very readily; but, from what I made out, it was the mere right to occupy a certain territory within the limits of what now composes the States of Missouri and Arkansas. Subsequently the grant was made to one Larimie, for himself, the Shawnees, and Delawares. Subsequently they laid off or located a portion of the territory in the neighborhood of Cape Girardeau, now in Cape Girardeau county, in the State of Missouri, of about twenty-five miles square, and upon that their village was built and improvements made. And I think it was afterwards confirmed to them by a person in command at Cape Girardeau.

But the grant, in the first place, was only a grant to roam over a territory between the Missouri and the Kansas rivers, together with the right to hunt over the plain country, and the right to occupy as long as they remained; when they removed those rights ceased.

I will now state the grounds on which, as I understand, the Ohio Shawnees claim these $66,000. In 1825, General Clark made a treaty with the so-called Missouri Shawnees. By that treaty they relinquished and ceded to the United States all their claims to the twenty-five miles square of territory then occupied by them; and in part consideration thereof, the United States granted to the Shawnees fifty miles square, to commence five miles north of the southern boundary of the State of Missouri, running with that line due west twenty-five miles; thence due west one hundred miles; thence due south twenty-five miles; thence to the place of beginning on the east; which would make fifty miles square. In one article of the treaty it was provided that if the Shawnees, on an examination of the territory, were not satisfied with it, they might take a quantity of land on the Kansas river; and that was done. They were not satisfied with the land laid out by metes and bounds for them on the Neosho river, and which formed part of a recent purchase from the Osage Indians by the United States, and therefore they chose a locality on the Kansas river. I have a map here which shows the exact position; it is on the southern side of the Kansas river.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] has stated that it was provided by the treaty of 1825 that this tract of fifty miles square should not be laid out and designated for the occupation of the Missouri Shawnees only, but for the Missouri Shawnees and the Ohio Shawnees in common. Perhaps I shall make the subject more clearly understood by referring to the treaty itself. The first article is nothing more than a cession of all the Indian rights to the lands which the Shawnees occupied in the neighborhood of Cape Girardeau. The second article defines the consideration to be given to the Indians for the twenty-five miles square which they surrendered, and reads thus:

"ART. 2. It is further agreed by the contracting parties, that, in consideration of the cession aforesaid, the United States do hereby agree to give to the Shawnee tribe of Indians within the State of Missouri, for themselves and for those of the same nation now residing in Ohio, who may hereafter emigrate to the west of the Mississippi, a tract of land equal to fifty (50) miles square, situated west of the State of Missouri, and within the purchase lately made from the Osages, by treaty bearing date the 2d day of June, 1825, and within the following boundaries: commencing at a point two (2) miles northwest of the southwest corner of the State of Missouri; from thence north twenty-five (25) miles; thence west one hundred (100) miles; thence south twenty-five (25) miles; thence east one hundred (100) miles to the place of beginning. But whereas the said Shawnee tribe had valuable and lasting improvements," &c.

The remainder of the article defines the money consideration to be given by the United States to the Shawnees for the losses and inconveniences occasioned by removal.

There is a third article, which reads as follows:

"ART. 3. It is further stipulated, that a deputation of the said parties of the second part may be sent to explore the lands assigned to them in the preceding article; and if the same be not acceptable to them, upon an examination of the same, which shall be had, and made known to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs at St. Louis on or before April next, who shall, in lieu thereof, assign to them an equal quantity of land, to be selected on the Kansas river, and laid off either south or north of that river, and west of the boundary of Missouri, not reserved or ceded to any other tribe."

Well, sir, the fact was, that a portion of territory equal to fifty miles square was laid off south of the Kansas river, upon which they were to reside. Then the consideration for this fifty miles was met. It was the twenty-five miles within the State of Missouri. Thus the Shawnees argued, and so it appears on the face of the treaty. Well, sir, whose property was that? It was the property of these Indians under this Spanish grant. Then the treaty was made in 1831 with the Shawnees of Ohio, under which they claim this $66,000.

By the first article of the treaty they ceded to the United States certain lands in the State of Ohio. The second article of the treaty sets forth the consideration for the purchase of their land in the State of Ohio. I will ask the Secretary to read this second section.

The section was read, as follows:

"ART. 2. In consideration of the cession stipulated in the foregoing article, the United States agree to cause the said tribe or band of Shawnees, consisting of about four hundred souls, to be removed in a convenient and suitable manner to the western side of the Mississippi river, and will grant by patent in fee-simple to them and their heirs forever, as long as they shall exist as a nation and remain upon the same, under the direction of the President of the United States, within the tract of land equal to fifty miles square, which was granted to the Shawnee Indians of the State of Missouri by the second article of a treaty made at the city of St. Louis, in said State, with the said Shawnees of Missouri, by William Clark, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, on the 7th day of November, in the year 1825; and in which it is provided that the grant aforesaid shall be for the Shawnee tribe of Indians within the State of Missouri, 'and for those of the same nation now residing in Ohio who may hereafter emigrate to the west of the Mississippi;' but if there should not be a sufficiency of good land unoccupied by the Shawnee Indians who have already settled on the tract granted as aforesaid by the said treaty of St. Louis, then the tract of 100,000 acres heretofore granted to the said Shawnees of Ohio, parties to this compact, shall be located under the direction of the President of the United States on lands contiguous to the said Shawnees of Missouri, or on any other unappropriated lands within the districts of country designed for the emigrating Indians of the United States."

Mr. ATCHISON. The claim of the Shawnees of Ohio, under the second article of the treaty of 1831, amounts to this, that in addition to certain sums of money specified in another article of the treaty, to be paid by the United States, the United States, in consideration of the lands ceded by the first article, will agree to lay off for these Shawnees one hundred thousand acres, within the limits of the territory ceded by the treaty of 1825, to the Missouri Shawnees.

The Shawnees, with whom the treaty was made in 1831, removed from Ohio and settled in 1832 with the Missouri Shawnees, upon that land, holding it in common with them. But the Government of the United States did not then, nor have they since assigned to the Shawnees of Ohio, under the treaty of 1831, this hundred thousand acres of land, by metes and bounds, nor have they patented it to them in fee simple; therefore they contend that the United States has not complied with their bargain, that by locating them upon the fifty miles square, they were locating them upon land which did not belong to the United States, but upon land belonging to the Shawnees of Missouri, and that if anybody provided a home for them, it was the Missouri Shawnees. They therefore contend that they must have the value of this hundred thousand acres of land, which is now in the Treasury of the United States, amounting to $66,246 23, as appropriated in this bill. In other words, they say they have received no consideration for the hundred thousand acres; that the mere right to settle in that territory in common with the Shawnees of Missouri, they acquired not from the United States, but from the Missouri Shawnees. They say the United States has not complied with the contract, that the United States has not set apart the hundred thousand acres within the fifty miles square, even if they had the fee simple. It is true the fee simple is somewhat qualified. It is to be made to them and their heirs as long as they resided on the land.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman tell what title the Shawnees had to the fifty miles square?

Mr. ATCHISON. I will state it again briefly. They held twenty-five miles square near Cape Girardeau, in the State of Missouri, under a grant from the Spanish Government. When Missouri became a Territory of the United States, and began to be settled, population began to crowd upon them, and it became necessary then to extinguish their claim. The Government of the United States authorized General Clark to make a treaty with them in 1825, which was done at St. Louis; and in consideration, or in part consideration, of these twenty-five miles square at Cape Girardeau, the Government of the United States ceded fifty miles square upon the Kansas. That is the point, stated briefly. They say that this land upon the Kansas was the property of the Missouri Shawnees, and that the Government of the United States had no right, without making an arrangement with those Shawnees, to take 100,000 acres of their land. This is their argument. The treaty of 1825 mentioned, and it is recited in the treaty of 1831, that this purchase was made of the Shawnees of Missouri, and for the Shawnees of Ohio.

But, Mr. President, the Secretary of the Interior, I think, has misled, for a time at least, the Senator from Virginia. The Secretary, in his communication to the committee of the House of Representatives upon this subject, says that the Shawnees of Missouri have a patent to this land. So they have; but upon what was that patent based? Upon what authority was it issued? There was no authority for it. There is nothing in the treaty of 1825 with the Missouri Shawnees that authorized the Government of the United States to issue a patent for this land; but, sir, here is the mistake: I do not think the Secretary examined this matter even with ordinary care. I do not think, from examining his report, that his opinion is worth a straw.

Mr. BELL. You do not mean that?

Mr. ATCHISON. In relation to this matter I do most certainly say, that his opinion is worth nothing. In the treaty of 1831, there is a provision authorizing, or at least agreeing, that the Shawnee Indians shall have a patent for the one hundred thousand acres of land. I suppose it is from that clause in that treaty, that a patent was made to the Shawnees of Missouri for the whole fifty miles square; including the one hundred thousand acres to which the Shawnees of Ohio were entitled. A patent has been issued to the Shawnees of Missouri, subject to the rights of the Shawnees of Ohio. This is what they call a patent. Sir, a patent must have a law, or a treaty, or something upon which it is based, or it is not worth the paper upon which it is written. The Shawnees of Ohio never have received a patent; they were entitled to one according to the terms of this treaty, for one hundred thousand acres, and therefore they say the United States are bound to pay them $66,000, as a consideration for the one hundred thousand acres.

Another thing that strengthens, or at least makes plausible their claim, is a clause in this same second article of the treaty, that if one hundred thousand acres of land cannot be found within this fifty miles square, of "good land"—these are the terms used—unoccupied by the Shawnees of Missouri, then the United States agreed to lay off one hundred thousand acres of land adjoining the fifty miles square, for their use, to satisfy the demands of the Shawnees for their land in the State of Ohio.

Now, if I am at all understood, I have presented to the Senate the claim made by the Shawnees. It is somewhat complicated, and perhaps I may not be understood; and therefore I will take the liberty of recapitulating and stating in narrative form what I understand to be their claim.

By the treaty of 1825, it was agreed to give to the Shawnees of Missouri these fifty miles square, say on the Kansas, for themselves and for the Shawnees of Ohio. Who made this stipulation? Who required this stipulation to be put into the treaty? My opinion is, and the fair inference is, that the Shawnees of Missouri required that the Government of the United States should not interpose any difficulty in the way of their brethren in Ohio settling among them, if the Shawnees of Missouri thought proper to permit them. But, it will be contended by the Senator from Virginia, that it was the United States who made this stipulation, and reserved to themselves the right to locate the Ohio Shawnees within these limits. I admit that such an inference is a plausible one, and there lies the difficulty. I regret that I cannot find any instructions to the commissioner who negotiated the treaty of 1825, or the commissioner who negotiated that of 1831, or any report from either of those commissioners upon either treaty, that throws any light upon this subject. I have examined all the documents upon which I could lay my hands, and I can find no light except the petition mentioned by the Senator from Virginia; and if that be the act of the Shawnees of Missouri, then I say there is no foundation for their claim, and I have no reason to say that it is not their act.

But to go on with the treaty of 1831. They sold their lands—about 117,000 acres is an estimate of their amount—in the State of Ohio, which, I am told, are now and were then very valuable lands; and, in consideration thereof, the United States agreed to give them a patent for 100,000 acres of land lying within this fifty miles square. They say the United States have not done this; that the United States have not complied with their bargain; that they are now living in common with the Shawnees of Missouri under an arrangement between themselves. They say that as the United States have not given them a patent, nor provided them with 100,000 acres of land for themselves, they are certainly entitled to the consideration they paid for it. That is their case; and if that be the ground upon which they base it, and there be nothing to controvert it, then no man can hesitate for a moment about making the appropriation of $66,000, for they certainly must be entitled to it.

But here lies the difficulty, in my mind. This amendment, it is true, proposes to pay $66,000 to the Shawnees of Missouri, and the Ohio Shawnees, to whom it shall be disbursed in common. Now, what would be the effect of that? The Missouri Shawnees, by their petition here, claim the $66,000, and claim it for what? Because they have received their brethren from the State of Ohio, who are now living among them, and upon their lands. They say they are entitled to it. The Ohio Shawnees say they are entitled to it because their land in Ohio was given in payment for the one hundred thousand acres promised to them by the United States. Who is entitled to it, the Missouri Shawnees or the Shawnees of Ohio?—or are either of them entitled to it? That is the question. If the view taken by the Senator from Virginia be correct, neither of them is entitled to it.

There must be documents on file in the Indian Department to throw some light upon the subject. The instructions given to the commissioner must be there. I have seen an extract copied from the report of Colonel Gardiner, who made the treaty, in 1831; but it explains nothing, and throws no light upon the subject. I have been unable to find the instructions given to General Clark, or a report from General Clark, or one from Colonel Gardiner. But these things must be upon the files of that Department; and, when they are discovered and brought to light, they certainly will explain this matter. Now, my opinion is, that the way to arrange this matter, if the Shawnees are right—and they believe, religiously, that they are right, and nothing under the sun will put it out of their heads, until the appropriation is made, that they are cheated by the Government—is by a treaty. If, upon a full investigation, it is ascertained that the Shawnees are entitled to the $66,000, then let a Government agent make an arrangement between the two bands of Shawnee Indians, who are now united, as I am told. Let the Government of the United States, through its agent, make an arrangement with them, similar, if you please, to the provisions made in this bill—that this money shall be disbursed both to the Missouri and Ohio Shawnees. And they may go further: as they are amalgamated and live together, they may consolidate all their annuities, and all their Government obligations in the same treaty, so as to simplify our transactions with them.

The subject of our Indian affairs is a most complicated one. We can scarcely ever close up any business we have with the tribes, great or small; for how easy a matter it is to go back—perhaps fifty treaties have been made with these very Shawnees since the formation of the Government—and examine the treaties and trump up claims, just or unjust, against the Government of the United States. It is so with almost every Indian tribe on this Continent. I am very reluctant to act even when I come to the conclusion that a tribe has a just claim, because it is so difficult a matter to close it up. It will not do to say that the agents do it—that it is the work of white men; for, if the Indians be justly entitled to these claims, it is an act of charity, as well perhaps as of profit—and more of profit than of charity—to the agents to rake up the claims and bring them before Congress, or before the proper Department. I do not blame them for it. The Indians are not capable of examining their own treaties or understanding their own business. But there is a Shawnee chief here now, within the limits of this city, who happens to be a man of intelligence, who was present when the treaty of 1831 was made, and he tells me—and I believe him to be a man of truth, for he is so esteemed both by white men and red men at home—I mean Parks, one of the principal chiefs of the Shawnees—that he was at the making of that treaty, and tells me what took place there; and that the construction the Shawnees now give to it was the construction then given, and which has ever since been given by them. But I shall be answered by the Senator from Virginia that the first time the Shawnees preferred their claim, or any difficulty arose about it, was in 1844. Well, sir, suppose it was. That was only twelve years after they had removed to their lands on the Kansas river—not a very long time in the life of a nation. Perhaps Parks is now the only man of any intelligence, or who can speak the English language, who was present at the signing of that treaty.

I do not wish to be understood as condemning this claim, or as fully approving of it, for I do consider that it should remain an open question until it can be further investigated; and if, after full investigation be had, there should remain a solitary doubt as to its justice, that doubt should be given in favor of the Shawnee Indians. Parks tells me that the most of the Shawnees now living have always been friendly to the United States—that they have rendered service to the United States. He himself took one hundred and twenty Shawnee and Delaware Indians to the Florida war. He says that whilst the Shawnees were at war with the United States, they fought them like men—that they disputed every inch of ground until they were completely overwhelmed by the United States; but from the hour that they made peace with the United States they have maintained their friendly relations. They have warred not against but for the United States; and he thinks that they are entitled to this allowance. Other chiefs who are with him are of the same opinion, and he says the whole nation are of the opinion that they are entitled to this amount of money, and that they will remain of this opinion, whether they get the money or not.

Under these circumstances, I would suggest to the Senator from Virginia to make a provision of this sort: Make no appropriation of money, but provide, by an amendment, for the full investigation of the claim. I would not leave it with the Department of the Interior, that Department having expressed an opinion upon it, and a very loose one, as I consider it—one that cannot be maintained. I would appoint commissioners to investigate the matter, or a commissioner—some respectable gentleman—who need not go beyond the Indian Department to examine its records, and to construe this treaty and report at the next session of Congress, what ought to be done by Congress. That is the course I would recommend, and which I think should be pursued. I think there is plausibility in the claim, but I do not think it now stands in such an attitude that it would be expedient for Congress to allow it.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Mr. President, I wish at a proper time, to submit my views upon this claim. I have, perhaps, opinions more decided in regard to it, than those of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. ATCHISON.] In our earnest attempts to come to a proper understanding about this claim, the Committee on Indian Affairs have not met with such success as they desire, and it is possible that all the members of that committee will desire to present their views singly and separately to the Senate. I rise, however, not for that purpose, but merely to say that it is within my knowledge that the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] not now in his seat, wishes to address the Senate on this subject, and as there are but a few minutes intervening between the present time and the time the Senate ordinarily adjourns, and as it will be impossible for us to dispose of the subject to-day, I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

I move to take up the bill "authorizing an exploration and reconnoissance of the courses of navigation used by whaling vessels in the regions of Behring's Straits; and also of such parts of the China Sea, Straits of Gaspar, and Java Sea, as lie directly in the route of vessels proceeding to and from China." The Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] has prepared a substitute for the whole bill, which I think will pass without any objection.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill as in Committee of the Whole. The question pending was upon the amendment of Mr. SEWARD, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, to cause an exploration and reconnoissance to be made, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, of the track of navigation pursued by whaling vessels in the region of Behring's Straits, and also of such parts of the China sea, the Straits of Gaspar, and Java sea, as lie directly in the route of vessels proceeding from Atlantic or Pacific American ports to China and Japan; and that for this purpose the President is authorized and requested to provide one or more suitable vessels, or assign them from vessels now in the Navy, and such officers of the Navy and Army of the United States as shall be necessary; and the sum of $125,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense of carrying this act into execution.

Sec. 2. And he is further enacted, That this act shall continue in force two years.

Mr. BUTLER. I regard this as a question of some importance. Though I have great confidence in my friend from Virginia, I would prefer to have more time to consider the matter. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from New York, by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting—

The President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to cause an exploration and reconnoissance to be made, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, of the seas in the vicinity of Behring's Straits that are frequented by the whaling vessels of the United States, and also of such parts of the China seas and Pacific ocean as lie in the route of vessels trading to and from China; and for this purpose, the President of the United States is authorized and requested to provide, either by building or buying, a screw steamer of suitable dimensions, and two small sailing vessels of two or three hundred tons burden, properly appointed, officered, and manned from the Navy; and the sum of $125,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act: Provided, That the expense of purchasing, or equipping, and of fitting out these vessels, shall not exceed the sum of money herein appropriated: And provided, further, That the appropriation shall be confined to a reconnoissance for nautical and commercial purposes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I do not rise to make a speech, for I fear that I do not fully understand the object of the proposed expedition. I come from a part of the country where both people and representatives are, necessarily, less informed upon these subjects than gentlemen who reside upon the Atlantic coast, and in those parts of the United States where naval armaments and maritime expeditions are habitually fitted out; but I have been here several years, and have heard such things discussed, and I listened the other day as attentively as I could to the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] when he presented his views at considerable length upon this subject. All I have been able to learn, however, during that time, and even what I listened to last week of the very learned and eloquent speech of the honorable Senator from New York, has failed to inform me, satisfactorily, as to the real character and objects of this expedition. We were told that it is to "explore the seas." Why, sir, are our ships not exploring the seas every day? Are not the ships of our commercial marine—are not our ships-of-war—are not our whaling ships, themselves, to which this proposition more particularly relates, constantly and most effectively exploring the very seas in question? But, sir, to fit out an expedition for this exclusive and special business, is a novel proposition to me, and I do not understand precisely what it is, how it is to be accomplished, or what for. I wish some Senator to explain all this to me. When I have been duly enlightened by those who know all about it, I shall be prepared to vote. Possibly, I may be constrained to vote for the proposition; but if I do, it will be after I have been indoctrinated, and taught not only how, but "the why and wherefore." Is the purpose of the expedition to search out and explore new bays and harbors, bordering upon unknown seas, or to find and determine the haunts of the whale? If I heard the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] aright the other day, he said we were to engage in some great hunting expedition—"a mighty chase." I think he called it—not a chase of the deer, or the wolf, or the fox, or the 'coon, but it was to be the "chase of the whale!"

If this be so, then I suppose the proposition, in plain terms, is to authorize the President of the United States to build, or buy, or fit out, ships to engage in whale fishing. Is that the proposition? If it be, then say so in so many words, and we shall all understand it at once. In this supposition, I may be altogether wide of the mark; but, as the Senator from New York is the only one who has spoken to the bill, and undertaken to explain it, and as he certainly characterizes it as a "chase of the whale," I know not how else to understand it. If this be the proposition, I am opposed to it. If not—what is it? Let some one tell me. I am perfectly willing to afford our fishermen, whether of little fish or big fish, of seals or whales, of cod fish or mackarel, whether they go after whalebone or whale oil, the same facilities and protection we give to persons engaged in any other branch of business. But I am unwilling that this Government itself shall turn fisherman, and fit out vessels to chase the whale. As a branch of business it may be very profitable, and as sport it may be very noble and inspiring; but, at present, I think we have "other fish to fry."

In all seriousness, I need information, and hope some Senator will give it to me.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, I understand that the object of this survey is for the purpose of making charts for the use of our whalers about Behring's Straits, and for vessels on their voyages to the China seas. Both of them are dangerous and difficult routes. It is for the purpose of ascertaining the difficulties in the way and pointing them out on charts. This is especially important, I understand, to the whalers, as a great many losses have occurred owing to the fact that the ships had no charts to guide them. It is also important to the China trade to have some such charts. It might be that this expedition would discover coal on some of the islands in the Pacific ocean, which would be a matter of great importance to vessels engaged in the China trade. The purpose is so limited by the appropriation that it cannot cost much. The whole expense of the expedition is limited to $125,000. This exploration will be useful for commercial purposes. It seems to me that for that amount of money we could obtain a great deal of information which would enable the whaler to follow his business in safety, and enable us to give safe charts to vessels engaged in the China trade.

Mr. BORLAND. I rose for the purpose of obtaining information, and I have got it. It is precisely what I expected to get when I made the inquiry. The proposition, then, is to appropriate $125,000 out of the Treasury of the United States—for what? For the facility and safety of commerce.

The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] with his usual candor, has answered me promptly, and clearly, and pointedly. "To facilitate commerce!" Ay, that is it, sir. "To facilitate commerce!" To enable the whalers to pursue the business in safety, by finding out and marking for them, the haunts of their fish, and the true channels of their navigation.

Now, sir, I make this point, and I call the attention of the Senate to it, and particularly the attention of the Senator from Virginia. And I ask him how he reconciles the proposition now made by himself with the opposition which he and those whom he usually leads, have ever, and invariably offered, to all the propositions we have made, "to facilitate commerce," and enable the steamers on our western waters to navigate them in safety? When we propose to appropriate some $50,000 or $100,000, or it may be only $25,000, to remove dangerous snags, or impassable bars, from the greatest rivers in the world; and give safety to an annual commerce of $500,000,000, carried on in more than one thousand steamers, and by one hundred thousand navigators, we are met with the objection that it is "unconstitutional!" that there is no rightful power in the General Government to appropriate a dollar "to facilitate commerce" upon the great Mississippi and all her great tributaries, and made their navigation safe. Now, that very Senator who has been the leader of the opposition to such measures as these, himself comes forward and proposes to appropriate $125,000 to buy or build ships, to send out in search of new channels of commerce—ay, sir, "to facilitate commerce," and make "navigation safe," from shoals and rocks; to explore far-distant and unknown seas! While to our own great commerce, upon our own "inland seas," he will not vote a dollar! Sir, I asked for information, and I have got it. I commend it to the notice and appreciation of the Senate and the country—especially to that country, "the great West," from which I come. I wish them, now they have heard it, to "make a note of it." For the present, I have not another word to say.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 2, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. FAULKNER. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to have a correction made in the Journal of this House. Some days ago I submitted, by the unanimous consent of the House, a report from the Committee on Military Affairs, asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the State of Virginia asking to have refunded to her money advanced by her to Mexican volunteers, and I moved that the memorial and report be laid upon the table and printed. The only notice taken on the Journal is of my asking to be discharged from the consideration of the memorial. No notice is taken of the motion to lay upon the table and print. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have the Journal corrected.

The SPEAKER. The correction can only be made, at this time, by unanimous consent. If there be no objection, the report to which the gentleman refers will be ordered to lie upon the table and be printed.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

ACTUAL SETTLERS ON THE LINE OF THE CHICAGO AND MOBILE RAILROAD.

Mr. FICKLIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up from the Speaker's table

House bill No. 3, granting preemption rights to the settlers on the line of the Chicago and Mobile Railroad, in order that a small amendment, which has been made by the Senate thereto, may be concurred in. It is a matter of great importance that the amendment should be concurred in immediately. It is an amendment restricting the bill as it passed this House, and I presume no gentleman will object to it.

There being no objection, the bill was taken up from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

WRECK OF THE SLOOP GEORGIANA.

Mr. RICHARDSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish to this House all the information and correspondence in his possession in relation to the shipwreck of the American sloop Georgiana, on the east coast of Queen Charlotte's Island, and the subsequent fitting out of an expedition for their relief by the collector of customs for the district of Puget's Sound, and what provision, if any, has been made to defray the expenses of said expedition.

THE FIVE MINUTES RULE.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read. I have shown it to nearly all the members of the Committee on Rules, and it meets with their approbation.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That for the remainder of the present session it shall be in the power of a majority, at any time, to suspend so much of the 34th rule as allows five minutes' debate on amendments after general debate has been closed.

Mr. ORR. I object to the introduction of that resolution.

Mr. JONES. Then I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order during the morning hour.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. MEADE. I ask that the joint resolution, fixing a day for the adjournment of the present session of Congress, may be taken up and acted on by the House.

Mr. STUART. I object.

Mr. MEADE. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order during the morning hour.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

Mr. HASCALL, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill "to amend an act entitled 'An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States,' approved March 3, 1851, and for other purposes," which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

BOUNTY LANDS TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. PHELPS called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated that the business before the House was House bill No. 120, "authorizing 'certain soldiers in the last war with Great Britain to surrender the bounty lands drawn by 'them and to locate others in lieu thereof,'" and that the pending question was to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope the motion to commit may be withdrawn, as I desire to submit an amendment to the bill in the nature of a substitute, which I believe will obviate all the objections which have been urged to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The question must first be taken on the motion to refer the bill. The gentleman who made that motion is not present to withdraw it.

Mr. St. MARTIN called for tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. FOWLER, and JOHNSON of Georgia, appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 59.

Mr. STUART. I demand the yeas and nays. We had this bill up on Saturday, and discussed it until apparently the House understood it, and were prepared to vote upon it.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I call the gentleman to order. I desire to know if it is in order to discuss this question while the House is being divided upon it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] interrupted the House while it was dividing, and called for the yeas and nays. The Chair thinks it is in order to discuss it.

Mr. CLEVELAND. The House were in the act of dividing when the gentleman from Michigan called for the yeas and nays, and commenced to debate the question. Now, I cannot see by what right the gentleman can be allowed to discuss the question in this stage of proceedings.

The SPEAKER. It is for the House to suspend its division upon the call for the yeas and nays, and if they are ordered, it is in order to continue the discussion. They were, however, not ordered, and perhaps it is not exactly regular for the gentleman to discuss the bill at this precise moment; but the Chair thinks it is not out of order.

Mr. STUART. I will endeavor to keep myself in order. I am very glad the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] raised the question on me. I propose to make a statement, to which I ask the attention of the House.

Mr. GOODRICH. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. STUART. I am very glad to hear gentlemen call me to order, because I shall the more likely have their attention to the statement I desire to make. I was proceeding to say we discussed this question on Saturday morning, until the House apparently understood it, and was prepared to vote upon it. But now, this morning, when the question comes up, and the bill is understood, instead of voting upon it, what do we propose to do? Why, to send it again to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—the same we have been doing for the last eight months. Yet gentlemen will complain, day after day, that we are doing no business. We get up a subject, and discuss it until every gentleman is prepared to give his vote for or against it, and then somebody moves to send it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which buries it forever; and we go on to the discussion of something else, which we do not understand. Now, here is a subject legitimately and fairly before the House, and I submit whether our duty will not be better discharged by acting upon this bill now? If a majority of the House is against the bill, let us defeat it by a direct vote; or, if a majority of the House be in favor of the bill, let us pass it. I submit these views with perfect deference. I complain of the course of no gentlemen, either individually or collectively; I state the fact, that months of the present session have been consumed in just such operations as this—first discussing a question until we understand it perfectly, and then sending it to the Committee of the Whole, where it will remain beyond our reach.

Now, sir, the bill can be comprehended in a moment. It simply proposes to give to soldiers who draw their military lands by lot, when they are worthless and unfit for cultivation, the privilege of selecting other Government lands which are fit for cultivation, in their stead. That is all there is in this bill, and any gentleman can determine in one instant. You have given these old soldiers of the war of 1812, lands that are good for nothing, and always were good for nothing. Now, will you give him what you purported to give, and what you intended to give him in the first instance?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Is not the greater portion of these lands in the hands of speculators?

Mr. STUART. They are not, and speculators cannot get hold of the lands which will be affected by this bill. It affects the soldier himself or his legal representative, only. The question is simply whether this Government will carry out in good faith, and do what it intended to do in the first instance, or whether it will refuse to do it. That is the question, and I want a vote upon it. I do not want the subject again sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I want the Congress of the country to say whether they mean to act in good faith, or whether they mean to hold out false hopes to these old soldiers, and then for their convenience, send this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Are not the soldiers' lands of the war of 1812, assignable already?

Mr. STUART. I undertake to say that this bill will relieve those only who have drawn lands by lot which are worthless, and the patents for which they hold.

A MEMBER. I desire to ask the gentleman if a large portion of these lands are not in the hands of speculators in other States?

Mr. STUART. I will state again that this bill is designed only to relieve the soldiers themselves, or their legal representatives, and cannot apply to those patents which are in the hands of speculators.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I ask that the bill be read.

It was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. CAMPBELL. There is one matter which I should like to have explained connected with the lands drawn by the soldiers under that law. The great difficulty now which those soldiers have to contend with, is this: Their lands have been sold for taxes. Now, if I understand this bill, it does not provide for cases of that kind. They are to surrender their patents upon proof being made to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that their lands are not fit for cultivation. But nearly all the soldiers holding these lands—at least those who resided out of the States where they were located—have been divested of their titles, the lands having been sold for taxes, and they are now in the hands of third persons. Now, I desire to know what will be done with these lands where the tax title is held by a third party under the laws of the different States?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to say, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] that this bill was drawn after the law of 1848. That law extended only to the military district of Arkansas. The Land Office requires under that law, that the party shall prove that he has not divested himself of his title.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is not coming to the point.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will reach it in a minute. He must prove that there is no incumbrance upon the lands, and that the lands have not been sold for taxes. The instructions of the Department upon this subject require the certificate of the auditor of the State, and the certificates of the recorder and clerk of the county in which the land lies, to prove these facts. The bill now before the House says nothing upon this subject; but it is drawn in the very language of the law of 1848. The Department have made these instructions with regard to that law; but to obviate the objection of some gentlemen to this portion of the bill, I will say that if the House will not refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but will keep it before the House, it may be amended. I am willing to accept any amendment which shall be offered to remove this objection.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] if he knows of a single, solitary instance in his own State where a soldier has drawn a lot of land under this law which is unfit for cultivation?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will answer the gentleman with great pleasure. I know a man in my district, who was promised by the Government, under the laws of 1811 and 1812, one hundred and sixty acres of land, fit for cultivation; that was the language of that law. I know that that soldier received his land by lot; that the patent was issued, and he knew nothing of it, in 1819; that the land was located in Missouri; and that when he came to examine it there were but two acres in the whole tract fit for cultivation—one hundred and fifty-eight acres were covered with water.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Has he ever paid taxes upon it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say to the gentleman that he will have to prove to the Department that there are no taxes due upon it. The soldier I speak of never knew there was a patent issued for him until 1849. It was made out at the Land Office, and there remained. He knew nothing of it.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I ask the gentleman if this is the only instance of which he knows, either in Indiana or any of the western States?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That one instance is enough, in my opinion, to demand the action of Congress upon the subject.

Mr. CLEVELAND. But I desire to know if that is the only instance?

Mr. STUART. I cannot yield longer. I will relieve the gentleman by taking the floor.

In reply to the question of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] I will state what I said upon Saturday, that this bill was designed to relieve only those who have received lands from the Government which is unfit for cultivation. Well, now, what does it avail in the way of argument, if this land, unfit for cultivation, has been sold for taxes? I want to know if it makes any difference in the argument, or in the effect we intended, for the soldier? We intended to give him land fit for cultivation; and he is required to prove that his land is unfit for cultivation before he can avail himself of any benefit under this bill. Now, is it any answer to say that this land has been sold for taxes? Why, sir, it was good for nothing in the first place. It was not what we intended to give him; and suppose it has been sold for taxes, is that any reason why we should not give him what we intended to give him in the first place?

But if it is necessary to amend this bill in any particular, is there a better time to do it than now? Is it best to discuss the bill a couple of hours, until we come to understand it well, and then refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? Can you discuss it better there than here? Let us decide it to-day, whether we will give anything to those soldiers or not. Let us decide whether we will do justice to them or not. Shall we pass them by, or shall we not? That is the question I want to see settled. If it is necessary to amend the bill when it comes up before the House for its action, let it be amended. It is under the control of a majority of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I am anxious that the bill now under discussion shall be voted upon by the House; but I am satisfied that the bill has not been understood fully by the House heretofore. It is necessary, we are told, that the party shall prove that his land is unfit for cultivation. Now, that is a matter about which there may be a difference of opinion, and the provisions proposed to be made to prove that fact are exceedingly indefinite. One man might consider land as unfit for cultivation, and another might not consider it as such. And in reference to these lands being sold for taxes, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] speaks of a certain construction which has been given to the law of 1848. Now, I want the law fixed so that the courts shall determine its construction, and not the Department. When the title to land is brought up, I want it to be decided by the courts, and not upon any construction the head of a Department may choose to give it. I want this law to be definite and clear upon this subject. You will find that nearly all these lands, at least in my own State, have been sold because the taxes have not been paid. The patent is held by the original patentee, but the title is in the hands of a third person. I desire to have a provision in the law to provide for this class of titles; and until such a provision is made, I cannot vote for the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to say again, that if there is any objection made to this bill upon the ground that it does not meet the class of cases the gentleman speaks of, I am willing that it should be amended in that particular. There can be no objection to that amendment. But I ask the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] if the land has been sold for taxes, how can the parties convey it to the Government, in the language of the bill? I am willing to receive the amendment, however, that there may be no objection to the bill.

Mr. STUART. I do not rise for the purpose of preventing an amendment being made to the bill, but I rise for the purpose of entering my protest against this manner of considering bills. Now, I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAMPBELL] whether, for the purpose of getting in his amendment, it is best to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, a place where it will never again be reached this session? The bill is now before the House, or will be if this motion be refused. Let us consider it. Let us put upon it our amendment, if the gentleman is not satisfied with the construction of the Department and the construction everybody puts upon it. Let the gentleman put upon the bill an amendment of his own. I do not object to it; but I ask, sir, again, that we shall consider the bill now.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask for the previous question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the previous question will extend beyond the motion to commit to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It will bring the House to a vote, first, upon recommitting the bill, and then, upon the amendments.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I trust there will be a general consent that the amendments, which seem to be required by some gentlemen, may be made to the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. No one objects.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I suggest that the amendment be inserted in the proper place.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] will withdraw his call for the previous question for a few moments only.

Mr. HOUSTON. This bill has been discussed long enough. I understand that the benefits to be derived from this bill, if we agree to it, will go to the old soldiers, and to them alone.

Mr. ORR. If the previous question is persisted in I shall move that the bill do lie upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] proposes, by general consent, the amendment which—

Mr. JENKINS. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman's point of order. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask that the amendment may be put into the bill, if there is no objection.

Mr. MASON. I object.

The question being upon the motion of Mr. ORR, to lay the bill upon the table—

Mr. CLEVELAND demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. LANDRY and MASON appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—yeas 64, noes 61.

Before the result was announced—

Mr. HENDRICKS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MASON. There seems to be a misunderstanding as to the question.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon laying the bill upon the table.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 75, nays 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, Babcock, Beale, Bissell, John H. Boyd, Briggs, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chapman, Chastain, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Colcock, Conger, Cullom, Curtis, Dean, Dismick, Dockery, Duncan, Floyd, Gentry, Giddings, Sampson W. Harris, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hibbard, Hillyer, Horsford, John W. Howe, Ingersoll, Ives, Jenkins, James Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Mann, Martin, McNair, McQueen, Miner, John Moore, Morehead, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Orr, Outlaw, Perkins, Robie, Ross, Sackett, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Stanley, Thaddeus Stevens, Thurston, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Welch, Wells, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Williams—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, William Appleton, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrero, Bennett, Boocock, Breckinridge, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Cobb, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Doty, Duham, Eastman, Edmundson, Evans, Ewing, Faulkner, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Gamble, Gaylord, Gilmore, Goodenow, Green, Grey, Hamilton, Houston, Thomas M. Howe, Thos. F. How, Hunter, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, Geo. G. King, Kuins, McLanahan, McMullin, Meade, Milson, Molony, Murphy, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Phelps, Polk, Rantoul, Kiddle, Schermerhorn, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Alexander H. Stephens, St. Martin, Stratton, Strother, Stuart, Townshend, Walsh, Watkins, Addison White, and Alexander White—89.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not, by one minute.

Mr. MEADE. I understand the question is upon seconding the demand for the previous question. I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] to withdraw his call for the previous question for a moment. My object in asking the previous question to be withdrawn—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] declines to withdraw it, and debate is out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am willing to hear the gentleman, but I do not feel at liberty to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is not withdrawn, debate is out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. But I am willing to hear the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. That does not alter the case, if the previous question is not withdrawn.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask for tellers upon seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

DAY OF ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the resolution, returned from the Senate with amendments, fixing the day of adjournment.

[Cries of "Good!" "Good!" "Good!"]

The SPEAKER. Is it objected to?

Mr. STANLY. It is. I object to it.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I move that the rules be suspended to allow it to be taken up.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is not a motion which I made last Monday, to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering a resolution, still pending?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recollect the fact, but he is informed by the Clerk that it is so.

Mr. JONES. I now offer the resolution I send to the Clerk's table, in lieu of the one I desired to offer last Monday. It is a modification of the first resolution, and I ask the rules may be suspended for the purpose of offering it.

Mr. ORR. What was the original resolution?

The SPEAKER. Both resolutions will be read.

The original resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the five-minutes rule be suspended, so far as relates to the bill of the House No. 182, (river and harbor bill,) from eleven o'clock to-morrow.

The modified resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That for the remainder of the present session, it shall be in the power of the majority, at any time, to suspend so much of the thirty-fourth rule as allows five minutes' debate on amendments; after general debate has closed.

Mr. ORR. Can the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] take the floor from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to introduce that general resolution, having no connection with his?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee nearest the Chair, [Mr. HARRIS,] was not entitled to the floor, for the reason that this proposition to suspend the rules was laid over from last Monday.

Mr. MEADE. I rise to a question of order. That resolution was offered on Monday last, I understand, and in reference to a subject which has been disposed of by the House, and the resolution then offered is not now applicable to any subject whatever, and I should say it had died a natural death. The original resolution contemplated a suspension of the rules to limit debate upon the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to withdraw his motion to suspend the rules for one purpose, and submit a motion to suspend them for a very different purpose. It is a question about which there can be no doubt at all. It is a question as to an amendment of the original resolution. His right to withdraw his original motion is very clear, and his right of submitting another, being a modification of the first, is equally clear.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. Is it in order to alter the standing rules of this House without one day's notice?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, unless the House chooses to suspend the rules for that purpose.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This resolution is merely to place it in the power of the majority of the House to terminate five minutes' debate.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to make an inquiry. If this resolution shall be adopted will it not put it in the power of the majority of this House to prevent the offering of amendments to this bill?

Many MEMBERS. Not at all; not at all.

Mr. CARTTER. It only cuts off discussion.

Mr. ORR. I feel constrained to call for the yeas and nays upon this question. I do not like the initiative.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and the result was—yeas 85, nays 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, William Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Bennett, Breckinridge, Brenton, Briggs, George H. Brown, Burrows, Busby, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chastain, Cleveland, Clingman, Cullom, Curtis, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dismick, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Dunham, Eastman, Ficklin, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Goodnow, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Haws, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Hubbard, Hillyer, Horsford, Houston, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Ives, Andrew Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Kurtz, Letcher, McLanahan, John Moore, Murphy, Murray, Olds, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Perkins, Phelps, Polk, Richardson, Robie, Schermerhorn, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Stanley, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Stratton, Stuart, Thurston, Wallace, Walsh, Wilcock, and Yates—85.

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, John Appleton, Averett, Babcock, Barrere, Beale, Bissell, Biscoe, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Albert G. Brown, Lewis D. Campbell, Clark, Cobb, Colcock, Daniel Edmundson, Evans, Ewing, Faulkner, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Gamble, Giddings, Gilmore, Goodrich, Green, Grey, Harper, Henn, Holladay, Howard, Thomas J. How, Ingersoll, Jackson, Jenkins, James Johnson, John Johnson, Kuhns, Landry, Mace, Mann, Martin, Mason, McCorkle, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Milson, Molony, Morehead, Nabers, Newton, Orr, Ross, Sackett, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Senry, Origen S. Seymour, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Townshend, Venable, Walbridge, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Addison White, Alex. White, and Williams—78.

So the rules were not suspended.

ADJOURNMENT RESOLUTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I move that the rules of the House be suspended for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution fixing a time for the final adjournment of Congress.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. SACKETT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. CARTTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. As discussion has been objected to, it cannot be indulged by the Chair.

Mr. SACKETT. I wish to know whether the land distribution bill had been acted upon by the Senate?

[Cries all over the Hall of "I object!" "I object!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to all discussion.

Mr. STANLY. Is it in order to inquire whether the river and harbor bill has been passed?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CARTTER. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rules for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put upon the motion to suspend the rules, and it was agreed to—yeas 123, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, Averett, Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Bissell, Biscoe, Bowie, Briggs, Breckinridge, Brenton, Briggs, Burrows, Busby, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chastain, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Colcock, Curtis, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dismick, Dunham, Evans, Ewing, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmore, Goodnow, Goodrich, Green, Grey, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hascall, Haven, Hendricks, Hubbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Horsford, Houston, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Milson, Molony, Morehead, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Orr, Samuel W. Parker, Perkins, Polk, Richardson, Robie, Ross, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, Thurston, Townshend, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Watkins, Wells, Wilcox, Wilcock, and Yates—123.

YEAS—Messrs. William Appleton, Barrere, Bennett, George H. Brown, E. Carrington Cabell, Cobb, Conger, Cullom, Daniel Disney, Doty, Duncan, Eastman, Florence, Floyd, Harper, Haws, Henn, Thomas J. How, George W. Jones, George G. King, Kuhns, Mace, McCorkle, Miner, John Moore, Outlaw, Pennington, Phelps, Rantoul, Riddle, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Scudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Stanley, Strother, Stuart, Sutherland, Walsh, Welch, Addison White, Alex. White, and Williams—45.

So the motion to suspend the rules was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Senate have made the following amendment to the joint resolution fixing the time for the final adjournment of Congress:

"Resolved, That the Senate concur in the resolution of the House of Representatives with the following amendment, viz: Strike out the words 'Monday the 16th,' and insert 'Tuesday the 31st.'"

So that the final adjournment, if the amendment of the Senate be concurred in by the House, would be Tuesday, 31st of August, instead of Monday, the 16th of August.

Mr. HARRIS. I call for the previous question upon the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. STANLY. I hope the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will be allowed to state whether we can get through by that time or not.

A MEMBER. I object.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put. The question was then put, and the amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the vote adopting the Senate amendment be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House—and if that be not granted I shall move a suspension of the rules for the purpose—to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs "An act to provide for the protection of the Territories of New Mexico, Utah, and Oregon, and the States of Texas and California."

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. I object.

Mr. BISSELL. I move a suspension of the rules to enable me to make the report.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I understand that this matter has never been before a committee of the House at all.

Mr. CLARK. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion for the suspension of the rules.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then put, and the motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

FEES OF MARSHALS, CLERKS, ETC.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Whereas it is believed, as a measure of retrenchment and reform, House Bill No. 146, entitled "A bill to regulate fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," will promote the administration of justice, equalize the compensation of public officers in the several districts of the United States, and save to the Government about $200,000 annually; therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to report said bill, with the amendments thereto, to the House of Representatives, to-morrow during the morning hour.

Mr. HOWARD. I object.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I move a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of enabling me to present it.

The question was put, and the motion to suspend the rules was agreed to.

The resolution was then submitted and adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business upon the Speaker's table. My object is to get at the French spoliation bill.

[Cries of "That is right!" "That is right!"]

Mr. HAMILTON demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union; which were not ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is my intention, if we shall go into committee, to move to take up one of the appropriation bills.

The question was put upon the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and upon a division there were—ayes 72, noes 55.

Mr. BAYLY. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, and HAMILTON, were appointed.

The question was again put, and the motion was agreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 78, noes 51.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Phelps in the chair.)

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to take up the amendments of the Senate to the Military Academy bill.

The question was put, and the motion agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The first amendment of the Senate is as follows:

"After line 14th, to insert—'For a riding hall, $12,000.'"

Mr. EVANS. I was not aware until now that the provision which has just been read had been put into the bill by the Senate. I am glad that it has been, and had I been in the House when the bill was under consideration heretofore, I should have submitted it myself. The Committee of Ways and Means report a disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, but I trust its disagreement will not be concurred in. It is absolutely necessary that a riding hall should be kept up there; because for portions of the year it is utterly impossible for the young men of the Military Academy, on account of the weather, to attend to the cavalry exercise. I have visited that Academy within the last five months myself, and have been assured by its officers that a riding hall of the character contemplated is indispensable. There is no reason in the world why they should say so, for exercise in the open air is preferred when the weather is fair. The present riding hall is inefficient for the purposes for which it was intended. Many of the cadets have been seriously injured in exercising in it. I would not only provide for the construction of a suitable riding hall—I would go further—I would provide that there should be established there a gymnasium. I would, looking to the military schools of Europe, see that the young men of the Military Academy were properly instructed in athletic exercises. Athletic exercise is greatly required there.

Perhaps, also, the term of service should be extended for another year. Every one who has perused the charming notes of Sir Francis Head—his "Faggot of French Sticks," knows that gymnastic exercise, in the French service, is required as regularly of the officers and troops as any part of the drill, or infantry tactics. The consequence is, that they acquire physical vigor, and power to endure fatigue beyond other officers and troops.

I would not reject this appropriation for the riding hall, but I would add to it an amendment to appropriate money for building a hall for gymnastic and athletic exercises. There is no reason why gentlemen should make objection to this riding hall.

Mr. CARTTER. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman. Does the amendment provide that this hall shall be carpeted?

Mr. EVANS. Yes, sir, with good tan bark. I do not know what sort of an idea the gentleman has in his mind. I apprehend that he is one of the gentlemen who think that officers and troops ought not to be instructed to ride. The system of riding where the broader the base the firmer the foundation, and where the rider gets his foot up to the heels in the stirrup, may do very well in his country, but will not do in battle. If you wish to make good riders, and good cavalry officers, you must give them thorough instruction. To effect this object, it requires thorough and daily practice, in order to make them perfectly experienced riders. During a great part of the year it is impossible to ride out of doors, and all must know that when the plain is favorable for such purposes, the riding is in the open air. This appropriation is not for the benefit of cadets alone, but for the advantage of the people. It is really required, and the Committee of Ways and Means ought not to have rejected it. Instead of rejecting an amendment which provides for giving experience to men educated at this Academy, we ought to hold out every inducement for their proper instruction. We ought either to make the practice thoroughly efficient, or do away with the system altogether. We ought not to leave the system in an unsettled state, and so far from rejecting an amendment of this kind, providing the proper conveniences for riding, the Committee on Military Affairs ought to go on and add to the capabilities of the institution, and they should require a more thorough and efficient course of study than now exists, especially in those exercises which give vigor to the human frame, and efficiency to our troops and officers. There is not the slightest necessity for rejecting this amendment, and I am clearly of the opinion that an appropriation should be made for this riding hall. I have been frequently at West Point, and I have examined into this matter. I have conversed with the officers there in relation to the necessity for this appropriation, and I find that there was an universal opinion in its favor. I trust that it may also meet with the favor of this House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The Committee of Ways and Means recommended a non-concurrence in this amendment. I do not suppose that the committee have any feeling about this matter, but as one member of the committee, I have yet to be satisfied that it is right to make an appropriation for a hall at the Military Academy, where the boys can learn to ride. I take it for granted that instructing them to ride in this hall by rule will not teach them to ride upon the mountains and prairies, where they will have to chase down the Indians. If you wish to teach them to ride, let them be engaged in the practical service of the country in the open air; and if you wish to invigorate and develop their systems, it would be much better done in the open air upon horseback than under cover or any place prepared for that purpose.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question—whether or not the visiting committees at West Point, who have been there upon the ground year after year, are not supposed to be influenced by proper motives in recommending such an appropriation as necessary and proper?

Mr. JONES. I will answer that question. I presume the visiting committee are gentlemen supposed to be friends and admirers of that institution, who wish to build it up. When they go there they know but little of it. Many of them, when they go there and converse with the professors and teachers of that establishment, become infatuated, and sustain everything which these professors recommend as being useful or ornamental about the establishment. The appropriation for a riding hall has been proposed for years, and I suppose that it will finally pass. I presume that the Senate will have a committee of conference upon this bill, and that this amendment will be inserted.

Mr. EVANS. I wish to remark that we have already a riding hall there, although it is a very bad one. We cannot support horses for every young man there. There are but thirty horses; you cannot, therefore, teach all the young men to ride.

Mr. JONES. I suppose that the committee understands this matter now; and in order to prevent any extended debate, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing the general debate upon the amendments.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The committee then rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the Senate amendments to House bill No. 87, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy at West Point, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move the usual resolution terminating debate in five minutes after the consideration of this bill shall be again resumed in committee; and also that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House when the amendments shall have been disposed of.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. JONES, the House again resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the Military Academy bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is on concurring in the amendment appropriating $12,000 for a riding hall.

Mr. EVANS demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER and MOLONY were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 61.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the second amendment, "for improvements and additions to officers' quarters, $3,000."

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment. Since that I have seen the chairman of the Finance Committee in the Senate, and have had some conversation with him upon the subject, and he is very clearly of opinion that it should be passed, and I think he is probably correct in that opinion.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment of the Senate was read by the Clerk, as follows:

"For additional pay to the lithographer and pressmen in the lithographic office, $50 each—$100."

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee of Ways and Means recommends that the House concur in this amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think those two persons are soldiers, who have been employed upon that lithographic work for some time, and this amendment only proposes to give them each $50 per annum in addition to their pay as soldiers.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

"Provided, That the Superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point may be selected by the President of the United States from any corps in the Army of the United States."

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the amendment which was adopted by the House at the instance of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL.] The Senate have stricken it out. I understand that the gentleman himself is disposed to concur with the Senate, and the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment of the Senate was read by the Clerk, as follows:

"Add as a new section to the end of the bill, the following:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That hereafter the Assistant Professor of French and Drawing shall receive the pay and emoluments allowed to other assistant officers."

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of Ways and Means recommends a concurrence in this amendment of the Senate.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment of the Senate was read by the Clerk, as follows:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That to rectify a mistake which was made in the enrollment of the bill, entitled 'An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the services during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852,' by omitting a clause appropriating per diem compensation and mileage for Senators, members of the House of Representatives and Delegates, agreed to by the Senate and House of Representatives, the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated for that object out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. HOUSTON. That is a provision that was passed in the deficiency bill, but through a mistake of a Clerk in this House, it was left out in the enrollment of the bill. This is intended to rectify the mistake of that Clerk.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. That was a righteous mistake.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee what this $50,000 is for?

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment expresses what it is for. It is for the purpose of paying the per diem and mileage of the Senators and Representatives of Congress especially.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Is there any per diem in it?

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment says it is for the payment of per diem and mileage.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Is there any provision for the payment of per diem?

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment contains the words "mileage and per diem."

Mr. CLEVELAND. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, whether he does not know the fact, that this $50,000, or a portion of it, was taken by Senators for constructive mileage for services they never rendered in any form?

Mr. HOUSTON. There is not a member of this committee who does not understand that amendment—not one. It was discussed at some length on two occasions previously, and although the majority of the House agreed to pass it, yet upon the enrollment of the bill, some Clerk of this House left it out. It is the same amendment that was discussed on the deficiency bill, on two occasions, in this House. There is no part of it goes to pay constructive mileage. Not a dime of it; but it goes to pay Senators their per diem and mileage, who are now in the Senate, but who did not get their mileage out of the last appropriation, because of the fact that the constructive mileage had been paid out of the former appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I would like to ask the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee one question. He seems to be very diplomatic upon this amendment. He says not a dollar of this goes to pay constructive mileage. I wish to ask him the question directly, whether it does not go to supply a deficiency that was created by the taking of constructive mileage?

Mr. HOUSTON. If my friend had paid any attention to my last answer to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. CLEVELAND,] he would have seen that I answered precisely the question he now asks.

Mr. JOHNSON. What was your answer?

Mr. HOUSTON. I said, in my remark to the gentleman from Connecticut, that this was to pay Senators who are now in their seats discharging their duties; but that last year's appropriation has been diminished by the taking of constructive mileage, and therefore it becomes necessary to pass this amendment. But will the gentleman undertake to say that a Senator who has come in since—because his predecessors took constructive mileage—must be made to serve for nothing? Take, for instance, the two Senators from Mississippi. The Senators from Mississippi had nothing to do with that constructive mileage. They did not take a dime of it. They were not here; but the mileage was taken by others; and are we to punish them by refusing to pay them their mileage and per diem because those who were in the Senate before them had committed error or wrong? I think the House has already settled the matter.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I hold it to be the duty of this House, if there has been an appropriation made by the Senate improperly, contrary to law and justice, and for their own personal benefit, to say that they never shall have the money to replenish the fund improperly exhausted. I hold it to be the duty of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to ask a question of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire if this debate is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. There is about a minute or two of the time of the gentleman from Connecticut remaining.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Connecticut, supposing this money was wasted in the last session, whether we can get it at all, or recover it by hunting for it in this way?

Mr. CLEVELAND. We can do this, and this we ought to do,—we owe it to the country to do it: Instead of having the matter hushed up, we can expose the men who thus robbed the Treasury without law and without right. We can expose them to the country, and let the country see their names; and if we are faithful and fearless Representatives, we shall do so, no matter whether they are Senators, or claim agents, or anything else. The higher they are in office the more important it is that we should compel them to set a good example.

Mr. EVANS moved to amend the amendment by increasing the appropriation $1,000.

Mr. E. said: The only reason why I offer that amendment is, because the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] says that the Senate have acted contrary to law. I do not understand the law so. I understand the law to prohibit constructive mileage in future, and not to those gentlemen who received it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. What law ever gave it to them?

Mr. EVANS. That is another question. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Maryland that he must confine his remarks to his amendment.

Mr. EVANS. Constructive mileage has been taken ever since the foundation of the Government. It may be considered an unfair construction of the law. I do not give such a construction. I only state that a different construction has been put upon it for the first time by either House of Congress, now, or rather by the last Congress, when we passed a prospective act, and not a retrospective one. They took constructive mileage under the former law, as I understand it, and not under this law. They took it on the construction that had always been uniform, and had only been disavowed by one officer at the other end of the Capitol; and to say that they took it dishonestly and unfairly, and that their names ought to be exposed, is going too far. But even if it were so, you cannot recover the money now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to rule the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland to be out of order. He is not endeavoring to show the necessity of making $1,000 additional appropriation.

Mr. EVANS. I think I am. So far from diminishing it and cutting it down, I want to show why it is proper to increase it. I am told that some of the Senators did not take it who were entitled to it, and this increase to the appropriation will meet their case. You cannot get the money back. Fifty thousand dollars have been paid under a former and uniform construction, and you cannot recover it in any way. This is a proposition, as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has very properly said, to take money out of the pockets of A and B, because C and D have improperly received it. I wish it understood, however, that I am opposed to constructive mileage.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It is pretty hard to argue against that amendment; for when you come to the quantum of stealing it is pretty hard to say how much ought to be stolen. But in the first place, I cannot see why any portion of this sum should be granted.

Mr. SACKETT. I wish to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I wish to know whether this appropriation covers a certain sum taken by Senators at the rate of their per diem allowance for sickness during the vacation?

Mr. HOUSTON. Not that I know of. If it does, I do not know it.

Mr. SACKETT. I understand there are some large items of that kind.

Mr. HOUSTON. I presume there are not.

Mr. STEVENS. I go upon the ground that the whole of this is illegal. I can never vote for any such sum of money. It is to supply deficiencies which the Senate themselves have allowed to be taken out of the Treasury contrary to law.

Now, sir, I think the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] is mistaken when he says that this has been the uniform construction of the law, which has given mileage from the foundation of the Government. I think it is only about a dozen years since constructive mileage has been taken. A friend near me informs me that it is since about 1841. I can never vote to pay a man traveling from California here and back again $11,000, while he is sitting in that Chamber, and never moves from it except to his boarding-house.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is this debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition submitted by the gentleman from Maryland is to increase the appropriation $1,000; and in arguing against that increase of $1,000, the Chair supposes that an argument against the whole amount would be proper.

Mr. STEVENS. If the object is wrong, I may argue against the whole of it. Now, I shall never give my vote for any body to pay either in the shape of a deficiency, which is a cunning way of getting it, or in any other shape, members for traveling to the amount—some of them—of $11,000, when they have only traveled from here to their boarding-house. It is a fraud upon the Treasury of the United States. I have no hesitation in calling it a fraud. It is a violation of the plain letter of the law. It is a construction put upon it, not by both branches of the Government—for we have constantly rejected it—but put by a single branch of the Legislature, who allow themselves to take out of their contingent fund—

Mr. FITCH moved to add the following proviso to the Senate amendment:

Provided, That no constructive mileage shall be allowed hereafter.

Several MEMBERS. That is already the law.

Mr. FITCH. That is not the law. Gentlemen are very much mistaken if they suppose that the law prohibits entirely constructive mileage hereafter. There is a law prohibiting constructive mileage for every four years at the incoming of a new Administration, and at no other time.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman probably misunderstood me. I say the law giving mileage prevents anything but actual mileage.

Mr. FITCH. There is a difference of opinion between us and the Senate as to that matter.

[A message was here received from the Senate by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, informing the House of the passage of certain bills.]

Mr. FITCH, (resuming.) But whatever our opinion of the matter is, the Senate have put that construction upon the law, and the constructive mileage was drawn and allowed by the accounting officer at the last session.

As I before remarked, in speaking of this matter, in an amendment to one of the appropriation bills of the House, we forbade constructive mileage every fourth year—that is, upon the incoming of a new Administration. That law did not apply to the executive session of the last Congress. It will not apply to any executive session at the close of the alternate Congress, Senators being permitted still, under the construction of the old law to draw constructive mileage, if they think proper to do so, at such executive session. The object of this proviso is to exclude it altogether, so that it may at no time be drawn.

Now, as to the $50,000 amendment of the Senate, we have passed upon it in another bill. If we refuse to pass it now, it will not avail anything, because the constructive mileage has been drawn, and we have no power to compel those to whom it has been paid to restore it. More than that, there is a very great misunderstanding in relation to this constructive mileage. You see the names of Senators published as those who refused to take that constructive mileage, and great credit is claimed to them for that refusal. But do you find that they have filed written releases for that mileage? Far from it. On the contrary, their names are entered up as entitled to it, and they can get it at any time whenever they choose to call for it. It is an investment without interest for all time to come. This proviso, if it be adopted, will prevent any such investments hereafter, and prevent any misconception of the old law. I do trust, in good faith, that it will be adopted.

Mr. STANLY. I favor the views of the gentleman from Indiana, but I hope his amendment will not be adopted. I object to the construction which the Senate have placed upon this constructive mileage, and think it wrong; but I do object, also, to the House of Representatives striking a blow at the Senate in a matter of this kind. I think it is our duty to treat the Senate with respect, and, if need be, with a great deal of forbearance. I deprecate exceedingly that we should quarrel with each other in our legislation here. Now, sir, I am not in an especial good humor with that honorable body, and I had hoped that an opportunity would have been afforded us, when the resolution came up fixing the day of adjournment, to have paid some little respect to them for their recent scolding of us. They deserve it richly. They deserve just such an amendment as is proposed to be put in; but we do not deserve to have to pass that amendment. Now, with all respect to that body, I think they waste five times as much time as the House of Representatives. They have had an election case pending since December last, and they have not decided it yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order, in discussing an election case before the Senate.

Mr. STANLY. I want to call public attention to these things, and to save this House from reproach. I want to say, if it is in order, that I look upon the House of Representatives as in every respect equal to the Senate. We have as important measures confided to our hands, and, moreover, we have power to do things that the Senate cannot do. It becomes this House, above all things, to stand up and maintain the respectability of its character, especially when it is assailed by the Senate. There are very honorable gentlemen in the Senate, who have scolded us, who are no way superior, and who, when they were in this House, were in no way superior to a hundred or more of the members who are here now, and I should like to have half an hour to pay my respects to them as they deserve. But I do not want, by voting for this amendment, to begin to legislate on the misconduct of the Senate. I hope the House will leave them to rectify their own errors, and put the seal of reprobation on the individuals there who have offended against propriety and violated the law of the land.

Mr. SACKETT. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must recollect that we are considering an amendment made by the Senate to the original bill. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] has moved an amendment to that amendment, and no further amendment is in order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Why is not an amendment in order now?

The CHAIRMAN. Because we have an amendment now in the second degree.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not in this House. The amendment of the Senate is the original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that no further amendment is in order.

The question was then taken upon Mr. FITCH's amendment to the amendment; and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senate as amended.

Mr. SACKETT moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That nothing shall hereafter be paid to Senators or Representatives, in case of sickness, during the vacation of Congress.

Mr. S. said: I offer that amendment for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate and the country, and the House, to the fact, that several very considerable sums of money have been drawn by Senators, during the recess of Congress, under the law, I think, of 1818, that members detained by sickness, during the recess, shall be paid at the rate of their per diem allowance. I do not remember the title of the law.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire of the gentleman, if the practice has not been applied to members of this House also?

Mr. SACKETT. I presume so. I merely desire to call attention to the fact, that there is such a law. I understand that, in certain cases, the sums have risen up to $1,000 and $1,500.

A MEMBER. Name a case.

Mr. SACKETT. I prefer not to do it. They are published. I understand that the sums received in cases of sickness, during the recess of Congress, have in some instances risen up to $1,000 and $1,500. I have never examined the details of the law, but I understand that there is such a construction put upon a law, and that such sums of money have been drawn from the Treasury in such cases. If this be so, I wish Congress and the country to take notice of the fact, that we may repeal that law. I offered the proviso merely for the purpose of calling attention to the fact, but it is so clearly right that I believe I shall press it to a vote.

Mr. CLEVELAND. It seems to me that the gentleman from New York has traveled out of his way, for the purpose of assailing some individual, either in this House or at the other end of the Capitol. It seems to me that there can be nothing plainer than the justice of the practice, and of the law, if law exists, that a member in the service of his country, detained in this city by sickness, shall be paid his per diem. I beg to know if there is a man upon this floor, who is desirous of having a brother member, when he is detained here by sickness after the adjournment, remain and expend large sums of money out of his own pocket?

Mr. SACKETT. I desire to say a word by way of explanation. I do not intend this as an attack upon anybody. I do not say that any money has been drawn except fairly, under the law as it exists. I only say that I am opposed to such a law.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I say in reply to the gentleman, that I did not believe there was a man upon this floor, or who had ever occupied a seat here, who would hesitate for one moment, to pay out of the public Treasury the per diem of those members who may be detained here by sickness during the recess. I do not believe there is a man upon this floor who would not put his hand into his own pocket, if there was no such law, and befriend a brother member in that condition, to help to support him in his misfortunes. Sir, there is not, in my judgment, a more meritorious claim upon the Treasury, than the one which the gentleman now tries to shut out by his proviso.

Mr. SACKETT. I never thought of any particular case.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I do not see why this amendment should be offered, unless it was intended to cast a reflection upon the action of the House or some member of it. We are now administering a very proper, just, and becoming rebuke to the Senate, for taking this constructive mileage, and the gentleman is trying to weaken the force of the exposure we are making, by offering an amendment of this character. I think it ought to be met and opposed. I think that when any member is detained by sickness, and compelled to remain here when others are permitted to go home, he ought to be allowed his per diem. I think the amendment ought to be voted down by every member, except by the gentleman who offered it, and his name ought to stand alone upon the record.

The question was then taken upon Mr. SACKETT's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MEADE offered the following amendment, to come in at the end of the Senate amendment as amended:

But nothing in this proviso shall prevent a member of Congress from receiving his mileage for attending any regular session thereof.

Mr. M. said: I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that a liberal construction of the proviso opposed by the gentleman from Indiana, and which has just been adopted, a member from Arkansas, or Texas, or California, who might think proper after the adjournment of this session of Congress, to remain here in Washington until next session, without going home, would not be entitled to his mileage. I know it is not the intention of the committee to exclude mileage, except in the case of an extra session: called immediately upon the adjournment of the regular session, and when a member could not possibly get home. But unless my amendment is adopted, that construction will certainly be put upon the proviso of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOUSTON. By the law as it now stands, if this session should continue until within a short time of, or up to the next session, members of Congress would not be entitled to any mileage at all. The law is that the mileage of members of Congress shall be controlled, to some extent, by the length of time between the two sessions.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. We have passed that time now.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe we have. But if Congress should not adjourn until within a month of the next session, the law would give each member of Congress his eight dollars per diem for that month, and deprive him of mileage. That is the express law now. I do not think that the construction which the gentleman from Virginia puts upon the proviso of the gentleman from Indiana is a correct one. I think the proviso against constructive mileage is a proper one, and it does not interfere with the regular mileage of the members of either House of Congress.

The question was then taken upon Mr. MEADE's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the amendment of the Senate as amended, it was put, and decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. HOUSTON moved to amend the title of the bill by adding the words "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to lay aside the bill with the amendments to be reported to the House, and to take up House bill, No. 196, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1853.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The civil and diplomatic bill was taken up by the committee for consideration.

Mr. HOUSTON. The bill is a long one, and there is no necessity for reading it through, preparatory to amendment. I hope the committee will consent to have it read by paragraphs, and that such amendments as may be designed, will be offered as the reading progresses. That will expedite action a good deal, especially if we confine our debates to the amendments offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark that the bill extends over forty-three pages. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] submits the proposition that the preparatory reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the committee proceed at once to consider the bill by paragraphs. It will be for the committee to determine.

Mr. STUART. I hope the reading of the bill will be dispensed with, because when debate is closed and we enter upon the amendments, the bill will have to be read through again.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is mistaken in this. I propose to dispense with the first reading of the bill, and to commence with the second reading, that is, to read the bill by paragraphs, if no general debate springs up. Should such be the case, and we have to close debate, then we can go on with the reading of the bill by paragraphs and make amendments.

The question was put, and Mr. HOUSTON's motion agreed to, and the Clerk proceeded to read the first paragraph of the bill.

Mr. STUART. I hope the committee will understand what we are now doing. As I understand it, according to the arrangement entered into by the committee, unless amendments are made as the sections to which they refer are read, they cannot be made at all. We cannot refer back to a section after it has been passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announced before the reading of the bill, that it was now open to amendment. In order, however, that there may be no misunderstanding, he will again remark, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] has correctly remarked, that after any section of the bill has been passed over, the committee cannot go back to it again without unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If there is any gentleman here who wishes to make presidential speeches, or speeches in general, the time has arrived when he can be gratified. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITCH. I have an amendment to offer to this bill. I desire to submit the proviso to which I have already alluded, in relation to constructive mileage, and have it inserted in this bill, so that it shall apply to the Executive sessions of the Senate, that there may be no doubt at all with regard to that matter.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will allow me, I will suggest that there will be ample time for his amendment, and it will be better to submit it as an independent section to come in at the end of the bill.

Mr. FITCH. Will not that be ruled out of order?

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly not. I think the gentleman's amendment is a good one, and ought to be adopted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment will be in order to come in at the end of the bill, as a separate section, if he desires to offer it there.

Mr. MEADE. So well satisfied am I that the proviso ought to be adopted, excluding members of Congress from receiving their mileage, except for the regular sessions, that I am induced to offer an amendment to the clause in this bill relating to mileage, which will tend to explain it. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That no constructive mileage shall be allowed for attending extra sessions of Congress.

Mr. FITCH. The difficulty against which the gentleman desires to provide by his amendment, I think can better be met by a separate section of the bill. When the proper place arrives I will offer an amendment which will cover the whole ground.

Mr. MEADE. Very well, then; I will withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk having finished the reading of the clause providing for the contingent expenses of the two Houses,

Mr. FAULKNER obtained the floor, and addressed the committee an hour, upon the political issues between the two parties, and particularly upon the subject of the compromise measures. In regard to the maintenance of the latter he argued that it was essential to the peace of the Union. In speaking upon the subject of the Presidency, he said he could not see that the election of General Scott could contribute to the peace of the Union by giving stability and firmness to the compromise policy of 1850. [His remarks are published in the Appendix.]

Mr. SKELTON obtained the floor.

[The SPEAKER here resumed the chair temporarily,] and

Mr. WILDRICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported back as correctly enrolled the following bills, which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker, viz:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Gaslight Company," approved July 8, 1848;

An act to protect the actual settlers upon the lands on the line of the Illinois Central Railroad and branches, by granting preemption rights there-to; and

An act to create three additional land districts in the State of Iowa.]

Mr. COBB, (Mr. SKELTON yielding the floor.) I thank the gentleman from New Jersey for allowing me the privilege of addressing the committee for a few moments. My object in addressing the committee now, is to notify them that the very earliest day that I can possibly get an opportunity of doing so, either by a suspension of the rules, or through the liberality of the House—and I shall rely more particularly on the liberality of the House—I intend to bring up a widow's claim. It is one that has already been reported upon three times in this House, and a bill has passed the House three times, but it has always been lost in the Senate for want of time to consider it. At the present session of Congress the bill originated in the Senate, passed that body almost unanimously, came down to this House, and was referred to the Committee on Claims. That committee, as is well known to this House, scrutinizes every case that comes before them; and in order to impress the committee with the merit of the claim, I will simply state that the committee have favorably reported upon it unanimously. The bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the accounts of a deceased person, and to allow to his widow and six orphan children, such an amount as he may find, upon the testimony presented to him, to be absolutely due to them. At the very earliest opportunity, I intend to ask the House to take up that bill and pass it. In doing so, they will be engaged in a pursuit that will contribute more to the comforts of suffering humanity, than perhaps any other measure which they could pass.

A MEMBER. What bill is it?

Mr. COBB. Senate bill No. 152. I will say further that there is a bill upon the Calendar, which I had the honor to report from the Committee on Public Lands, proposing to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands. I am becoming fearful that that bill may not be reached before the adjournment, and as it is important that the country should know my views upon that question, it may become necessary that I should submit them to the House and the country, so that the House may be prepared to vote on that bill, if it should be reached; and that, if it is not reached, the people may be able to tell their Representatives, when they go home, that the bill ought to be passed.

I would remark in conclusion that I have been a constant attendant here since the commencement of the session. I have not lost one single hour here since the assemblage of Congress; not one hour have I lost. But whilst I have been so faithful an attendant upon the public business, I have some four or five little private cases. [Laughter.] If I could get the House to consider them occasionally, I am sure I would not tax them with speeches the remainder of the session more than I have done during the nine months we have been engaged here.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to ask as a particular favor of the gentleman from Alabama, that while he is attending to his private cases, he will also look after one for me.

Mr. COBB. Oh, I cannot promise to do that.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have succeeded in getting through the House, upon three several occasions, a bill granting a donation to an old soldier of my State whose leg was broken some time ago. It has passed the House, but failed to be acted upon in the Senate. Now I want my friend over the way, in making his appeals to the House in behalf of his own private cases, not to forget my broken-legged soldier.

Mr. COBB. If the case is before the House from a committee, I will consider it certainly.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Agriculture, of which I am a member, have agreed to report a bill to this House for the purpose of establishing an Agricultural Bureau. I have written out the arguments which have convinced me of the necessity of such an establishment; but as the session is far advanced, and as there is a large amount of public business pressing, I propose, for the purpose of expediting business, and, at the same time, laying before the House and the country the reasons which have induced me, and which have induced a majority of the Committee on Agriculture, to recommend the establishment of such a bureau, to ask the privilege of publishing my remarks, and having them placed among the proceedings of the House [Mr. S.'s speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understand there is no amendment pending to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. JONES. I wish to offer an amendment to the first clause of the bill, separating the appropriation for mileage in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh lines, which now read as follows:

"For compensation and mileage of Senators, members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates, $440,128."

It is now made out in one aggregate sum, covering the compensation and mileage of Senators, members of this House, and the Delegates from the Territories. I wish to separate the appropriation, so that we may give the necessary amount for the compensation and mileage of Senators, and then the necessary amount for the compensation and mileage of the members of the House and Delegates from the Territories. I propose no alteration in the amount to be appropriated. When the appropriation is made, as has heretofore been the custom of Congress, the entire amount is subject to the draft of the officers of either House. I wish the amount appropriated to each House specified, so that each House shall be responsible for its fund, and the expenditure thereof. I propose to insert, in place of the ninth, tenth, and eleventh lines, the following:

For compensation and mileage of Senators, $204,077; for compensation and mileage of Members of this House, and Delegates from the Territories, $335,352.

The CHAIRMAN. That section of the bill having been passed over, cannot be amended except by the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. JONES. I merely wish to insert that in lieu of the joint appropriation as it stands in the bill. The amendment makes precisely the same amount of appropriation, but appropriates to each House a specific sum.

There was no objection, and the amendment was received and adopted by the committee.

Mr. HOWE. If it is the pleasure of the committee, I will proceed with my remarks.

Mr. ALLISON. If my colleague will give way, I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HOWE. I will give way for that purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. I then submit that motion. The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman [Mr. Phelps] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration House bill No. 89, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy at West Point, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and had instructed him to report the same to the House, having agreed to some of the amendments and disagreed to others, with an amendment. They also had had under consideration House bill No. 196, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to recommit the Military Academy bill, with the amendments, to the Committee of Ways and Means, and call the previous question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Why can we not pass it now?

Mr. HOUSTON. I should be glad to have it done, if it is not too late to pass it now.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It is not too late.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I will withdraw the motion to recommit, and move to put the bill upon its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will state to the House, with the permission of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Fitch,] who offered the proviso to this bill in relation to the constructive mileage, is satisfied that it will not effect his object. He has proposed an amendment to the civil and diplomatic bill which will cover the case. I have read his amendment, and I perfectly concur with him in relation to it. I will go with him as far as any member of this House to check this practice or stop it, but as the amendment is worded which has been attached to this bill, it cannot effect the object. I think, therefore, that this amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union will only be calculated to embarrass the bill and the intercourse between the two Houses, without effecting the object for which it was intended. I ask, therefore, that those who are for restricting that practice will vote down this amendment, and let it be offered in a new form to the civil and diplomatic bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Fitch] told me he intended to say to the House that he would be willing it should vote down this amendment. He submitted to me the amendment, which he has since prepared, and I think it is much more satisfactory. I ask, therefore, that the vote may be taken upon concurring in the action of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union relative to this proviso, and then upon concurring in its other action upon the bill.

The question was then taken, and the House non-concurred with the committee in the adoption of the proviso relative to constructive mileage.

The question was then taken on concurring with the committee in its other action upon the Senate amendments, and the House concurred therein.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Roads and Canals a bill for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of the Ohio at Louisville. My object is merely that it may be referred, so that it may be printed and be before the House at the commencement of the next session.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I object. We have had rivers and harbors enough for one session.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs the papers which I hold in my hand.

Mr. STANTON. I believe I have the floor. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of enabling me to introduce my resolution.

Mr. CLEVELAND. If the gentleman from Ohio merely desires to introduce his bill for the purpose of reference, I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Then the report will be received, if there is no objection.

Mr. STANTON. I will submit this proposition to the House, that it be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, printed, and made the special order of the day for the first Monday in December next.

[Loud cries of "Object!"]

Mr. STANTON. Very well; then I will move simply that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed.

The SPEAKER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.
Mr. STANTON: I think the objection came too late.

Mr. JONES. I objected to the bill being introduced in the first place.

Mr. STANTON. But the rules have been suspended, and the report is here.

Mr. JONES. There has been no suspension of the rules for any such purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the papers to which I before alluded to, and have them referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STANTON. I believe I still have the floor. If the report for which I asked the permission of the House to enable me to submit, has not been received, I move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

Mr. FOWLER. I rise to a question of order.

The gentleman from Ohio proposed to submit a report from the Committee on Roads and Canals. The Speaker called upon the House to know if there were any objections, and none were offered. He submitted his report, and stated what disposition he wished made of it. The Chair announced the report to have been received before any objection was made to its reception. I submit, therefore, that the objection came too late.

Mr. JONES. I objected when the gentleman first asked permission to submit his report. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] objected also, but after explanation withdrew his objection. The Chair then stated that if there was no objection, the report would be received, when I again objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the objection to have been withdrawn to the gentleman's introducing the report. The gentleman then submitted the motion that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed, and the Chair stated that it would be so ordered, unless objected to, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] objected. The Chair understood his objection to apply to the printing only.

Mr. JONES. I objected to making the report at all.

Mr. SMART. I move that the House do now adjourn. I believe that is in order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] to allow me, before he makes that motion, to make a report, and ask that it may be printed and referred.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. That is only what I asked to do.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman's case is a very different one from my own.

Mr. JONES. I objected to receiving the report of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON.]

The SPEAKER. The report was received before the Chair heard any objection from the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. STANTON. I make the motion that the report be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed. That is all I want. Let the motion be entered, and then it can be brought up next Monday.

Mr. JONES. I contend that the report is not before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the report is before the House, and the question is upon having it referred and printed. To that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] objected.

Mr. JONES. I objected, and so did the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. CLEVELAND.] He withdrew his objection, but I never did mine.

Mr. SMART. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I call the gentleman to order until I can get a hearing. Gentleman cannot all talk at a time, and not take the floor at all. I will state to the House that a call was made upon the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for information as to the manner in which the money belonging to the Indians east of the Mississippi river had been expended. This was done in order to see whether those moneys had been expended rightly by the individuals who received them, and that the people might look into the accounts to see that they were right. Here is the answer to that call from the Indian Bureau, and from the Second Auditor's department. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and printed.

No objection was made, and an order to that effect was entered.

Mr. STANLEY. I want to make a motion to suspend the rules, and let the motion lie over until next Monday, as the House is thin, and not in a condition to act upon it now. My motion is to suspend the rules in order to appoint a day for the consideration of the bill for the relief of the indigent insane.

Mr. SMART. There is no quorum, and I move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I will ask the gentleman from Maine to withdraw his motion for a moment. The House seems to be in good humor, and has as good an opportunity to do an act of justice as it will have during the session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLEY] made a motion, and pending that motion the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. ORR. There was a motion pending which should have been disposed of before the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] could claim the floor. It was the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] upon the question of printing the report he submitted. That motion has not yet been disposed of.

Mr. STANLY. That was passed half an hour ago.

The SPEAKER. There was no objection on the part of the House to printing the report. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] said he objected to receiving the report.

Mr. ORR. There were objections.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Maine to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. SMART. I cannot.

The question was taken on the motion, and it was agreed to.

So the House adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock, a. m.

Ordered, That the documents relating to the claims of Sarah Shatto, heir of John Walker, and Mary Green, heir of James McKinney, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the petition of Catherine Proctor Hayden, praying payment of balance found due on settlement of her father's account for advances made during the revolutionary war, and also of seven years' half-pay due her as the heir of Colonel John White, of the Fourth Georgia Battalion, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Washington Morehead, praying that Joseph Morehead, late an officer in the Navy, may be allowed his pay from the time of his dismissal from the service, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Joseph Morehead; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Philo Smith, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following petitions, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, which was agreed to:

Petition of Harriet O. Read, executrix of the late Lieutenant Colonel A. C. W. Fanning, of the United States Army, praying compensation for extra services of Colonel Fanning;

Petition of citizens of Springfield, Massachusetts, praying that the armories of the United States may be placed under the superintendence of civil instead of military officers;

Eight petitions of clerks, messengers, and others employed in the War Department and Bureaus, praying an increase of their salaries;

Petition of Juan Fernandez, praying indemnification for cattle destroyed by the Indians in Texas;

Petition of citizens of Ohio, praying that pensions and extra pay may be allowed to private physicians employed for the volunteers during the late war with Mexico;

Petition of officers of volunteer companies in the District of Columbia, praying the construction of an armory in the city of Washington, for the safe keeping and preservation of the arms furnished them by Government;

Petition of Colonel William F. Small, tendering to the Government the services of a regiment of volunteers, for the defense of the eastern frontier of California;

Petition of Isaac Bush, John Price, and Thomas Suarez, praying compensation for themselves and the officers and men under their command during the Seminole war in Florida;

Resolution of the Legislature of Georgia in favor of the establishment of a depot of arms at the Sand Hills, near Augusta;

Petition of the "Green Mountain Rifle Corps," praying that the Secretary of War may be authorized to furnish the corps with arms and accoutrements; and Petitions of officers of the Army, praying that the quarters of officers at permanent military posts may be furnished.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Thomas S. J. Johnson, praying payment for wagons taken for the use of the United States Army in New Mexico, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. SHIELDS. There was a memorial presented to the Senate of the Board of Visitors appointed to attend the examination of the Military Academy at West Point, recommending an increase in the number of cadets, an extension of the term of education, and an enlarged course of studies. The Secretary of War has made a report on that subject. The committee therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial, and that the communication from the Secretary of War be printed.

It was so ordered.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Charles McCormick, an assistant surgeon in the Army, praying compensation for extra services, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. P. B. HAYES, its Chief Clerk, announcing that it had agreed to all the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House "making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1853," except the amendment appropriating $12,000 for the erection of a riding-hall.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, the Senate receded from its amendment disagreed to by the House.

NORTH AMERICAN FISHERIES.

A message from the President of the United States was received, by Mr. M. P. FILLMORE, his Secretary, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 23d ultimo, requesting information in regard to the fisheries on the coasts of the British Possessions in North America, a report from the Acting Secretary of State, and the documents by which it was accompanied; and stating that Commodore M. C. Perry, with the United States steam frigate Mississippi, under his command, had been dispatched to that quarter for the purpose of protecting the rights of American fishermen under the convention of 1818.

The message was read.

Mr. CASS moved to refer the documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and spoke for near an hour, contending that the construction given by the British Ministry was utterly untenable, and urged with much fervor the importance of protecting the fishermen in all their just rights, declaring the movement of England as most extraordinary, to say the least.

Mr. DAVIS spoke at length, maintaining the opinion heretofore expressed by him, that no war would grow out of the existing differences, though he thought there was much in the conduct of the British that might be classed as irritating and vexatious. He did not think Great Britain wanted a war, but if she did she could have it; he would never surrender an iota of our rights to her.

Mr. HAMLIN followed, going into a critical examination of the treaty, decanting on the correspondence in relation to it, insisting that the interpretation put on the treaty by the American Government was right, and should be sustained at all hazards, giving it as his opinion that the conduct of England could never be submitted to without dishonor and disgrace. Mr. H. did not conclude his remarks. [These speeches will be found in the Appendix.]

On motion by Mr. SEWARD, the further consideration of the President's message was postponed until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. BRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 3, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the reception of a report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MILLSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up from the Speaker's table, Senate bill No. 206, granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth V. Lomax, a widow lady, merely for the purpose of referring it to the Committee of the Whole.

There being no objection, the bill was taken up, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RIDDLE. I rise to a question of privilege. On the 31st of March, in compliance with a request of the House, the President submitted a report of Captain Cram, of the United States Topographical Engineers, on the best mode of improving the Falls of the Ohio river, at Louisville. That report the House ordered to be printed on the 3d of May. The Committee on Engraving find that the report will be useless unless the maps and plates accompanying it are engraved and printed. The Senate have had copper plates made, and the committee find that the work can be done for a sum not exceeding $800, possibly less. They have authorized me to submit a resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Engraving be, and are hereby, authorized to contract for the engraving or lithographing of one thousand five hundred and seventy sets of the maps and plates accompanying the report of Thomas S. Cram, of the Topographical Engineers, "on the best mode" of improving the Ohio river at the Falls at Louisville: Provided, The cost thereof shall not exceed $800. Also, one thousand five hundred and twenty sets of the maps accompanying the report of the Surveyor General of Illinois, Missouri, and Oregon: Provided, The cost shall not exceed $112.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. Is the resolution which has just been read by the Clerk, before the House for consideration?

The SPEAKER. It is, by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Will the discussion on the resolution which has just been read, come out of the morning hour, or will the morning hour commence after the resolution shall have been disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It will come out of the morning hour, because there was no reservation made at the time the House gave its consent to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I am opposed to the adoption of this resolution. It is true the amount proposed to be expended is small, but, sir, the ocean is made up of drops and the earth of sands, and it is necessary that we should look to the expenses which we are incurring, although small in amount, in connection with the objects which are to be effected by such expenditure. What is the object of these plates? What good can they effect? How will they illustrate the report, and what is the report? The report is, that it will cost so much to improve the Louisville canal and the commerce of the Ohio river; that it will require an additional expenditure on the Kentucky side; and that if you run it in the middle of the stream it will require such an amount there; if you make a short canal on the Indiana side a certain further amount will be required; if you make a longer canal on the Indiana side a larger amount will be required. These, and such like, are the facts embodied in the report. The locality is known, and it is unnecessary that it should be represented by plates and figures to the members of this House. This expenditure will secure no good—it will effect nothing practical.

I am, sir, opposed to the report. It proposes to build a canal upon the Indiana side of the river. This Government has expended money upon the canal at Louisville, on the Kentucky side; and it has pledged its faith to the property-holders there that this canal shall be made for the use of the community. It is said that this canal will remain. If you open another one on the Indiana side, you will, by the action of this Government, destroy valuable property upon the Kentucky side.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, (interrupting.) Is this discussion upon the merits of that canal in order?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is connected with the report.

The SPEAKER. In ascertaining the necessity of the engraving, the value of the work itself, it seems to the Chair, may be considered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The question of printing opens the whole merits of the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so decided.

Mr. STANTON. This is not a question upon printing the report of the committee, but upon engraving the maps connected with the report.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution which proposes the publishing, with the report, certain engravings, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. JOHNSON] is in order in examining the value of the work itself.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am discussing the diagrams connected with the work.

Mr. MASON. With the permission of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JOHNSON,] I should like to make an inquiry. It seems that the report of Captain Cram was sent around to the members, and we supposed it to be an authentic document. It turned out, however, that it was a garbled report, and being garbled, it was a false report. I wish to know of the chairman of the Committee on Engraving, [Mr. RIDDLE,] for which one of these reports he proposes to have these engravings, the true or the false one? I hope the chairman has examined the subject, and is aware of the fact that there is a true and a false report. The false one has been received by many as true. The true one has been garbled by speculators, perhaps for the purpose of obtaining the construction of a canal upon the Indiana side of the river. I wish to know from the committee for which of these reports the engravings are intended?

Mr. RIDDLE. Before I answer the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MASON,] I will state, that when I offered the resolution, I stated that I rose to a privileged question; and it being such, I did not suppose it would come out of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged question; but it is such a one as would interfere with the morning hour, unless by unanimous consent of the House it was otherwise ordered; and as there was no reservation made in regard to the morning hour, it will certainly come out of the morning hour.

Mr. RIDDLE. I wish merely to state to the House that the committee examined this report, which was submitted by the President, in compliance with the request of the House, and that the report will be useless without the maps. I feel no particular interest in the report, or in the work, but the House had better agree not to print the report unless they print with it the maps and plates. It is a very simple matter. The Senate have the plates, which have been executed at great cost, and the House can get the use of them. I presume that $600 will do the whole work.

Mr. LOCKHART. Will the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. RIDDLE] state to the House whether the report of the survey of the Falls of the Ohio, made by Mr. W. J. Ball, civil engineer, was before the committee which reported this resolution?

Mr. RIDDLE. It was not before them.

Mr. LOCKHART. It is a very valuable report, and has accompanying it valuable maps of the Falls of the Ohio, and shows the absolute importance of additional improvements there.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. In reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MASON,] I will say that I understand there exists a difficulty about the report of Captain Cram. There was a report made by Captain Cram to the Topographical Bureau, relative to the improvement of the Falls at Louisville, and that it contained much irrelevant matter, which the head of that bureau regarded as improper. The Topographical Engineer called upon Captain Cram, and required him to strike out of his report all impertinent matter. The report as printed, is the report as corrected by him.

That is my information, though I do not claim that it is from any authentic source. This is the explanation which I have heard of the difference between the first manuscript report, and the report as published.

Mr. MASON made some remark, totally inaudible to the Reporter.

Mr. STANTON. The pending proposition

now, is to print the maps accompanying the report. I apprehend there is but one set of maps, and I do not think that the gentleman from Kentucky will say that there are garbled maps accompanying the report of Captain Cram. The question is to print the maps, and not the report.

Mr. MASON, (exhibiting a map.) I hold in my hand a map got up by interested parties. Now, I would ask the chairman whether the committee examined the corrected report and corrected maps of Captain Cram, instead of this, to which suspicion has been attached of being garbled by interested parties?

Mr. JOHNSON. I oppose the printing of these diagrams and plates for the reason, and main reason, that the report is favorable to the construction of a new canal around the Falls of the Ohio, on the Indiana side.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman is mistaken as to Captain Cram's report. It is not relied upon by the committee, but is claimed by the gentleman [Mr. MARSHALL] as his thunder—as being against the report of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have read the report. I do not know how much has been garbled. My inference from the reading of the report was, that it was decidedly in favor of a new canal around the Falls, on the Indiana side. Such an expenditure of money is entirely and wholly useless. If the canal on the Kentucky side of the river is not sufficient to accommodate commerce on the river, I contend that this Government is under obligation, in its action upon this matter, to recognize the rights of the property holders upon the Kentucky side. Good faith requires, in this expenditure, that the Government shall not enter into any arrangement that will destroy the value of property upon the Kentucky side. Let the canal upon the Kentucky side be opened, and made sufficiently large, if any expenditure is to be made for the accommodation of commerce. Let that be done, that our faith may be kept with the property holders upon the Kentucky side of the Ohio. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this subject has engaged the attention of the House long enough.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. I will, for explanation.

Mr. MARSHALL. I understand the proposition now before the House to be one submitted by the Committee on Engraving, to grant them the liberty of engraving the maps and charts accompanying the report which was originally communicated by Captain Cram. That report was called for by a resolution submitted by myself, on an ascertainment of the fact that the report which had been published as Captain Cram's report of 1845, was not really all the matter which had been submitted by him to the Department. I had, at the time I presented that resolution, in my possession a complete copy of the real report; and I was cognizant of the fact, that by some art or means the report made by the engineer who had examined the Falls of the Ohio was so altered, so interlined and obliterated, that it did not present the features of the original. I understood that the conclusion respecting the Falls to which the engineer had come, after an examination, was cut out, and that the report was left in such a condition that an opposite conclusion might be drawn; and I thought, not merely in justice to all persons who were interested, but in order that Congress might obtain an intelligent view of the real merits of the subject prior to its decision, that the facts and the report of the engineer, as originally made, should be spread before Congress. A very large volume of manuscript was sent to this Hall from the Executive Department, in response to that call. It was ordered to be printed. I have not undertaken to examine it; but for the information of all who may be concerned in this matter, I here announce the fact, that I have the original report at my control, in the way in which it was written. I have a transcript of the real original; and if I have not, through this call, obtained the facts of the case, they must be elicited by such instrumentality and such proceeding as will hold whoever may be accountable to a proper responsibility.

I do not know about these maps. As I have stated, I have not read the matter now transmitted under my call. I have no objection myself to seeing the maps which accompany what purports now to be Captain Cram's report. I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of all who are concerned in this matter, to say that I have seen Captain Cram—that I have conversed with him, and understand exactly how this thing came about, and who were concerned in it. I am prepared, whenever the occasion arises, to proceed, so that the country shall understand all about it. I suppose that this is not the proper time—that this is not the proper occasion to discuss the merits of the proposition relative to the Indiana canal, and the plans for the enlargement of the Kentucky canal. Discussion will better take place when all of the propositions have been thrown before the House. This proposition to engrave the maps accompanying the report, which purports to be the original one of Captain Cram, should be adopted. To a proper understanding of that report it is necessary they should be engraved. They ought to be engraved for the proper understanding of the subject, by the one side or the other.

Mr. DUNHAM. With the gentleman's permission, I will make a remark or two. I have heard a great deal expressed upon the point to which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] has alluded, and to which I had intended myself to call attention. It makes no difference whether it shall be determined to enlarge the present, or to build another canal around the Falls of the Ohio at Louisville, the House should have these maps before them for a correct interpretation of the report of Captain Cram. No matter what may be its interpretation, it concerns a matter which ought to attract the attention of the House, for I am sure that it is attracting the attention of the Mississippi valley, from Pittsburg to New Orleans. That whole country is interested, and something must be done for the relief of the commerce upon that river. It has been taxed year after year in the way of tolls levied by that canal. We want that navigation made free. If we cannot do so upon one side, in God's name let it be done upon the other. We want commerce relieved from the heavy burdens now imposed upon it. It ought to be relieved. Unless you have these maps engraved and printed, how can you tell anything about the report? As the gentleman from Kentucky has said, you cannot tell whether the conclusions at which the engineer, who has made the report, arrived, be right or wrong, unless these maps be placed before the House. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MASON] has charged that there have been interlineations in Captain Cram's report—that it has been garbled. I presume, however, that he will not charge that the maps have been garbled. You need them, no matter which of the reports you shall order to be printed.

I wish to say another word with reference to a remark of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JOHNSON.] It does seem to me to be a strange proposition that has been introduced into this House: that this General Government, by its action, has so trammelled itself with private interests—with private individuals—at the Falls of the Ohio, upon the Kentucky side, that its action is not now free for the purpose of controlling the navigation of that river.

It is a monstrous doctrine, that by our arrangements, with reference to that canal, we have so tied up our interests and legislation here with the individual interests of men who own town lots at the Falls of the Ohio, that we are not now permitted to legislate in regard to the interests of one of the most important branches of commerce in the United States. Such a doctrine cannot be tolerated here or elsewhere. I do not propose to take up the time of the House, as it is the intention of the gentleman from Georgia to call the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, moved to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. DUNHAM demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. BAYLY, of Virginia, and HAVEN were appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 71, noes 45.

So the House agreed to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid upon the table. I would inquire whether the motion is debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. DANIEL. I move to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. MEADE. Did the gentleman vote with the majority?

Mr. DANIEL. I did.

Mr. CARTTER. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. JENKINS. I renew it.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] to withdraw that motion, for the purpose of allowing me to make a report, under the resolution which was adopted yesterday, before the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. JENKINS. It will take but a moment to dispose of it.

Mr. McLANAHAN. The yeas and nays are demanded, and it will take some little time to dispose of it.

Mr. JENKINS. If I should not lose the benefit of my motion I will give way for a moment to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] to make his report.

The SPEAKER. If it be the unanimous consent of the House, the question of reconsideration can go over until to-morrow.

Mr. OLDS. I object.

Mr. KING, of New York. As a point of order, I desire to inquire, if the report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would not be in order this morning, or to-morrow morning, immediately after this question is disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question when it comes up.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I object to any motion if I have the right to the floor in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The motion proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] is in order, as it is a privileged motion.

Mr. McLANAHAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] has withdrawn it to allow me to make a report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to withdraw it, and upon the question of reconsideration the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I wish to understand what the question is.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon reconsidering the vote by which the resolution was laid upon the table. It is not debatable.

Mr. KING. I hope that my colleague [Mr. JENKINS] will withdraw his motion, so as to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] to make his report.

Mr. OLDS. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I ask the gentleman again from New York to withdraw his motion.

Mr. JENKINS. Will it be in order for me to enter my motion without pressing its consideration now?

The SPEAKER. Any gentleman may have the question taken upon it. The gentleman may renew it to-morrow.

Mr. JENKINS. I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOWARD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to withdraw it.

Mr. HOWARD. I renew the motion.

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is, that the resolution passed on yesterday allowing the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] to make a report from the Judiciary Committee does not supersede the reports already pending in the morning hour. It was not so understood by the House, and he has no right to make his report until the pending business of the morning hour now before the House is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. OLDS. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The House on yesterday passed by a majority of two thirds—indeed it was by almost an unanimous vote, a resolution authorizing the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary. That report he proposes to make now, and the Chair decides that it takes precedence of all other business connected with the morning hour.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. OLDS. I withdraw the appeal.

FEES OF MARSHALS, ATTORNEYS, ETC.

Mr. McLANAHAN. In pursuance of the resolution of the House yesterday, under instruction of the Judiciary Committee, I now report back House bill No. 146, regulating the fees and costs to be allowed to the clerks and marshals of the circuit and district courts of the United States, with certain amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that this bill has been reported back, and it has been read the first and second time.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I move to recommit it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry? Would it not be well to have the amendments printed?

Mr. McLANAHAN. The amendments are of a verbal character. They are very few, and easily understood. It is of great public importance that this bill should be acted upon now. I ask for the reading of the bill and the amendments.

Mr. BOWIE. Is it in order to move to recommit this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. There is a pending motion to recommit.

Mr. McLANAHAN. But the gentleman cannot make the motion while I am occupying the floor.

The SPEAKER. That is very true.

Mr. McLANAHAN. Before I proceed to the discussion of the bill, I ask for the reading of the bill and the amendments. Then I will proceed with some explanation.

The bill and amendments were then read.

Mr. ORR. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. ORR. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I made a motion some time ago to recommit this bill.

The SPEAKER. That motion is now pending.

Mr. ORR. If it be in order, I propose the resolution which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman to go to the business upon the Speaker's table is in order.

Mr. ORR. Can we pass from the consideration of the present bill without the question being taken upon that motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that we cannot.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Orr's motion, and it was agreed to.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. ORR. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill of the House No. 196, (civil and diplomatic,) shall cease in one hour after its consideration shall have been resumed in Committee of the Whole, (if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion upon the same;) and the committee shall then proceed to vote on such amendments as may be pending, or offered to the same, and shall then report it to the House, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. O. said: That resolution proposes to close debate in one hour after the committee shall resume its sitting. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOWE] has obtained the floor, and I think he has a vested right to occupy the time of the House for one hour. If there is any other gentleman in the House who will indicate his desire to speak upon the merits of the bill, I am perfectly willing to modify the resolution, but not for him to make a general speech. I think, if gentlemen desire to make general speeches, we had better go through with the appropriation bills, and then if there is any time left they can be made. I therefore demand the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I desire to say to the gentleman from South Carolina, that I have not troubled the House with any exposition of my position, in reference to the presidential election, and my constituents will expect me to do so. The gentleman from South Carolina has already had an opportunity of doing so, and I hope he will allow me the same privilege.

Mr. HOUSTON. There are five other appropriation bills behind this.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means promised us, sometime ago, that we should have reasonable time for debate upon this bill. I want to define my position also.

Mr. HOUSTON. The condition upon which I said that has never happened, for gentlemen have spoken upon every one of the other bills.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to lay that resolution upon the table.

Mr. ORR. Upon that I ask the yeas and nays in order that the country may see who it is that wishes to waste time and delay the public business.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 44, nays 107; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashe, Barrere, Bococek, Bowie, Breckinridge, E. Carrington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Clingman, Daniel, Dean, Dockery, Durkee, Eastman, Fitch, Floyd, Giddings, Goodrich, Grey, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Jenkins, James Johnson, Kuhns, Landry, Mann, McMullin, Morehead, Nabers, Newton, Outlaw, Polk, Sackett, Schoolcraft, Schoolmaker, Scurry, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Strother, and Ward—44.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Willis Allen, Allison, William Appleton, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Bissell, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, George H. Brown, Burrows, Joseph Cable, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chastain, Churchwell, Clark, Cleveland, Cobb, Colcock, Cullom, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dimmick, Duncan, Dunham, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gilmore, Goodenow, Gorman, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Horsford, Houston, Howard, Ingersoll, Ives, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, George G. King, Kurtz, Letcher, Mace, Martin, Mason, McCorkle, McLanahan, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Miner, Molony, John Moore, Murray, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Pennington, Perkins, Phelps, Richardson, Robie, Savage, Schermerhorn, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, Sutherland, Thurston, Townshend, Walbridge, Wallace, Walsh, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Wildrick—107.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ORR demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. DUNHAM and HAVEN were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—yeas 77, nays not counted.

So the previous question received a second.

Mr. BOWIE. Is the resolution open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The main question was then ordered; and, being put, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ORR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States by the hands of MILARD P. FILLMORE, Esq., his Private Secretary.]

Mr. HOUSTON moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHILPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1853, and for other purposes, on which Mr. J. W. Howe, of Pennsylvania, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE remarked that it was his purpose to examine, as briefly and concisely as he could, the platform adopted by the Whig party, of which he was or had been a member. He had looked at that platform with intense interest. He had also examined another platform manufactured at Baltimore, (which had become quite a manufacturing city,) and he must confess that he had been unable to discover any particular difference between the two. The eighth resolution in the Whig platform was a little more pointed, clear, and perspicuous than the resolution of the Democratic platform on the same subject; but he considered both platforms equally faulty. He was not warring with men; it was the creed adopted by the Whig party with which he was at loggerheads, and he intended to confine his remarks principally to showing of what material it was composed, and it would turn out that it was formed out of a log raft upon which two very eminent men stove up, and had to go to Salt river a short time ago. He repeated he should confine his remarks to the eighth resolution of the Whig platform, and in doing so he purposed to make reference to the fugitive slave law therein referred to, and to dissect and examine its various parts, and see whether or not it was wholesome, and whether it was good to live by—at all events, he should be very sorry to die by it.

Mr. H. then referred at length to the fugitive slave law, condemning it in strong terms, and declaring that he was ready to vote for its repeal or modification. He also reviewed the Whig platform, dissenting from some of its provisions, and particularly opposing the eighth resolution. [Mr. Howe's speech is published in the Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time has arrived when, by order of the House, general debate upon this bill terminates. The Chair feels it to be his duty to announce to the committee that he will construe the 126th rule, which reads as follows:

"126. Whenever the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or the Committee of the Whole House, finds itself without a quorum, the chairman shall cause the roll of the House to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal."

to mean that so soon as the roll shall be called he shall vacate the chair for the purpose of reporting to the House the names of the absentees. He deems it right to make this decision in advance, the practice of the House, as he understood, having been otherwise.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I move to strike out of the following—

"For salary of the Capitol police, $3,560," the sum of "$3,560," and to insert "$4,560;" and at the end of that paragraph to add the following:

And that the two watchmen employed to protect the work upon the two wings of the Capitol, be, and they are hereby, added to the regular police of the Capitol, and the laws now in force regulating the powers and duties of the Capitol police shall be enforced and apply to them.

I wish simply to say, in explanation of that amendment, that at the time of commencing the work upon the two wings of the Capitol it was found that the police force about the Capitol grounds was not sufficient for the protection of the main building, and also for the protection of the work as it progressed on the two wings. It became the duty, therefore, of the Architect, who had the control of the work, to appoint two men to take charge each of one of the wings of the Capitol for the protection of the work as it progressed, and to take care of the tools and property belonging to the Government. These two men are now employed there for that purpose. They receive about the same salary out of the fund for the extension of the Capitol that they would be paid out of the fund for the regular police of the Capitol; but there is this difficulty about it: those two men are not clothed with the same power as the other police officers of the Capitol grounds, and hence it becomes necessary they should be incorporated with the regular police, in order that they may have power to arrest offenders who may choose to commit depredations upon the public property. Of course among the six or seven hundred men employed upon the two wings of the Capitol, difficulties occur. These officers have no power to arrest. It certainly would be their duty, if they had the power to arrest, to stop all disturbances of that kind which might occur. If they do it now they commit a trespass, and subject themselves to punishment for a breach of the peace, or action for damages in a civil suit. The Architect desires that they shall have this power conferred upon them. He wants them incorporated with the regular police at the Capitol. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not hear the first portion of the gentleman's remarks. I wish to know by what authority these two additional police have been appointed?

Mr. STANTON. I stated in the outset of my remarks, that at the time the public work was commenced the police force about the Capitol was found not sufficiently strong—I think there are but five of them—to take care of the Capitol and its grounds, and that it was important two men should be appointed whose duty it should be to take charge each of one of the wings of the Capitol, in order to prevent depredations being committed upon the work, the carrying away of tools, or the destruction of material, and to perform various other duties which would come under their cognizance. Two men have been employed for that purpose by the Architect, under the direction of the President of the United States. The object of this amendment is simply to incorporate them with the regular police of the Capitol, and to clothe them with the same power.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is one chief of the police at a salary of $1,450 per annum. There are also four assistant police officers, two of whom are upon duty during the night and two during the day at a salary of $1,100 per annum each. At the last session of Congress there was in the deficiency bill a provision authorizing the appointment of two others to watch the grounds and see that the shrubbery was not destroyed or the trees injured. They were on duty only during the day. Their pay is two dollars per day. These constitute the whole police force of the Capitol grounds. If there have been two others appointed by the Architect of the extension of the Capitol, I think it best to allow them to remain under his direction and control until the wings shall have been completed. He is charged with the execution of the work upon those wings, and we have made an appropriation for that purpose of $500,000. He can appropriate such a portion of that as may be necessary, as I understand it, for the pay of the superintendents and persons who guard and protect the property when the workmen are not present. I cannot see myself—probably it is all right—any very great necessity for these men, because the police of the Capitol are here until they close the gates, and then they remain inside.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Upon several occasions when difficulties have occurred at the Capitol among these men, instead of having power to suppress the disturbance themselves, these officers were compelled to run down to the city to find some person clothed with the proper authority.

Mr. JONES. Could two men added to these five men arrest the two or three hundred men you have here? If the workmen themselves will not be sufficient to assist the superintendents upon the work to preserve order and keep down a riot, we had better get clear of all the men. As I before said, it will be best, if they are to guard and protect the property, and see that the tools are not taken off and stolen during the time that the buildings are being constructed, to leave them under the supervision of the Architect and his men.

The question was then taken upon Mr. STANTON's amendment, and it was rejected.

The following section was then read by the Clerk:

"For compensation of librarian, two assistant librarians, and a messenger, $4,500.

"For contingent expenses of said library, $800.

"For purchase of books for said library, $5,000."

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to add $70,000 in the last line, for the purchase of books. We had funds voted for the library in the early part of the session. I have merely to say, that the sum of $10,000 which was appropriated shortly after the destruction of the Library has been exhausted in the purchase of books called for every day, and we shall need a larger sum than this certainly. I believe that what I have asked for will be required, and I am sure that there will be no objection to this appropriation.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman report this amount from that committee?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not make it as a report, but as the result of conversation among ourselves.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is a matter we have not looked into, but I believe the addition of a liberal fund is necessary.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish merely to say, that I should prefer a larger appropriation than this. All the books that we need can be ordered and put up by the next session. I am satisfied, as we shall be obliged to spend money for a Library, that we had better provide all the means at once, and make a liberal appropriation for this purpose. I am prepared to vote for a larger appropriation than this, if it is necessary.

Mr. CHANDLER. The chairman suggests $50,000, but I think he will find that we will have to use $75,000. We have used our money economically. We have employed no agents to run here and there, and we mean to employ none.

The question was then taken on Mr. CHANDLER's amendment, and it was agreed to.

The following section was then read:

"For publishing the laws in pamphlet form and in the newspapers of the States and Territories and in the city of Washington, $31,025."

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to offer an amendment, to come in at the end of this section. I beg gentlemen to attend to the reading of it. It is of some importance, and I desire to explain it after it has been read by the Clerk; and I hope it may meet with the approval of the committee.

The amendment was then read as follows:

Provided, That the selection of newspapers for the publication of the laws of the United States shall, after the passage of this act, be made by the Secretary of State, as follows: The number selected shall be one in each Congressional district in each State, one in each Territory, and four in the District of Columbia; and the preference shall be given, in all cases, to the papers which, at the time of selection, shall have, in the States or Territories respectively in which they are published, the largest number of subscribers, and to those in the District of Columbia which shall have, at the time of selection, the largest number of subscribers in the United States, the amount of such number of subscribers to be ascertained by the affidavit of the publishers respectively, and by such additional evidence as may be requisite to establish the facts in each case to the satisfaction of the postmaster at whose office such papers respectively commence their circulation.

That when it shall be necessary to publish any public advertisement, except advertisements of lists of letters, in any State, it shall be published in the two papers in said State having the largest number of subscribers, as provided in the preceding section of this act for the publication of the laws; the amount of circulation to be ascertained in the same manner as provided in the preceding section aforesaid.

That said public advertisements shall be published in the newspapers having the publication of the laws, as aforesaid, in the District of Columbia, and in the papers having the publication of said laws in the Territories, when and as often as may be deemed necessary.

That as soon as may be after the passage of this act, and at the beginning of the first session of every succeeding Congress, a copy of the list of newspapers, selected according to the terms of this act, for the publication of the laws of the United States, shall be communicated by the Secretary of State to the heads of the several Executive Departments, and to the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively.

That the President shall cause to be communicated to the Senate and House of Representatives, annually, a list of all newspapers that shall have published, by authority, during the next preceding year, any advertisement as aforesaid, with the names of the publishers, the place of publication, the nature of the work performed, and the amount paid to each publisher.

That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope that the gentlemen of the committee will give me their attention for the few minutes allotted to me. If they do not like the details of this amendment, it may be altered in any way. I do not care about the number of papers. My object is to remedy an evil; and I can state in the five minutes' time allotted to me, the reasons for making this amendment, and in which reasons I hope that the House will concur with me. As the matter now stands, the Executive of the country, no matter who he may be, has a great influence over the political press of the country. I want to deprive him of it. That influence is obtained in two ways. In the first place, the Secretary of State has a right to choose two newspapers in each State to publish the laws. In the next place, all the heads of Departments can advertise from time to time in papers here or elsewhere, which they may fix upon, and the consequence is, that any Executive may exert a great control over the newspapers of a State. The Whig papers could not hurt the Democratic party, but they might hurt their own members; and if at any time any Administration desired to have particular gentlemen upon this floor denounced in any State, as it used to be charged was the case in old times—I believe in General Jackson's time, I do not say that the charge is true—it could be done by means of this patronage operating upon the papers of the particular State. Everybody will admit that the newspaper press ought to be independent of the President. We hear great talk about the patronage of the President and his sixty thousand officers; yet he can have more influence through the newspaper press than he can possibly have by means of all the officers of the Government. Now, what I propose is this: That the newspapers selected shall be chosen solely with reference to their circulation. The object is to place laws and advertisements before the people. Why should not the Government do as individuals would—that is, take papers of the largest circulation as the medium of advertisement? This bill proposes that this printing shall be given to one paper in each Congressional district. If you adopt that, you will increase the expense of publishing the laws about $18,000. The present cost is $12,000 a year, and you will put it up to nearly $30,000. I think it is a very small sum to enable us to print the laws in one newspaper in each district, having the largest circulation. Again: it is proposed, when there are advertisements in any State, that they shall be printed in two papers having the largest circulation.

Mr. CHANDLER obtained the floor.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have more time than this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] is entitled to the floor. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My time is not out by the clock. It took two minutes and a half to read my amendment. The reading of the amendment should not come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has been exhausted.

Mr. CHANDLER. The gentleman has been speaking so fluently that I do not wonder that he considers his time has not expired. I know that time always passes rapidly when we are treading upon flowers. Before I make any remarks in reply to my friend, I will ask the chairman whether the amendment be germane?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose to raise a question of order? It may be, perhaps, too late.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should doubt it; but I do not wish to raise a question of order, and will not, if the Chair thinks it is too late. I wish merely to say, that, so far as regards the importance or necessity of advertisements in the paper that has the largest circulation, my friend upon my right [Mr. CLINGMAN] is wrong in that particular, especially for the advertisements of the Government. If you go into a city anywhere, you will find that the paper which has the largest circulation is not, generally, the most sought for by merchants, but each man advertises in a paper which he considers as circulating among those whom he would reach with a notice of what he has to sell or what he wishes to buy. In that respect I think the amendment of the honorable gentleman is out of place. Besides, I do not like this fastidiousness as regards the public press—this continual assailing of the leaders and conductors of the public press, as if they were to be always put aside—as if they had not the common rights of an individual. With the same propriety you might say that Government officers shall not ride in a steamboat, or that the mails shall not go in a steamboat that conveys passengers. I dislike the idea. It is an impeachment and a reflection upon the pursuits of a large and respectable portion of our fellow-citizens; and though, perhaps, my friend, who is so peculiarly situated at the present time, has no feeling for either party—

Mr. CLINGMAN. That is true.

Mr. CHANDLER. Upon the whole, having a strong feeling for the party that is in power, and which means to retain its position, I feel that, though I am no longer attached to the public press, it is a kind of censure upon those who sustain the present Administration, and mean to continue the same kind of policy now. It is no less a reflection upon those who are scrambling to get into power. Let us treat all pursuits alike. Let us suppose that men who are printers of newspapers have rights, and are entitled to the exercise of the rights which belong to them as well as to others. I see no reason why we should select a ladies' newspaper, because it may, as it ought, circulate more, in which to publish advertisements of the Navy; or why we should select any other weekly newspaper devoted to literature, and obtain its extensive circulation on account of its literary excellence, in which to circulate advertisements of the War Department, or those of the various executive and legislative branches of the Government. It is for these reasons that I do not approve of the amendment. I was too late to make a point of order.

I move to strike out the first section of the amendment, and let my remarks be to that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, is, on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to amend the amendment by striking out the first section thereof.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not made a speech in favor of his own amendment, but against the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the first section of my amendment, and I take it that gives me a right to reply to his speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has now submitted a motion to strike out the first section of the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, and on that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has a right to make a speech.

Mr. JONES. Was it in order to make that motion at the time it was made?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that there is but one section to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, and therefore the motion submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order. The Chair was under the impression that there were two sections to the amendment.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Why cannot my amendment be amended?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from North Carolina cannot move to amend his own amendment.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Did not the gentleman from Pennsylvania move to strike out the first section of my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There is but one section to the amendment, and therefore that motion could not be made.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I suppose the gentleman meant the first clause of the amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "State" in the third line, so as to make it read:

Provided, That the selection of newspapers for the publication of the laws of the United States, shall, after the passage of this act, be made by the Secretary of State.

Mr. J. said: That amendment will probably leave the law pretty much as it is now, but my object in offering it, is to make a very few remarks upon the body of the amendment, which I propose to strike out. That portion of the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina which I propose to strike out, will, if adopted, increase the expenditure for the publication of the laws of the United States some $32,000 or $33,000. It will be borne in mind that a joint resolution has passed both Houses of Congress, and I suppose has, or will soon receive the signature of the President, authorizing the transmission, free of postage, through the mails, of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, containing the debates of Congress, and the laws which pass that body. This will carry the laws of Congress to all persons throughout the country, who feel sufficient interest in knowing what they are, to be willing to pay for that paper, and through that medium the laws will be more generally circulated than they could be by means of publishing them in the papers, as the gentleman from North Carolina proposes. The gentleman says he wishes to check the patronage of the Executive. Why, this, it seems to me, is but augmenting it. Instead of giving the Executive one paper in each State, the gentleman proposes that he shall have one in every Congressional district throughout the country, and perhaps, if he cannot find a paper in the district in which he has to publish the laws, he may establish one for that purpose, and to advocate his particular creed of politics. The pamphlet edition of the laws as printed, is, I believe, now required to be sent to the clerk of every county court in the United States, and the laws are there subject to the examination and inspection of the entire body of the people at any and at all times that they may wish to consult the laws for their general information, or for any particular and specific object. I think that the law as it now stands, would be much better than this amendment.

Again, sir, this amendment is out of place in this appropriation bill. It is permanent legislation in a general appropriation bill, and the President, in his last annual message, protests against that being adopted as a practice by Congress. These laws, when executed, become obsolete, and, in many places, they are not kept with those that are intended to be retained as permanent laws. Such a law as this, if passed at all, should be embodied in an act by itself, as proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am perfectly willing to modify my amendment, so as to meet the objection of the gentleman from Tennessee. So far as I am concerned, I do not care about increasing the number of papers in which the laws are to be published, at all. Instead of saying that they shall be published in one paper in each Congressional district, I am willing to say that they shall be published in two papers in each State.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] has alluded to the peculiar position in which I stand politically. For that very reason I have selected this occasion with a view of making this reform, if possible. I do not feel any great interest in the present presidential election, but I will say to the gentleman that it is perfectly uncertain which party is to come in, and therefore, now is the time for us to regulate this matter. I put it to the gentleman, who is a good Whig, if the Democrats should beat him and his party, or us, if he chooses to include me with them, is it right and fair that every newspaper in the United States that is to print the Government advertisements, and publish the laws, shall be a Democratic paper, and that the readers of Whig papers shall be excluded from the benefit of the publication of the laws? If, on the other hand, the Whigs prevail, is it right that the Democracy and their papers shall be entirely excluded? If you adopt my policy, and require the Executive to select the two papers in each State that have the largest number of subscribers, the result will be that some papers upon each side will get the publication of the laws.

Mr. CHANDLER. If that policy was carried out in the State of New York, the religious and literary papers would get it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My main object is to prevent the President, or the head of any Department, from influencing the newspaper press of the country in any way. I am willing to strike out from my amendment that about the Congressional districts, and leave it as it now stands—two papers in each State. In that way the Executive cannot influence the press at all—the whole matter will be perfectly fair, and the laws and advertisements will go into the newspapers that are read by the largest number of people. I repeat again, that, in order to meet the objection of the gentleman from Tennessee, I am willing to strike out that part of the amendment about the Congressional districts. I do not want to increase the patronage of the Executive. My only object is to deprive the President of the power to control the press of the country.

The question being upon Mr. JONES's amendment to the amendment,

Mr. FOWLER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER and SMART were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 39; no quorum voting.

[Loud cries of "Call the roll!"]

The roll was called, and the following gentlemen answered to their names, viz:

Messrs. Abernethy, Aiken, Willis Allen, John Appleton, William Appleton, Babel, Barrere, Bennett, Russell, Bockock, Bowie, Breckinridge, Brenton, Briggs, Burrows, Caldwell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Churchwell, Cleveland, Clingman, Cobb, Colcock, Daniel, John G. Alexander H. Stephens, Stratton, Thurston, Townshend, Venable, Walbridge, Walsh, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, and Wildrick.

The committee then rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. PHELPS) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 196 making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853; and having found itself without a quorum, had directed him to report the fact to the House, with the names of the absentees, as follows:

Messrs. Charles Allen, Allison, Ashe, Averett, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Beale, Bell, Bibbhaus, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Burt, Busby, E. The SPEAKER. A quorum being now present, the committee will again resume its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of Mr. JONES's amendment. The tellers will resume their places.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 36; still no quorum voting.

Mr. CLINGMAN. With the consent of the committee, I will withdraw my amendment.

[Cries of "Call the roll!"]

The roll was again called, and the following gentlemen answered to their names, viz:

Messrs. Abernethy, Willis Allen, William Appleton, Averett, Babelock, Barrere, Bennett, Bockock, Bowie, Briggs, Breckinridge, Brenton, Briggs, Burrows, Caldwell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chastain, Churchwell, Cleveland, Clingman, Cobb, Daniel, John G. The committee again rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. PHELPS) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 196; and having found itself without a quorum, had ordered the roll to be called, and had directed him to report the facts to the House, with the names of the absentees, viz:

Thompson, Toombs, Tuck, Wallace, Ward, Washburn, Addison White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodward, and Yates.

The SPEAKER. A quorum having appeared, the committee will again resume its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon Mr. JONES's amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CLINGMAN asked leave to withdraw his amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. SMART. I give notice that I shall offer the amendment just withdrawn by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] as soon as I can get the floor.

Mr. MEADE offered the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "form," in the 66th line, and insert the following:

And for distributing the same—one copy to each post office and one to each clerk's office in the several States and Territories, and in the District of Columbia.

So that the section will read:

For publishing the laws in pamphlet form, and for distributing the same—one copy to each post office and clerk's office in the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, at $21,325.

Mr. M. said: I think the committee will concur with me that the journals of the day are of very little service to the country so far as the publication of the laws of Congress are concerned. They are scarcely ever read. They pass away, and the hands of the people cannot be laid upon them when they are wanted. What I propose is to do away with the necessity for the publication of the laws in the newspapers at all, and in place thereof to use the same amount of money, or less—for I think it will require less—in distributing the laws in pamphlet form to each of the post offices in the United States, thereby placing a copy of the laws of the United States within five miles of every man's door. According to the present practice, the pamphlet copies of the laws of the United States are sent to the respective States, there to be distributed amongst the clerks' offices; but it is oftentimes the case that a man living thirty or forty miles from the clerk's office, will have to ride that distance to consult the laws. Now, if each post office in the country were made a depository of the laws, and each postmaster, by rules established in the Department, required to keep a copy of those laws, and to transmit them from one officer to another, then the laws of the United States will be accessible to every citizen of the United States. There are about thirty thousand post offices in the country. I do not think it will cost more than twelve and a half cents, or at most twenty-five cents per copy to distribute the pamphlet laws in the manner of which I speak. The whole cost will not be more than $5,000. The object will be attained, and it will be economizing the expense. I know that it will be a great convenience to the people to have the laws at all times within their reach. At present they are not within their reach. The papers which contain the laws are thrown away as soon as read, and when they are wanted they cannot be found, and the laws cannot be consulted without great expense and trouble. If we would take the amount of money appropriated in that clause, as it stands in the bill, and apply it in the manner I have indicated by this amendment, by distributing the laws in pamphlet form, we should accomplish more than by publishing the laws in the newspapers. Then we will have preserved, in a tangible and durable form, the laws we have passed, and have placed them within the reach of every man in the community. I propose this amendment, believing that it is one which ought to be adopted by the committee. It is one that would be very conducive to the convenience of the people, and I hope it will be the pleasure of the committee to adopt it.

Mr. SMART. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. SMART. I then offer the one just offered and withdrawn by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not exactly see the connection in which this is offered as an amendment. The gentleman can offer it as a substitute if he chooses.

Mr. SMART. I then offer it as a substitute. Mr. Chairman, I doubt very much whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina could have been well understood by the committee. It seems to me, if all the facts in relation to it were well understood, it would be adopted. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] alluded to the expense of this proposition, if it is carried out; but if I am correctly informed, he estimated the cost much higher than it really would be. I have the Blue-Book before me, showing the expense of publishing the laws for the Thirty-first Congress. It appears by it, that there were paid to each newspaper $93 for the short session, and $224 for the long session. This would make an average of about $150 per year. The whole amount, then, according to the plan I have proposed, would be about $35,000 per year for publishing the laws, and not $30,000 more than the present expense, as it has been stated. The expense under the present arrangement is something like $12,000, and it would be increased by about $25,000, to obtain the publication of the laws in some one paper in each Congressional district in the United States. So much in relation to expense. The gentleman from Tennessee alluded to the recent law passed in relation to the Congressional Globe. Now, does that gentleman suppose that the Congressional Globe will circulate to anything like a merest fraction of all the readers in the United States? There are nearly 5,000,000 subscribers to newspapers in the country, and yet the gentleman talks about their reading the laws from the Congressional-Globe! I want to send these laws to the people for them to read, and I say the expense is not large for such a purpose. That is what I wish to accomplish. I propose this plan of giving the publication of the laws of the United States to one paper in each Congressional district, being one paper for about every one hundred thousand inhabitants. I ask if that is too extended a circulation? Will gentlemen not give the people light in relation to their legislation? Will not gentlemen of this House let the people see their work? Will not they let the people see what they have done? It seems to me we ought to be willing to distribute these laws among the people of the country.

The circulation mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] is totally inadequate to the wants of the people. The circulation we have under the present arrangement is absurd. The laws do not circulate amongst any considerable portion of the people. That which I propose is a circulation that will be uniform in all sections of the country, and in proportion to the population. It seems to me this is a subject which addresses itself to the good sense of this committee. It not only proposes to give this information to the people, but it cuts off a very large amount of patronage from the control of the Government. The patronage of the Government is large enough already. I think in this thing I may be regarded as disinterested, for I have not a doubt that my candidate will be elected the next President of the United States. I think that a Democratic administration will have control of Government and control of the publishing of the laws under the present system. I may, therefore, be regarded as disinterested in the matter. I am not seeking to injure Whigs or benefit Democrats. I believe the proposition I have offered is correct in principle, that it ought to be adopted, and I trust it will be by the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Maine has talked about expenses. We are now about to appropriate for the year which will include the short session of Congress. The State Department, under whose direction these laws are to be printed in the papers, have estimated for the next session at $260 per paper. As the law now stands, the laws required to be published under the present arrangement will amount to an expense of about $18,200, I believe. Now, at the same rate—$260 for each paper—if they are published in one paper in each Congressional district, the expense will be over $51,000, making a difference of about $33,000 between the expense involved as the law now stands and as it will stand if the gentleman's amendment is adopted.

Mr. SMART. I want to say that these estimates are not borne out by the facts existing for the last several years.

Mr. JONES. But such are the facts. Here are the estimates upon which this bill has been reported, and we have allowed in this bill, upon the estimates sent us by the Department, $260 for each newspaper. At that rate, if the gentleman's amendment is adopted, it will make an increase upon the present appropriation of about $33,000 for the coming short session of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine being in the nature of a substitute, the question will first be put upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE.]

Mr. SMART. I intended to offer mine as an amendment to the amendment, and I supposed the question would first be put upon mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair inquired of the gentleman from Maine whether he intended to offer his proposition as an amendment to the amendment, or as a substitute for it. The gentleman indicated that he offered it as a substitute, in which case it would be first in order to perfect the original amendment before the question was taken upon the substitute.

Mr. SMART. As I understand it, if the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia be not concurred in, my amendment will fall with it. I desire to have the privilege of voting upon that amendment, and I therefore ask that the vote may be first taken upon it as an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question will first be put upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART.]

The amendment of Mr. SMART was again read. The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART.]

Mr. HEBARD. Is this a substitute for the original amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understood at first, but afterwards the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] stated that he intended it otherwise, and as a proviso to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE.]

Mr. HEBARD. Then it is not subject to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, as it is itself an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. EVANS. I move that the committee rise. [Cries of "No!" "No!" "No!"]

The question was taken, and there were upon a division—ayes 47, noes 31.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. Was there a quorum voting?

The CHAIRMAN. There was no quorum voting, but that is not necessary to authorize the committee to rise.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 196, making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1853, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report a bill, for the purpose of having it referred and printed.

The bill was read for information, as follows:

A bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is not the bill received?

The SPEAKER. It is not. It was objected to by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

Mr. STANLY. As the gentleman from Georgia objects, after it has had its first reading, what becomes of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It was read merely for information, and has not been received by the House.

On motion the House then adjourned.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following memorial and petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The memorial of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company of New York, and of seven other Mutual Insurance companies of that city, for the passage of a bill for the better protection of the lives of passengers in vessels propelled by steam.

By Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana: The petition of John R. Burke, and 92 other citizens of Louisiana and Texas, praying that a post road be established from the mouth of Red river to Burr's ferry, in Louisiana, thence to Huntsville, Texas.

Also, the petition of Edward T. Ellis, Luther Hughes, and 85 other citizens of Louisiana, in relation to the "Baron De Bastrop Grant."

By Mr. HAWS: The memorial of Isaac Macy, Amos Palmer and others, of the city of New York, asking that the Senate bill for the better protection of passengers on board of vessels propelled by steam, be passed without amendment.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 4, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. FISH presented a petition of citizens of Wayne county, New York, praying an appropriation for the repair of the piers at the mouth of Great Sodus Bay, on Lake Ontario; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of Williamsburg, New York, praying that the "homestead bill" may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of the heirs of Major Caleb Swann, who was formerly a Paymaster General in the Army of the United States, praying for a settlement of the accounts of the deceased, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

PENSION AND BOUNTY LAND LAWS.

On motion by Mr. WALKER, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. GEYER, the 12th of July, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to purchase five hundred copies of the pension and bounty land laws, with the opinions, decisions, and regulations in relation to those laws, recently compiled by Mayo & Moulton, provided the price does not exceed $3 50 per copy.

The above resolution was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. No amendment being offered, it was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

CLERK OF CENSUS BUREAU.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate take up the motion, made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] a few days ago, to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution explanatory of the act providing for the taking of the Seventh Census was ordered to be engrossed, and which is now lying on the table. If there is no objection, I desire to have that question acted upon, as it is necessary that it should be decided promptly.

Mr. SEWARD. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] takes a good deal of interest in this question, and he is not now present. I understand that he made the motion to reconsider, and I therefore hope the motion to reconsider may not be taken up to-day in his absence.

Mr. DAVIS. I gave notice to the Senator from North Carolina that I should call up this resolution, and he assented to the propriety of taking it up and acting upon it promptly. I forbore, yesterday, to make this motion, because I did not see him in his seat. He has sent no word to me, and therefore I think he feels indifferent in regard to it. There are other gentlemen who feel as much interest in having this question decided as I do.

Mr. BORLAND. If it be in order, I will say one word on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS], to take up the joint resolution, as I perceive that it did not receive particular attention from the Senate.

A few days ago a joint resolution passed the Senate, explanatory of an amendment which had been made to the act of 1850, for taking the census of the United States, and fixing the salary of the Superintendent Clerk, and the amount of compensation to the Secretary of the Census Board. By an amendment to a recent bill, which does not seem to have attracted much attention at the time, a difficulty has been presented to the Treasury Department as to the true interpretation of the act of 1850.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator must be aware that the resolution is on the table, and not under consideration by the Senate.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not discussing the merits of the question; but simply calling the attention of Senators to the nature of the resolution which the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to take up from the table.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that that resolution is intended to lead the officers of the Treasury to a true interpretation of the act of 1850, and to decide whether two salaries or one shall be paid for the same service.

Mr. BADGER. Then I hope the resolution will be taken up and passed.

Mr. SEWARD. I suppose that if it is proper for a Senator to give an explanation of the resolution, it is equally proper that a counter explanation should be given.

I would ask the Senator from Arkansas if there was any pretense made to claim payment of the two salaries?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must again call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the question is not now open for discussion.

The question was then taken on the motion to take up the motion to reconsider; and it was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now on reconsidering the vote by which the resolution was passed:

Mr. DAWSON. I move to postpone the further consideration of this matter. I was not present when the motion to reconsider was made, and therefore know not the reasons why the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] made that motion. He is not now present, and in his absence I hope the postponement will be agreed to. In the mean time, that Senator can be informed of the necessity of having the resolution disposed of, and if, after such notice, he does not appear, then the question can be taken up and disposed of. I move to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS. If this measure is to be adopted at all, it is necessary that it should be adopted immediately. The law was passed a few days ago. Whether the President has signed it or not I do not know. He had not done so when I offered this resolution. If the explanatory act is necessary at all, it is necessary that it should be passed at once. It is now drawing towards the close of the session, and I am urged to have this matter sent to the House; that they may act upon it there.

The question being taken to postpone the further consideration of the motion to reconsider, it was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now on the motion to reconsider. Will the Senate agree to the motion?

Mr. BELL. Let me state, before the decision of the Chair is announced, that I understand that if a reconsideration is not ordered by the Senate, the resolution stands as it is now.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly it does.

Mr. BELL. Then I think we ought to pause a moment before we finally decide. I understand the difficulty of the Department was in regard to the proper construction of two acts of Congress—on constituting a Board of Commissioners to superintend the census, in which there was a provision allowing the Secretary of that Board a salary at the rate of $3,000 a year. There was an act passed subsequently to this appointing a Superintendent of the Census, whose duties it was supposed by Congress would supersede the duties of Secretary of the Board of Commissioners. The latter act did not specifically provide that the salary of the Secretary of that Board should be discontinued. There was no repealing act; and the question arose whether Congress meant to supersede the salary of the Secretary, and his duties also, or what interpretation of those two acts was meant by Congress.

Some difficulty has occurred, but I understand that the Superintendent of the Census has never claimed two salaries. The proposition to declare what the intention of Congress was, goes upon the presumption that he claims both salaries, which together amount to $5,500. I understand that he has not made any claims to the whole, but he supposed that Congress did not mean that he should perform the arduous and responsible duties of superintending the whole business of arranging the census for a less salary than he received as clerk or secretary of the original Board. The latter act, as I understand, provides that the Superintendent of the Census Bureau shall have a salary of $2,500 only. As Secretary of the Census Board, he received $3,000, and he supposed that Congress did not mean to diminish his salary, and that there was some mistake.

Whatever gentlemen may think of the success or ability, or want of either, which has attended the duties of the Superintendent of the Census Bureau, where the responsibilities were certainly very much increased, and whatever gentlemen may think of the value of his compilations, I have never heard any gentleman suggest that he had not attended to those duties with great industry and vigor, and most unremittingly; and surely if it be true, it is not at all connected with the question as to how much of this compilation should be published.

He is entitled to some consideration at least from the Senate and the House of Representatives, considering his great trust and responsibility, and the perseverance, and activity, and industry, and energy with which he has applied himself to his charge. Whatever be the ultimate value of the work, I put it to the Senate whether he ought not to receive $3,000 a year, as he did when he was Secretary of the Census Board—the sum which is paid to every other head of a bureau?

Sir, I have had numerous applications from individuals residing in my section of the country in the southwest, who are interested in railroad statistics, for information which they supposed could be obtained at the Census Office, and I must say, that more promptness, and obligingness, and alacrity, I have never found. I have generally found the answers which I received satisfactory; and all the information that could be obtained in the voluminous returns at that office, has been promptly furnished. I bear this testimony with pleasure to the accommodating disposition and the industry, and, so far as I have been able to discern, the energy with which that officer has done his duty. I repeat, that whatever may be the value of the compilation, or the estimation in which it may be held, or whatever may be its lack of value, he certainly is entitled to the credit of industry, and perhaps there will be found much of skill in the arrangement of the crude materials which he had before him. For these reasons, I think this resolution ought to be considered, in justice to him; and as we now have the subject before us—unless we design to discriminate between the allowance which we give to this officer and the other heads of bureaus—unless we think this is not a trust which justifies the giving a salary of $3,000 a year (although we gave him that salary when he was Secretary of the Census Board)—justice seems to require, in settling the interpretation of the two acts of Congress, that Congress should no longer leave the matter in doubt; and if it proposes the prosecution of this business in the manner it has been heretofore conducted, that officer should have a salary of $3,000 a year, which he received when he was Secretary of the Census Board. I hope I have given sufficient reason to the Senate for detaining them for a moment before the question is finally voted upon.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senate indulge me with a few words of explanation? I was not the chairman of the committee who reported the bill containing the clause of which this joint resolution is explanatory. In my absence, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. DOWNS] was the chairman of that committee.

I do not object so much to the payment of $3,000 to this gentleman, (Mr. Kennedy,) as I do object to the mode in which, perhaps, he may obtain it. The old Census Board had a secretary, and this gentleman was the secretary, and he received for his services $3,000; but in the bill known as the census act of 1850, there was an express clause providing that he should receive $3,000 for the services that he has rendered. That seems to imply that the intention was to cut him off in future from all compensation for services as secretary. I was on that committee, and think that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] will bear me out in that. Well, the bill was sent to the Judiciary Committee, to arrange a dispute between California and South Carolina; California claiming that she should have two Representatives, although the returns of her census were imperfect, and South Carolina claiming that she should have an additional Representative, on the ground of her large fraction above the ratio; and at the bottom of that bill, in nowise connected with it, was the clause by which this gentleman might claim $5,000 for services which he says he has rendered as secretary of that Board. I am perfectly willing to vote for any bill which may be introduced for the purpose of raising his salary from $2,500 to $3,000. If he will come and say that he rendered those services under misconception as to the true interpretation of the act, I should say nothing about it; but when such a clause was introduced into the bill sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, I must declare my objection to it, because I feel that it would be wrong.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. DOWNS] has said, that it was in the power of the Secretary of the Interior to frame such a bill as was necessary, and this bill giving Mr. Kennedy $3,000 a year, or, as Mr. Whitlesey says, $5,500; was sent down. It is the mode by which this proposed increase of salary was to be effected, that I object to.

Mr. DAVIS. If it is the desire of my friend from Tennessee, or any other gentleman, to enter into the discussion of this subject, I have no objection to it; but I beg leave to say, inasmuch as the argument of my friend from Tennessee has been urged with a view to show the propriety of reconsidering the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, that he is entirely mistaken in many of the opinions which he has expressed. There is no such thing in existence—as can be proved most abundantly—as the Census Board. It was functus officio long ago. There can be no such officer as the Secretary of that Board. Now the effect of the amendment which has been made, is to allow the salary, more or less, to this gentleman, upon the ground, that he is Secretary of that Board. I take leave, in advance, to say that I do not want to go into the argument of the question. I do not desire to discuss it, unless other gentlemen do. If they do, I shall disclose the facts of the case. But I take occasion to say, that this is a matter which has been greatly deliberated upon in the Departments. I have their various decisions in my drawer. I have the order which has been issued upon this topic; and it will turn out, that there is an order from the Secretary of the Interior to do just what my friend says was not done—to make allowance to this individual as Superintending Clerk of the Census, and also as Secretary of the Board.

Mr. BELL. To allow him both salaries?

Mr. DAVIS. As Secretary of the Board to allow him $2,000 a year. The salary as Superintending Clerk is limited to $2,500. The amount of $3,000 could not be obtained, unless the two offices are coupled together. Now, if this joint resolution is not passed; the next step is, that if it opens the way to recover anything as Secretary of the Census Board, it opens it to recover the whole $3,000 as salary of the Superintending Clerk in addition. That is precisely the case which I wish to shut out. If this gentleman is entitled to additional compensation, let the measure be brought forward openly and fairly; let it be canvassed, and let the Senate pass its judgment upon it—not in this indirect way, by striking out words in the original statute, which limited his service to the past, and when it designed to limit them to the past, make them extend to the future, and give him pay for an office which must necessarily be a sinecure. This is the answer I make to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Before the Senator takes his seat, I would like to address to him this inquiry: If this resolution should not pass, I would like to ask whether this gentleman could receive more than $3,000 a year from the time he entered upon the performance of his duties up to the present time?

Mr. DAVIS. In answer to the Senator I will state, that, in the census bill, as it is called, there is a provision—and that provision was put there at the instance of this very gentleman, put in as an amendment to the bill of the Senate in the House of Representatives—appointing an officer that had never existed before, called the Superintending Clerk of the Census—an officer who, by the act, is to be competent to superintend the census generally, and have assigned to him a salary of $2,500 a year. He took the oath of office as Superintending Clerk of the Census, I think, on the 27th of May, 1850, and has been discharging the duties of that office ever since. Now, you open this act and give him additional pay without any limitation, and without any explanation; and if it gives anything, does it not give the $3,000? It gives the $3,000 in addition to the $2,500, if it gives anything at all. There is no limitation in the world, nor any discretion, to change, or alter, or modify the sum. That is the precise interpretation which must be put upon it.

Mr. BRODHEAD. The honorable Senators from Massachusetts and Tennessee understand this thing differently. I understand from the Senator from Tennessee that if this thing stands as it now is, without the passage of the resolution, this gentleman will receive only $3,000—and that is all he desires to receive—from the time he entered upon the performance of his duties.

Mr. BELL. I do not think that there is any substantial difference between myself and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, though he stated I was entirely mistaken in my facts. I should like to know one fact which I stated improperly, according to his own statement. I said that there had been no express repeal of the Census Board, or of the allowance of the salary to the Secretary. He admits that there has been no express repeal of the act appointing the Commissioners of the Census Board, and appointing a Secretary to them; and this is the ground upon which I stated there was an embarrassment at the Treasury. The two allowances were outstanding; but it seemed to me proper to presume, that Congress did not mean that the two salaries should be allowed; and there has been no proposition to allow the two. But, as the first act had not been expressly repealed, there was a difficulty at the Treasury, and Mr. Kennedy, the Superintending Clerk of the Census Bureau, so far as he was concerned, only desired that he should be allowed $3,000 as salary; he thought he ought to have $3,000. The board had not been expressly discontinued, though it is evident Congress must have supposed it would be; and that there could be no use for it; and they appointed the Superintending Clerk of the Census. Then I am not mistaken about the Department's supposing he is entitled to the two. I was right in both these particulars.

But the honorable Senator stated a fact that I did not know; that the Secretary of the Interior did propose to allow him $500 for some supposed or actual duties discharged as Secretary of the old Board. I did not know that. I only stated that there was an embarrassment at the Treasury; and that the Superintending Clerk of the Census thought he had been entitled to $3,000 a year for his services, and upon that ground the difficulty arose. I furthermore stated, that, under the uncertainty which existed in regard to the meaning of Congress—though I think the fair inference is, that they intended by the latter act to supersede the former, by the appointment of the Superintending Clerk of the Census to supersede the secretaryship of the Board, though they did not abolish the Board expressly—it is important that the matter should be explained by a declaratory law. This joint resolution has that object in view, and the purpose for which I rose was, that I thought justice demanded when we proposed to settle this question, that we should provide that this Superintending Clerk of the Census should receive $3,000 a year in consideration of his arduous duties, and the responsibilities attaching to them, whatever estimate we may place upon the taking of the census for which we provided by law.

I do not see that there is any essential difference between us, except that the Senator from Massachusetts supposes, that if we want to give the additional $500, it should be brought forward in a separate measure. Now, sir, would it not be more economical, in point of time, as well as of expenditure, if you go into that, when we have this joint resolution before us, passing a declaratory law upon the two statutes, to settle this matter with regard to the claim for salary of the Clerk of the Board, that we should do justice at once in the whole matter? That is my sole object. I cannot see any good reason why this should be made a separate question. We can as readily determine it now, as we shall have but little time for the examination of questions from this to the end of the session. We can decide as well now whether we will allow him the $3,000 or only $2,500. I cannot see the force of the argument that it ought to be brought forward as a separate measure, unless it is apparent to this body that he ought not to be allowed the larger sum. I understand the Senator from South Carolina to say that he has no particular objections to this individual being allowed the $3,000, but he objects to the way in which this thing has been managed. We may all feel some objection, but that does not disturb the question or interfere with the right or justice of a reasonable liberality to this gentleman in fixing his salary now, when we propose to settle the construction under these two laws. That is all I wished to lay before the Senate. I hope I have made myself intelligible.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. President, I desire merely to place the facts of the case correctly before the Senate, as I have the documents from the Department showing how these various points arose, and how they have been adjudicated and decided upon. The Board of Census was constituted in March, 1849. That Board was authorized to make the preparations to take the census, which has now been taken; and they were authorized, also, to appoint a secretary. They appointed a secretary, at a salary of $3,000 per annum. When we passed the law prescribing how and in what manner the census should be taken, we authorized the appointment of a superintendent, by the Secretary of the Interior, and gave him a salary of $2,500; but in that law we did not repeal or annul the existing Board of Census or their secretary. When the law authorizing the census to be taken went into operation, the Secretary of the Interior appointed the Secretary of the Board of Census the Superintendent. Hence it was that he was the Superintendent under the law, and Secretary to the Census Board. There being no law to prohibit him taking both salaries, as it was thought, he still continued to take the salary of the Secretary of the Census Board. A question then arose in the Department, and it was this: By the act of Congress authorizing the taking of the census, was the Census Board repealed or annulled? That question was submitted to the Board itself, which consisted of Daniel Webster, John J. Crittenden, and some other gentleman; and I find, on the 30th of September, 1851, the Secretary of the Interior (Mr. Stuart) directs the following letter to the Census Board:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, }
WASHINGTON, September 30, 1851. }

GENTLEMEN: Mr. J. C. G. Kennedy was appointed by you Secretary of the Census Board, with a salary of $3,000 per annum. He was also appointed by this Department Superintendent of the Census. His salary in the latter capacity is fixed by law at $2,500. He has discharged the duties of both offices, but has claimed and received as his compensation heretofore $3,000.

A question has now been made by the accounting officers, as I am informed, as to the amount which he is to receive in future. It is said that your Board has completed its duties, and is to be regarded as dissolved, and therefore that Mr. Kennedy is no longer entitled to receive compensation as Secretary, but only as Superintendent.

I have received no official notice from you of the completion of your duties, or that your Board has dissolved itself. I conceive that you are the proper persons to decide that question, and that the accounting officers have no authority to dissolve the Census Board without its consent; and I therefore ask the favor of you to say whether you regard your labors as ended, and your secretary discharged from his duties; and if so, at what date his services ceased?

If, on the other hand, you regard yourselves as still constituting a Board, and Mr. Kennedy as in your service, you will please say so, and advise me hereafter when you shall conclude to dissolve the Census Board and release the secretary from his duties. Very respectfully, &c.

ALEX. H. H. STUART, Secretary.

To the Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, J. J. CRITTENDEN, and N. K. HALL, Members of the Census Board.

There is the inquiry as to whether the Board was dissolved and the Secretary discharged. Here is the reply:

WASHINGTON, September 30, 1851.

SIR: We have received your letter of to-day, and have the honor to reply that we do not consider the Census Board, of which we are members, as dissolved, or Mr. J. C. G. Kennedy, the Secretary of that Board, as discharged from office. The duties for which the Board was constituted and the Secretary appointed, have not been finally completed. We regard the Board as still continuing, and the secretary as still in office, and as entitled as such to the salary of $3,000 per annum, and at that rate.

We are, very respectfully, yours, &c.,

J. J. CRITTENDEN.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

P. S. When the board by its own official acts shall be dissolved, we will not fail to make it known to you.

J. J. C.

D. W.

Hon. A. H. H. STUART, Secretary of the Interior.

Here was the board still in existence. Here was an officer appointed as Secretary, with the salary of $3,000. That same individual was appointed Superintending Clerk, with a salary of $2,500. Now, I take occasion here to observe, that Mr. Kennedy has never demanded, nor thought of demanding, both salaries.

Mr. DAVIS. What has he demanded?

Mr. DAWSON. He demanded $3,000, the largest of the two salaries, and has received it for two years; and now it is proposed to take back $500 of the amount, to reduce him to the salary of the Superintending Clerk, when he has been discharging both the duties of the Secretary of the Board and Superintending Clerk. By what principle is it that we undertake, when there are two existing salaries by our own act, and by our own appointment, given to the same individual, to cut him down by a joint resolution to the lowest salary, when he discharges the duties of both offices?

What occurs then? Mr. Stuart, seeing the position in which things are placed—and I beg to call the attention of my honorable friend, the Senator from South Carolina, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. BUTLER,] to this—and desiring to avoid all the conflicts growing out of hasty legislation, and to keep the Government correct, and prevent the loss of $2,500 additional by our own act, confines the Superintending Clerk to one, and then asks us to do—what? To regulate our legislation, so as not to give a legal right to one individual to claim two separate and distinct salaries. That individual disdains to do it; he never did it, and never thought of such a thing; and if he had, it would not have been allowed by the Department. Then Mr. Stuart directs the following letter to the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, March 8, 1852.

SIR: An some difficulty has occurred in regard to the salary of Mr. Kennedy, who has acted in the double capacity of Census Superintendent and Secretary of the Census Board, I would respectfully suggest the introduction of a clause into the supplementary bill which you propose to report, fixing his salary at $3,000. I think he richly merits it, and I can see no reason why he should stand on a different footing from the other heads of bureaus.

Very respectfully, &c.,

A. H. H. STUART.

Hon. A. P. BUTLER, chairman of the Judiciary Committee U. S. Senate.

The Chairman of the Committee, I take occasion to say, was absent at the time this letter was addressed to him, and it necessarily went to the acting chairman. What course could have been better pursued to have justice done, and the facts known to the Senate, than this? The Secretary of the Interior calls upon the Judiciary Committee to regulate this question; and what is the sum total of it? We by our legislation appoint a Secretary, because we authorized the Census Board to do so, at a salary of $3,000. We authorize a Superintending Clerk to be appointed, with a salary of $2,500. He does not pretend to claim both salaries; he only asks for the largest, while he discharges the duties of both. Now, so soon as the Census Board shall be closed, and the Commissioners of the Board of Census shall dissolve the Board, and shall announce the fact to the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Board of Census will have terminated his official duties, and will be entitled only to the salary of $2,500. Then will come up the question suggested by the Senator from Tennessee: Is not this individual justly, honestly, and fairly entitled to the sum of $3,000 per annum as the head of the Census Bureau? When we look at the labors performed, and the industry and energy exhibited by him, I can see no reason why we should attempt to depreciate his labor and his intelligence by reducing him below the common ordinary heads of bureaus. There is nothing of impropriety, nothing of injustice, and no attempt made by individuals or heads of Departments to take any advantage of our omission to make our laws correct. He asks for the largest salary, as every man would do. When the Census Board is dissolved, he must necessarily fall back to the $2,500, unless we pursue the course suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, and have the resolution so amended as to close this whole unpleasant matter, which it seems to be now, by declaring that his salary shall be $3,000.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose the whole merits of this matter are open upon the question of reconsideration?

The PRESIDENT. They are.

Mr. DAVIS. Then, Mr. President, if the Senate will lend me their attention, I will show, by the terms of the law itself, that the conclusions which the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Tennessee draw, are a mistaken apprehension of the clearest terms of the statute itself. For that purpose I must refer to the laws which have been passed upon the subject. It is no personal gratification to me to engage in this controversy, and I have forborne, hitherto, to enter into it any further than was necessary to make known the object of the resolution; but it has now become indispensable that the facts should be made known, though they involve personal conduct.

There have been differences of opinion in the Departments, and I shall refer to them so far as to make the matter understood, and no further. I think I can show, very clearly, that the Secretary of the Census Board, by the terms of the law, had ceased to be an officer of that Board when the census act of 1850 was passed. It is true that, in 1849, there was an act passed on the subject—an act, the title of which is, "An act to make arrangements for taking the census." It was an act, remember, to make arrangements. It provided that the Secretary of State, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General should be a Board, to be called the Census Board, and that it should be their duty to prepare blank forms for the enumeration of the inhabitants, and blank forms for the other purposes usually embraced within a census, and to print them. I wish to draw the attention of the Senate particularly to the last section of that act. It is not, as the gentlemen say, a section providing a salary of $3,000 a year for this secretary, but it authorizes the appointment of a secretary. I will read the terms in which it authorizes that appointment:

"That the said board shall have power to appoint a secretary, whose remuneration shall be determined by Congress upon the completion of the duties assigned to the Board."

The remuneration is to be determined by Congress on the completion of the duties assigned to the Board. Then, by the terms of this act, there was nothing to be paid to this officer until the duties were completed. That is very obvious. Then follows the census act of 1850, which contains this provision in the nineteenth section: "And to enable him," (that is, the Secretary of the Interior,) "the better to discharge these duties, he is hereby authorized and required to appoint a suitable and competent person as superintending clerk." Not as the head of a bureau, as gentlemen assume, but as superintending clerk, "who shall, under his direction, have the general management of matters appertaining thereto, with the privilege of franking, and receiving, free of charge, all official documents and letters connected therewith." He was to be a man competent to, and it was to be his duty to superintend, generally, the matters relating to the census, and the whole census. That is the express duty assigned to him.

Here, I would remark, is a departure from the usage; for heretofore, when former censuses were taken, the duty of general supervision was referred to the head of a Department—the Treasury, I believe—and he assigned such force as he saw fit from the ordinary clerks of the Department to discharge the duty of digesting the enumeration and the statistics. This is a new officer—a higher grade of "clerk"—and receiving, I believe, as clerk, a higher salary than any other individual in any of the Departments. Now, let us hear what provision was made in the act for the appointment of this gentleman. The twentieth section of the same act provides as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of carrying into effect this act, and defraying the preliminary expenses, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $150,000; out of which the said Secretary of the Interior may allow to the person employed as Secretary of the Census Board, a compensation after the rate of $3,000 per annum during the period he has been in their employ."

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Butler] is entirely right in the declaration which he made, when he took the floor, that it was the purpose of the committee, and the purpose of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives, to limit the pay of this gentleman to the past, that is, for services rendered anterior to the passage of the act. They considered his duties as completed, and for that reason his pay due according to the act of 1849; but whether completed or not the duties of Secretary of that Board were identical with the duties of Superintending Clerk. The nineteenth section of the act of 1850 contained, as I have shown, a provision for the appointment of a competent and suitable person to be Superintending Clerk, who, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, was to superintend all matters relating to the census. If there were any duties remaining for the Secretary of the Census Board, they were transferred to this clerk. That is the clear intention, and clear interpretation of the act. It is clearly susceptible of no other construction than this. Congress limited his pay as Secretary of the Census Board to the past, because they knew that they had provided another officer who was to perform all the duties of superintendence. The duties of the Secretary of the Board were therefore to end with the passage of the law, and the settlement with him was to be final, because his service was completed. The fact that a new officer was created to perform his duties made this arrangement not only appropriate, but indispensable. There was no mistake in the use of words, but on the contrary, the language employed carried out the purpose of Congress.

Having now referred to all the parts of the law material to this issue, I now solicit the attention of the Senate to a very brief narrative of what has been done in the Department. I do not propose to follow it through all the stages of its progress, but I think I can show clearly that even Mr. Kennedy himself gave to the clauses of the act to which I have referred, exactly the construction for which I now contend.

The papers before me state, that on the 27th of May, 1850, he was appointed Superintending Clerk, and took the oath of office as such. The census act passed on the 23d of May, 1850. Now, if the Senate will carry these dates along with it, and look into another provision of the act, they will see that the taking of the census was to commence on the first day of June. That was the day assigned for the enumeration, and to which all the facts were referable. Mr. Kennedy went into this office four days before the census act went into operation—before the blanks and instructions, indeed all the preliminary papers, were to come into practical use.

Let us take a glance now, at the duties of the Census Board, and then we shall see how this construction stands with reference to the duties assigned to that Board. The Census Board was appointed to prepare tables, and to print them. That was their whole duty, under the law of 1849. They did prepare tables, but when Congress assembled, they were not reported to the two Houses so early as was anticipated. The Senate, finding no tables here, appointed a select committee to take the whole subject into their hands, and report upon it. That committee assembled—had many sittings—and this Secretary of the Census Board laid before us, informally, certain tables, they not having been officially reported. We took up those tables, examined them, amended them largely, introducing many things and rejecting many things, and finally made a report to the Senate. I need not go through an account of the wearisome discussions which were had here, and the attempts on the part of that Secretary to displace those tables, and insert others. That is a matter which has no particular connection with this question. The passage of the Census bill was however long delayed by that process. The bill went to the House, and there the same scenes were gone through, and these tables were more or less modified and amended there, as I think, not to the advantage of the public service; as they were overloaded with columns which have led to confusion and inaccuracy. The law passed, but its passage was delayed until the 23d of May. By its own terms, it was to go into immediate operation, and the census was to be taken on the 1st of June. But in this same census act of 1850, there was a further provision made, that inasmuch as the Census Board had commenced the printing of the preparatory matter, and carried it, as was alleged, far towards completion, they should superintend its completion, so far as printing was concerned. The latter part of the nineteenth section, relating to that subject, is in these words:

"The blanks and preparatory printing for taking the Census shall be prepared and executed under the direction of the Census Board; the other printing to be executed as Congress shall direct."

Now, what is the "preparatory printing?" It is the blanks and the printing of the circulars; nothing else. That printing should have been completed at the day when the census was to be taken, because all these papers should have been distributed by that day, as the act could not be carried into effect without them. Whether they were distributed, and the business completed on that day or not, the purpose was to transfer the duties of that office of Secretary of the Census Board to the Superintending Clerk. What had the Superintending Clerk to do, if it was not his duty to see to this? I said that the duties of the Superintending Clerk and of the Secretary of the Census Board were identical. They were one and the same thing. And it is difficult to conceive, if we were to maintain an officer under the name of Secretary of the Census Board, to perform that duty, what would have been left for the Superintending Clerk to do. I speak with some confidence upon this subject, because the terms of the act authorize me so to do; and I think the meaning and intention of the act, as far as I understand it, authorize me so to do.

I will now proceed to show that Mr. Kennedy himself acquiesced in this view of the matter. According to the terms of the act of 1849, he was to be settled with when his duties were completed and ended. Congress was then to assign to him the pay which he was to receive. What did this gentleman do after he was appointed Superintending Clerk? He called upon the Department for a settlement pursuant to the terms of the act. He got his certificate from Mr. Clayton, the then Secretary of State, certifying the time for which he was entitled to pay under the twentieth section of the act of 1850. Here is Mr. Clayton's certificate. I need not trouble the Senate with reading it. It states that Mr. Kennedy was entitled to thirteen months' pay. That carried it up to the 1st day of June, 1850. He received from the accounting officers of the Department, as Secretary of the Census Board, up to the 1st day of June, his pay after the rate of $3,000 a year.

It will be noted that there is something significant in these dates. The 1st of June did not end a quarter, but it was the point of time when the taking of the census was to commence, and the settlement was up to that date. The 30th of June was the quarter day. On the 30th of June this gentleman received his pay as Superintending Clerk, at the rate of $2,500 per annum for the month; and nothing more was claimed. At the end of the next quarter, the 30th of September, he received his pay again as Superintending Clerk, and demanded nothing more. And as the Comptroller very significantly expresses it, the idea of double pay, or compensation as Secretary of the Census Board and Superintending Clerk, never flashed through this gentleman's mind until about seven months had elapsed from the 1st day of June. Seven months had elapsed before this thought of so construing the statutes as to secure to himself double pay, had ever entered his mind. That statement is contained in the record which I have before me. Thus matters went along; and on the 26th of December, 1850, there was an order issued by the Secretary of the Interior, to which I wish to invite the attention of the Senate. From the reading of this order my friend from Tennessee, and my friend from Georgia, will see whether they are right or not in the statement that this gentleman never demanded pay for more than one office. Here is the order:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, December 26, 1850.

SIR: You are hereby directed to pay to Joseph C. G. Kennedy, Esquire, for his services as Superintending of the Seventh Census, and as Secretary of the Census Board, a salary at the rate of $3,000 per annum, commencing on the 1st of June, 1850; and this shall be your authority for the same. I am, sir, &c.,

ALEXANDER H. H. STUART,
Secretary.

R. H. WILLIAMSON, Disbursing Agent,
Department of the Interior.

Now, I say this order was issued under some mistake and misapprehension of the law. I need not argue that point, for it is quite out of the question for this gentleman to assign a less sum than the two salaries, if he authorizes anything to be paid to him as Secretary of the Census Board. If he authorizes anything to be paid on this ground, I deny, utterly, his power to limit it to $500 unless by the voluntary consent of Mr. Kennedy. If there is a foundation broad enough in the construction of this act to authorize the payment of $500, it is wide enough to cover $3,000; and if he is entitled to receive pay as Superintending Clerk of the Census, and also as Secretary of the Census Board, he is entitled by law, whether he claims it or not, to $5,500. The disbursing officer of the Interior Department proceeded to make the payment according to this direction of the Secretary, and he made the payment for some eighteen months, as nearly as I recollect, allowing, in the first place, a salary of $2,500 as Superintending of the Census, and then $500 as Secretary of the Census Board.

My friend from Georgia has read papers to show that the Census Board was never dissolved.

I think I have shown clearly that by the terms of the statute, if they had any duties for any person to perform in their behalf, as Secretary, those duties were transferred to the Superintending Clerk of the Census. But let us look a moment at the matter, and see how it stands. These blanks ought to have been distributed—whether they were or not I do not know—before the first day of June. That they were nearly completed at that time, and the business nearly finished, cannot admit of a doubt. What, then, remained? The Census Board had but two offices to perform. One was to prepare the blanks, and the other to see that they were printed; and when they made their report to the Senate and the House of Representatives, they were functus officio. There was an end of their duties. That report was made, I believe, in February, 1850. If it had not been for the fact, that by the law of 1850 they were left with the duty of superintending the "preparatory printing," which remained to be done, they would have had no duty of any kind left. How long did that duty last? How long a time was required for the printing of the preparatory papers, that is, the printing of the blanks and circulars?

Sir, is it not a striking fact in regard to this matter, that this order was dated on the 26th of December; and when the payments under it were made, the census had all been completed, and the returns made? What duty had this Board then to perform in printing preparatory papers? I cannot make the argument any stronger or any plainer than the statements of the proposition itself makes it. It is preposterous to say that this Board was in existence, and had a right to employ a secretary, when this secretary had no duties to perform. There were no duties, and could be none, which he then had to perform. It would be allowing him pay for a sinecure office. But the answer to the whole of it is, that those duties, if there were any, were the appropriate duties of the Superintending Clerk.

These payments, nevertheless, went on by the disbursing officer for the period of time I have stated. They finally reached the First Comptroller. The First Comptroller is a man that understands his duties. He knew that no money could be drawn from the Treasury of the United States without warrant of law. He knew that there must be a law to authorize it. He set himself to work, and inquired into the matter. He investigated the acts of Congress in regard to it; and arrived at the only conclusion which the facts can sanction: that there was no authority of law to execute the order of the Secretary of the Interior—none whatever; and he refused to execute it; and gave notice to the disbursing officer of the Department of the Interior, that there was no authority of law under which the allowance could be made, and that any such claim could not pass with his sanction as Comptroller. Well, sir, I take it, that that has been sanctioned by everybody. I have heard of no attempt to appeal from the decision of this officer, and no attempt to draw his decision into question as unjust or wrong in any way. There the matter stood.

What next was done? The disbursing officer of the Department of the Interior found it necessary, as a personal responsibility devolved upon him for paying sums of money which he was not authorized by law to allow; and he deducted those overpayments, amounting to about $800, from the accruing salary of Mr. Kennedy, as it became due, in order to indemnify the Treasury; so that this officer has derived no benefit from the order of the Secretary of the Interior, or the allowances which were made to him. As the object of getting pay for two offices could not be accomplished through the Department—as that was despaired of, he came to a committee of the Senate, and a proposition was made here to amend the law in the way and manner which has been pointed out by my honorable friend from South Carolina; and rather an extraordinary manner it was; because, by the very terms of the act, words were stricken out of the printed law of 1850, and other words were inserted in their place. I do not mean to say that that is an improper way; but it is an unusual way of proceeding to strike out words from a statute which has been a long time in existence, and printed among the laws, and insert other words in lieu of them.

Mr. President, the position which I assume is in accordance with the law of the land, in regard to the right of any individual to receive pay for two offices. Let me read now from an act passed in 1850, at a period subsequent to the census act which was passed in May; the provisions of which were carried into effect by Congress at that time. There is a proviso, as follows:

"Provided, however, That hereafter the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, or other pay officers of the United States, shall in no case allow and pay to one individual the salaries of two different offices on account of having performed the duties thereof at the same time; but this prohibition shall not extend to the superintendents of the Executive buildings."

Here is a positive prohibition—a prohibition founded upon the simplest justice that can be imagined. We hire this gentleman as a Superintending Clerk. We are entitled to all his time and services. We are entitled to all that the Government has a right to exact when a man devotes his whole time to it for compensation; and it is preposterous to say that a man whose whole time is engaged for the benefit and service of the country can have time to fulfill the duties of another office with such onerous duties that it is entitled to greater pay than the one in which he is employed. It is injustice to the Government to adopt that principle. The law which I have read is founded in the strongest common sense, and was adopted because of the abuses which have grown up from allowances in such cases.

I have no desire to detain the Senate with these matters. But it is said that this gentleman has never claimed the pay growing out of the two offices. Sir, the Secretary of the Interior does not understand it so. He founds the right of this gentleman to the $3,000 upon his filing the two stations. The accounting officers have never understood it so. They have always understood that if he claimed $3,000, he was to get it by claiming it through the two offices, and in no other way. I believe he has never had the assurance to pretend that there were any duties for him to perform as Secretary of the Census Board, which would authorize the payment to him of $3,000 annually for that service. I should like some of my friends here, who know perhaps more about the subject than I do in regard to these duties, to point out the specific duties which this gentleman had to perform, if he had any, as Secretary of the Census Board. I should be very glad to see a specification of those duties. I should be very glad to see the foundation upon which this claim rests. It would give some satisfaction, at least, to my mind.

I will send to the Chair some papers relating to this subject which have been placed in my hands: First, a letter from Mr. Williamson, who is the disbursing officer of the Department of the Interior. The Senate will learn from that, what kind of claim this gentleman has set up; and whether or not he considers that he is entitled to pay for the two offices. I ask that the letter may be read.

The Secretary accordingly read the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
DISBURSING OFFICE, July 30, 1852.

SIR: I have received your letter of yesterday, and in answer to your first question, have the honor to state that I am the pay agent of the Department of the Interior, and was appointed the 29th of April, 1850. I am also "special disbursing agent of the Census fund" by appointment, dated May 24th, 1850.

Secondly, J. C. G. Kennedy, Esq., came into my office on Monday last, and asked me if I was ready to settle his account. I answered I was, and said "which of them?"—as I have two unsettled accounts with him, one for salary growing out of my refusal to pay him $3,000 per annum, and the other for his European trip. He then told me he wanted to settle his account as Secretary of the Census Board. I hesitated for a moment, and he then said that Congress had given him the $3,000 salary as Secretary of the Census Board, as I would see by the last section of the apportionment bill. He handed me the bill, and remarked that he would leave the $2,500 salary, the one that I had always recognized and been directed to pay as legally his, for future or after consideration; and he continued, "I do not know that I would ever have demanded it if they had settled the higher one with me at first; but I shall now pursue my own course." To this I answered that he would have much less difficulty now in getting the $2,500 than he had in getting the larger sum. The conversation did not last more than ten minutes, and he left the room. Mr. Robert Wright and Mr. G. A. D. Clarke, both employed on the Census, were present.

I now beg leave to remark that Mr. Kennedy evidently gave me to understand that he considered both salaries were his by law, if he chose to demand them; and I thought it singularly strange that an office should be created or provided without any duties or business attached to it, either real or imaginary, and at the same time that there should be left in full force his regular appointment of Superintending Clerk of the Census as a separate and distinct office, thereby leaving it discretionary with him [Mr. K.] to draw the salary for it or not, as he should think proper.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,
K. H. WILLIAMSON,
Disbursing Agent.

Hon. ELISHA WHITTLESEY,
First Comptroller of the Treasury.

I agree with the remarks contained in the above letter ending with the sentence "Robert Wright and G. A. D. Clarke," except that I think Mr. Williamson asked Mr. Kennedy "whether he [Mr. K.] demanded both salaries" alluding to the salary as Clerk of the Census Board and Superintending Clerk.

G. A. D. CLARKE.

I agree with the remarks contained in the above letter ending with the sentence "Robert Wright and G. A. D. Clarke."
ROBERT WRIGHT.

Mr. DAVIS. That letter needs no comment. It was written in reply to one from the Comptroller, and settles the question as to demanding pay for both offices. Mr. Kennedy reserves for consideration whether he will hereafter claim the $5,500 or not. I have here a letter which has been addressed to me voluntarily by Mr. Whittlesey on the same subject, and which will fully explain his course. I ask that it may be read.

The Secretary accordingly read the letter, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, July 23, 1852.

DEAR SIR: Jos. C. G. Kennedy, Esq., Superintending Clerk of the Seventh Census, having stated in writing, that "I am annoying him" in the matter of his compensation, I have deemed it to be my duty to act as a public officer, in regard to his compensation. You can use the information as you think proper. Mr. Kennedy was appointed Secretary of the Census Board, created by the act of March 3, 1849.

That act having discharged its functions when the act of May 23, 1850, went into operation, he was appointed Superintending Clerk of the Seventh Census, and took his oath of office on the 27th of May, 1850.

The act of March 3, 1849, did not fix the compensation of Secretary of the Census Board, but left it to Congress to do it, after the duties of the Board should be discharged. Accordingly the salary of said Secretary was established at the rate of $3,000 per annum by the act of May 23d, 1850. The same act fixed the salary of Superintending Clerk at $2,500 per annum.

A question arose as to the compensation Mr. Kennedy was to receive from the 27th of May, to the 1st of June. It having been submitted to me, I decided he was entitled to his salary as Secretary until the 1st of June.

A copy of that decision I send to you.

From the 1st of June to the 30th of September, both days inclusive, he was paid as Superintending Clerk of the Seventh Census, at the rate of $2,500, established by the act of May 23d, 1850. This appears by the second and third item of the statement of the Register, dated the 6th of February, 1852.

On the 26th of December, 1850, the Hon. A. H. H. Stuart, Secretary of the Interior, gave a peremptory order to the disbursing agent of the Seventh Census, to pay Mr. Kennedy for his services as Superintendent of the Seventh Census and the Secretary of the Census Board, a salary at the rate of $3,000 per annum, commencing on the 1st day of June, 1850.

The pay agent paid Mr. Kennedy accordingly, to the 31st of December, 1851. This appears from the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth items of the statement of the Register.

On settling the accounts of the pay agent, I disallowed the amount overpaid from the 1st of June, 1850, to the 31st of December, 1851, under the order of the honorable Secretary. It amounts to $791 20. This appears from the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth items of the Register's statement. My reasons for disallowing this overpayment are set forth in my second decision, a copy of which I also sent to you.

I have understood the pay agent withheld further payments to Mr. Kennedy until he was remunerated the amount thus disallowed.

Last Monday, Mr. Williamson, the pay agent, came to my office, and informed me Mr. Kennedy requested or demanded his pay under a late act that Congress had passed, and he handed to me Senate bill No. 251, certified by Mr. Dickens, Secretary. Mr. Williamson said Mr. Kennedy's demand or request was for whatever was due at the rate of $3,000 per annum; that he asked Mr. Kennedy if he claimed both salaries, and the reply was, that question would be taken into consideration; that he should not have claimed it if he had not been treated so; but now he should do as he thought proper.

I asked Mr. Williamson if he knew the bill had passed, and became a law? He said he knew nothing more about it than what Mr. Kennedy told him, and appeared from the bill. By my advice he went to the State Department, and returned with the information that the act had not been lodged there.

I went immediately to the President, and on being informed the act had not been presented to him for approval, I remarked I was glad of it; for I thought a fraud had been practiced on Congress, in amending the twentieth section of the act of May 23d, 1850, and I stated to him the conversation between Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Williamson, as it had been related to me. I informed him, also, that if Mr. Kennedy was entitled to a salary as Secretary of the Census Board of $3,000, he was entitled to an annual compensation of $5,500, as there was no doubt he, as Superintending Clerk of the census, was entitled to his salary of $2,500 a year, and the Attorney General had decided "the same person could legally hold two offices, and receive the salary of each."

I went immediately to the House of Representatives, and saw Mr. McLanahan, and to the Senate, and saw Mr.

Butler, and explained the effect that might be produced by the late act.

On returning from the office, the night of the same day, I met Mr. Kennedy, and he complained of having been misrepresented to the President, and wished to know what Mr. Williamson said? I repeated it to him, and also what I stated to the President. He understood it had been represented to the President, that he had demanded both salaries; and that he denied; but he did not deny he had the conversation with Mr. Williamson, as Mr. Williamson related it to me. I reminded him he knew the decision of the Attorney General, and that he could, under that decision, claim the compensation of both offices, if he was entitled to the salary of Secretary. He did not deny either of these propositions; but he repeated he had asked for only the salary of the highest office, which he thought he ought to have. I told him I thought the amendment of the act in the manner proposed was intended as a fraud.

Mr. Butler having been called from the Senate, and wishing to return to it, I mentioned, after a brief conversation, I would make a statement to him in writing if he desired it; and having been requested to do so, I addressed Mr. Butler a letter, and sent a copy of it to Mr. McLanahan.

If it shall be the pleasure of Congress to fix Mr. Kennedy's salary at any sum higher than it now is, no one will feel less regret than myself; but I will not, as an officer, see an effort to take money from the Treasury unlawfully without hearing testimony against it.

Most sincerely and respectfully yours,

ELISHA WHITTLESEY.

Hon. JOHN DAVIS, U. S. Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I should not have meddled with this matter at all, if it had not been that, in my deliberate judgment, something like unfairness has been practiced upon Congress through the agency of the committee of which I am the representative to the public. Mr. Whittlesey, as he said in his letter, did meet me, and he presented the subject to me. He asked me my construction of the bill which had been passed. I told him I was not here at the time it was passed, and that, therefore, I was not responsible for the report of the committee upon it. But, according to my construction of it, it was clearly a recognition of the existence of the office of Secretary of the Census Board; and that, under the terms of that bill, Mr. Kennedy would be entitled to two salaries. I have since read the act carefully, and there can be but one opinion upon that subject. I am sorry to say, that the clause introduced into the "apportionment act," as it is commonly called, was intended, as I fear, to cover this approach to the Legislature for two salaries.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly; there can be no doubt about it.

Mr. BUTLER. I must answer my honorable friend from Georgia frankly, as he has appealed to me. If a communication was sent from Mr. Stuart—from such a respectable source—and addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to insert in that bill a salary of $3,000 for the Superintending Clerk of the Census, I think it extremely probable that I would have acquiesced in that. But was the proposition sent to the Judiciary Committee to give this gentleman $3,000 for either one office or the other? Not at all. Here is the clause that was inserted in that bill, which was prepared at the Department of the Interior, and, I presume, by Mr. Kennedy himself. It is a clause no way connected with the general object of the bill, and is in these words:

"And be it further enacted, That the 20th section of the said act be amended by striking out the words 'has been,' in the last line, and inserting the words 'may necessarily be.'"

Now, according to the twentieth section of the act referred to—the Census act of 1850—the Secretary of the Census Board was to receive a compensation at the rate of $3,000 per annum, "during the period he has been" in the employ of the Census Board.

Under the terms of the bill which we have passed this year, he is to be compensated for constructive services, by the revival of a dead office, for services that he may perform in that office, thus recognized and revived. There is but one construction that can be given to it; and when Mr. Whittlesey wrote this letter to me, I did feel for my friends, that a fraud had been practiced. I am sorry that I have to make this remark; but there stands the act. It does not increase the salary of Mr. Kennedy definitely to $3,000, but it revives the old office of Secretary of the Census Board; and when Mr. Kennedy went and asked for double pay, he knew, as a lawyer, that he could get it under the warrant of this law. It was the revival of an office, giving him a salary of $3,000 a year for constructive services, for he did not perform them. All the services necessarily incident to the office had been performed, and the office was defunct.

I say this much, because I should dislike to give Mr. Whittlesey cause to complain of a want of vigilance on the part of the Judiciary Committee. I suppose that when the draft of the bill came from the Secretary of the Interior, the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. Downs,] who represented the committee at the time, had no doubt but that it was perfectly right. It is apparent now, however, that it was not right. I repeat, that upon the construction of the clause which I have read, Mr. Kennedy can claim two salaries, and there can be but one view on that point; for if he can receive $500 as Secretary of the Census Board, he can receive the full amount of $5,500. I have to say that when I am called upon to perform a duty of this kind, and I see what, in my opinion, is an unfairness which has been practiced, I must speak candidly on the subject. Mr. Kennedy knew just as well as I do now, that when he accepted the office of Superintending Clerk of the Census, he was to receive but $2,500 per annum. His acquiescence in that understanding was for seven months. I believe that for that length of time he received and claimed only that compensation. I should not have spoken with so much temper on this subject, except that there might be left a reflection on one of the committees of this body that it had not exercised sufficient vigilance in regard to this matter. I have no doubt that if I had been here at the time, as chairman of the committee, I should have acquiesced as the other members did, believing that it was all right, but it would not have made me the less resentful when I had the thing disclosed to me.

The Secretary of the Interior wrote a letter, directed to myself as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, suggesting that the salary of Mr. Kennedy should be fixed at $3,000 a year. If that had been the proposition contained in the bill, it would have been perfectly satisfactory to me, and I should probably have been willing to insert it; but I never would have consented to insert the clause which was inserted, knowing the interpretation which Mr. Kennedy was going to give it, which in fact he would have given, and could have given to it, and which he did give to it. When anything touches the maladministration of the money Department of this Government, it is certainly more than an individual who is involved in it. The Department itself is involved in it; a committee of this House is involved in it; and an abuse of this kind ought not to be allowed to pass without open denunciation. I was perfectly willing that this joint resolution should have passed in its present shape. I shall vote against a reconsideration. If this gentleman thinks he deserves a higher salary, let him come here and petition Congress to pass an act increasing his salary. Perhaps I should vote for such an act—it is very probable that I would; but I do not wish to allow the supplementary act which has been passed to go into operation with the provision which is in it reviving a dead office, if I can prevent it; and the joint resolution which is now under consideration is designed to prevent it. It is not worth while to discuss the fact whether the clause inserted was asked for by the Secretary of the Interior in a letter directed to me; but a clause was inserted which will authorize payment, for constructive services in an office which had terminated, of money to which the individual was not entitled.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. President, this case has assumed a very strange aspect. The word "fraud" was for the first time suggested in the letter said to be voluntarily addressed to the Senator from Massachusetts by Mr. Whittlesey. It was there, for the first time, suggested that a fraud had been committed upon the Government. Then comes my friend from South Carolina, who has taken a very strange course upon this subject, and paid but a poor compliment to the Committee on the Judiciary, when he says that Mr. Kennedy has made them the instrument in his hands of perpetrating a fraud. He admits that the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior would have been proper and entirely satisfactory to him, and that he would have been willing to appropriate $3,000 per annum for Mr. Kennedy. Did Mr. Kennedy make the amendment to the law of 1850? Did it not come from the Committee on the Judiciary? Was it not presented by that committee to this branch of Congress and regularly passed into a law? And yet it is here insinuated that Mr. Kennedy, through that instrumentality, has practiced a fraud upon the Government. My friend certainly ought to have measured the extent of the insinuation which his words make against the character of an individual.

But, sir, why is this strange and wonderful excitement gotten up here about $800 as salary for the services of an individual? The monetary affairs of this Government are brought up, and all the Departments of the Government are to be involved upon this mighty question of a difference of $500 a year salary for an office. I cannot comprehend why it is. How is all this feeling brought about? Through our friend, the First Comptroller of the Treasury. It is not the first difficulty he has presented to the Senate of the United States. It is not the first time he has overruled the decision of the Presiding Officers of this body, and brought himself into conflict with them. Was that act to which I allude, and which he refused to allow, a "fraud"? It was so stated, and this body was made to bear it, and the decision of a late Vice President of the United States and his successor were disregarded; and yet now, because the same Comptroller uses the word "fraud" in regard to the character of an individual who is as exempt from fraud as any man, he is to receive that imputation here, and it is to go to the country sanctioned by the high name of the Senator who has just spoken. It is unjust to this individual—it is unkind and ungenerous to a man who has not done an act inconsistent with strict honor. Let gentlemen look into this matter. Let my friend from Massachusetts look into it; and I must say that I have never heard him speak with more excitement. I was surprised at it, knowing that he usually keeps his head very cool.

In order to protect the honor of this body, let us go back to the beginning of this matter at once, and see where it originated. In what proposition did it originate? Let us look to it as men, and not seek to embarrass the country and make the world believe that any one here is seeking to perpetrate a fraud upon the Government. The first question I would propound to gentlemen is this: Was the act authorizing the creation of the Census Board repealed? Was it annulled? Answer that, each and every one of you. It was not.

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer the Senator. So far as concerns the Secretary of the Census Board, it is the plain interpretation of the act that the duties of that office were closed and completed.

Mr. DAWSON. Exactly; that is the impression of my friend from Massachusetts. But who was to judge in this case? The Senator from Massachusetts, the Secretary of the Interior, or the Board of Census? There is the question. I ask gentlemen to look at that question, and confine themselves to it; and not seek to wound and destroy a man who has not offended any one here, or any law of the land. The law under which the Census Board was organized was not repealed; and here are Daniel Webster and John J. Crittenden saying that they were members of the Board of Census in September, 1851, and that Mr. Kennedy was then Secretary of their Board. Have Senators forgotten that this very Board of Census, through their Secretary, made a report to the Senate of the United States, accompanying the President's message, at the opening of this session of Congress? And yet gentlemen state to the country that the functions of the Census Board were at an end; when here are the signatures of Daniel Webster and John J. Crittenden that they were members of the Board of Census, and that this gentleman was their Secretary. If there was any fault, where, then, does it rest? It rests in the legislation of Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask the Senator whether he contends that the law of 1849, under which the Census Board was organized, is a perpetual law; and that this secretaryship is a perpetual secretaryship?

Mr. DAWSON. I answer, No; it is not; but the Board of Census are the individuals who are entitled to terminate it; and I have got their decision to that effect; and can your opinion go against theirs on a question of this kind, involving the character of an individual who has not a right to speak on this floor? Certainly not; and if he can be shielded and protected by the great names of Webster and Crittenden, what need he care for the opinion of those who seek to stab his character?

I have no feeling on this subject. I have no private or social relations with this individual; but I go for the protection of every man from an unkind stab when he has no power to defend or explain himself.

How did this question originate? Let us deny it, if we dare. Senators upon this floor, have you not passed two laws, one giving a salary to the Secretary of the Board of Census, and one giving a salary to the Superintendent of the Census? Do not those laws now exist? Has it ever been repealed by your power, or by your declaration? Never. Then, if the Secretary of the Interior had the right to appoint a Superintendent, what law is there, or what part of the Constitution is there, which prevents the concentration of both offices in the same individual? None. The Secretary of the Census Board then became the Superintendent of the Census—both salaries existing. Then why should gentlemen cast an imputation upon this man, who has these two appointments combined in himself—for an imputation is sought to be cast upon this man who has these two appointments combined in himself.

It is said that he has claimed the salaries of both offices, and therefore that a fraud has been practiced on the Government. There is not, I assert, to be found any substantial proof of the charge even in the "voluntary" contribution of testimony furnished to my friend from Massachusetts, or in the statement of Mr. Williamson. I will show you, on the contrary, that this Superintendent claimed it from the beginning, and made his selection, as every other man would have done, according to the settled practice of the Government, taking the higher salary. How am I to prove this? I can prove it by testimony which will wipe away the dust and clear up the clouds which rest upon this transaction, and show it to have been as honorable and as honest a transaction as could possibly have been. When did this matter commence? I will show you when it originated. Where did the difficulty originate? It originated with the Comptroller of the Treasury, Mr. Whittlesey. I have before me a letter of Mr. Stuart, giving his statement of the whole transaction, and I desire the Senate to understand it. It is addressed to Mr. Kennedy. Mr. Stuart says:

"WASHINGTON, July 29, 1852.

"SIR: I have received your letter of this morning in which you refer to the proceedings of the Senate yesterday, and request me to furnish you a statement of such facts as I am acquainted with, connected with your claim for your official salary. In reply, I have to state that, when I took charge of this Department, in September, 1850, I found you receiving a salary of $3,000."

It must be remarked here, that the law to take the census was passed in May, 1850; and when Mr. Stuart came into the secretaryship of the Interior, in September, 1850, he states that he found this individual receiving a salary of $3,000 a year.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me to correct him? I can show from the documents before me, that he did not receive anything more than at the rate of $2,500 a year, until after the 26th December, 1850; so that he could not have been in the receipt of a salary of $3,000 in September, 1850.

Mr. DAWSON. Such is the statement of the Secretary of the Interior. I do not know anything of the facts myself, but I give the statement of the Secretary. But he proceeds:

"This you continued to receive, as I believe, without objection, for some months. I then learned that objections were raised to your receiving more than $2,500, on the ground that your functions as Secretary of the Census Board had ceased, and that from that time you were to be regarded merely as 'Superintending Clerk.' The disbursing agent having made a decision to this effect, the subject was brought before me officially, and on an examination of the law, I was of the opinion that you were justly entitled to $3,000 so long as the Census Board required your services; and that when your functions as Secretary of that Board ceased, you would draw your salary as Superintending clerk, at the rate of $2,500 per annum."

Here is the point of the whole question:

"In pursuance of this opinion, I addressed a note to the disbursing agent, instructing him to allow you, in your double capacity of Secretary of the Census Board and Superintending Clerk, a salary of $3,000. A copy of that note is herewith enclosed, 'No 1.'"

Mr. Stuart saw the condition in which the Congress of the United States had left this question. Here was a man authorized to draw two salaries, and he allows him to draw the higher for both services; thereby excluding the possibility of his, or anybody representing him, hereafter claiming the unpaid salary. What could have been done more justly, legally, properly, and officially? Nothing.

Mr. Stuart proceeds:

"Thus the matter stood until about January, 1851, when objections were renewed by the First Comptroller."

This is the same Mr. Whittlesey who has said that he will stand watchful and sleepless at the door of the Treasury, and suffer no fraud to be consummated, whether through the Judiciary Committee or by the passage of a law through Congress. He is a sleepless sentinel over the rights of the country, independent of all bodies.

The Secretary proceeds:

"I was of the opinion that the whole matter resolved itself into an issue of fact, viz: when did the functions of the Census Board cease?"

There is the question, as I stated it when I first rose to address the Senate this morning.

Mr. Stuart proceeds:

"I thought it was not competent either for the Comptroller or myself to decide that question; and thereby undertake summarily to dissolve a Board established by law, and composed of gentlemen quite as intelligent and upright as ourselves."

I would ask the Senate, who gave the Secretary of the Interior the power to decide the question whether the functions of the Census Board had ceased or not? Who gave the First Comptroller of the Treasury this power? In conformity with this view of the subject, what did Mr. Stuart do? He says:

"I addressed an official letter to the Census Board, under date of 30th September last, (a copy of which I inclose, marked 2;) in which, after reciting the facts, I requested them to inform me whether their functions as a Board had ceased; and if so, at what time? To this letter I received a reply, signed by Mr. Crittenden and Mr. Webster, (Judge Hall being at the time absent, I believe,) a copy of which is also inclosed, marked No. 3."

That letter is in these words:

WASHINGTON, September 30, 1851.

We have received your letter of to-day, and have the honor to reply, that we do not consider the Census Board (of which we are members) as dissolved, or Mr. J. C. G. Kennedy, the Secretary of that Board, as discharged from office. The duties for which that Board was constituted and the Secretary appointed, have not been finally completed. We regard the Board as still continuing, and the Secretary as still in office, and as entitled as such to the salary of $3,000 per annum, and at that rate.

We are, very respectfully, yours, &c.,

J. CRITTENDEN.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Hon. A. H. H. STUART, Secretary of the Interior.

P. S. When the Board by its own official act shall be dissolved, we will not fail to make it known to you.

J. J. C.

D. W.

Here are the persons who announced that he is entitled to that salary; and they are responsible for it, and not the Secretary of the Interior. Yet the insinuation is secretly and covertly attempted to be made that Mr. Kennedy practiced a fraud. Now, sir, is it not unkind that the country should be so impressed, and that a man in his position, incapacitated, from his relations to this body, to give a single explanation, should be driven before the whole country to explain the honesty of his position. It is easy to make insinuations, but it is dreadfully troublesome to check them when they get afloat.

Now, I submit whether this argument today has not thrown an imputation before the people, that there has been fraud practiced on the Senate by this individual? I submit, honestly, fairly, and candidly, whether these imputations are sustained? Where is the ground upon which to base the insinuations? That is the reason why I feel some disposition, if I possibly can, to place the facts before the country. But I will go further. I have read the decision that the Board is in existence, and was in existence on the 30th of September, 1851, and its members claim this individual as their Secretary, and say that he is entitled to pay as such. Yet gentlemen here say that he is not so entitled.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish the gentleman to understand me. I wish to put my propositions in a shape that they may not be misunderstood. That may have been their decision, but I may have a very different opinion as to whether the Board is dissolved or not. I speak of the law as it is. I did not intend to do Mr. Kennedy any injustice. Perhaps the gentleman, while he is speaking, had better explain, if he can, in regard to the letter which was addressed to me by the Secretary of the Interior. That letter was to put this individual on the footing of $3,000 a year salary.

Mr. DAWSON. I will read the letter, if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish the gentleman would read it, because I do not wish to do Mr. Kennedy any injustice.

Mr. DAWSON. I know that. The letter is in these words:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, March 8, 1852.

SIR: As some difficulty has occurred in regard to the salary of Mr. Kennedy, who has acted in the double capacity of Census Superintendent and Secretary of the Census Board, I would respectfully suggest the introduction of a clause into the supplementary bill which you propose to report, fixing his salary at $3,000.

I think he richly merits it, and I can see no reason why he should stand on a different footing from the other heads of bureaus. Very respectfully, &c.,

A. H. H. STUART.

Hon. A. P. BUTLER,

Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, U. S. Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to put my proposition in distinct language, for I wish it to go out exactly as I make it. The letter which the Senator has read was written to me by the Secretary of the Interior. Its object was to put this individual on the footing of the heads of other bureaus, and a draft of a bill was sent to the committee. The fact must come out as it is. That bill was sent to the committee from the Department of the Interior, and it contained the clause which gives to Mr. Kennedy $5,500 per annum, by any construction which can possibly be put upon it, because it recognizes the then existence of the old Census Board, and authorizes him to receive the salary of Secretary of that Board. I say that if $3,000 alone had been claimed, there would have been no fraud; nor do I say now that there would have been any fraud if Mr. Kennedy, in introducing this clause, meant to receive no more than that sum. I will give him the full benefit of that; but I do say, that if this clause were introduced covertly, to give him $5,500 a year—and it does bear that construction—if he did it with that purpose, and actually claims $5,500 under it, then I cannot qualify or retract my statement.

Mr. DAWSON. Exactly; that is the very point which I intended to get out of the Senator. In the first place, both salaries were contained in the census act of 1850, in the same law, but in different sections. That would have controlled the matter, and there could have been but one salary paid; and under the act of 1850, the Secretary of the Interior proposed to pay the Superintendent of the Census $3,000. Now, I beg to read from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, in order to call to the attention of the Senator from South Carolina the real facts of the case. The Secretary says:

"After receiving this letter [alluding to the letter of Messrs. Webster and Crittenden] I directed the disbursing agent to continue to pay you at the rate of $3,000."

Then it was that Mr. Stuart wrote the order to the pay agent, directing him to pay that amount of money, based upon the decision of the Secretary of State and the Attorney General:

"This, I believe, was done until about the close of the year 1851. Shortly thereafter you called upon me and stated that the difficulties had been renewed in regard to your salary; and after expressing your regret at the feeling displayed toward you by some of the officers, you stated that, to remove all scruples, you had a thought of asking an amendment of the law, which would make the matter entirely plain."

After the unpleasant difficulty which had occurred between the head of the Bureau and the disbursing agent of that Bureau, he says that he desired to have the matter closed by procuring an amendment that would place the matter beyond controversy, providing that he should receive $3,000 a year. He came to Congress to apply for it; and does any man presume that he practiced a fraud, or that he could practice a fraud, on the Judiciary Committee of the Senate?

Mr. BUTLER. Perhaps he practiced upon our ignorance?

Mr. DAWSON. He never dreamed of such a thing. The Secretary proceeds:

"I expressed my approbation of that course, and with your concurrence, if not at your request, I addressed an official note, under date of the 8th of February, 1852, to Hon. A. P. Butler, chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, referring to the difficulties which existed, and requesting of him the introduction of an amendment into the supplementary bill, then before the committee, fixing your salary at $3,000."

This letter was with the committee. The committee had the power of action. They looked to the law, which, it was thought, prohibited the taking of $3,000, and amended that sentence of it; yet it is announced that this was done by Mr. Kennedy! Why, the committee had the matter before them. They regulated it to carry out the intention of this letter, and there was never the most indistinct apprehension that fraud, or the suggestion of fraud, entered into the transaction. But is that all? The Secretary of the Interior adds:

"I deem it proper to add that, in all my interviews with you, you uniformly disclaimed all right to the two salaries, and contented merely that you were entitled to the larger of the two, viz: $3,000."

Now, what is due to private character?—what is due to the facts of this case? Establish the proposition that there has been no fraud attempted—no imposition anywhere; and that this individual has contended for nothing more than what the laws of the land allowed him, and to which he is entitled. Every act of his has been above-board, fairly, and honestly submitted; and every proceeding which he took was directed by the highest minds of our Government—Daniel Webster, John J. Crittenden, and the Secretary of the Interior. What does it amount to, after all? He received, according to the opinion of these gentlemen, $3,000; whereas, Mr. Whittlesey believes that he was entitled to $2,500. When Mr. Whittlesey demands of him the $500 which he says were overpaid, how does he do it? He retains it out of what he says is Mr. Kennedy's proper salary—$2,500—until he refunds to the Treasury the amount allowed to this officer by the opinion of Daniel Webster, John J. Crittenden, and the Secretary of the Interior; and then, in the letter which has been read, the Comptroller says that he came to the Senate and to the House of Representatives to prevent the consummation of a fraud.

All this difficulty is raised as to the pitiful sum of $500! Why, it astonishes me that a question of this magnitude should have led to such a furious debate, and given rise to such tremendous feeling. I therefore say, in the language of the Senator from Tennessee, that the simple question that we have to do with is this: There are two salaries. Is it the desire of the Senate to confine this individual to $2,500 from the first of June, 1850? If so, let us say so. If we are willing to allow him $3,000, to which the opinions of the various heads of Departments say he is entitled, and to which he supposes himself to be entitled, why not say it in this resolution, and make the salary $3,000?

There is another suggestion which I wish to make in this connection. Every other head of a Bureau, even heads of Bureaus which are of less importance, and which do not require so much intelligence, receive a salary of $3,000 per annum. Why, then, should this distinction be made? Why should not this individual receive the same salary? I regret sincerely that any such discussion should have arisen. It was the most distant thing from my mind that any such discussion would have arisen to-day, or that I should have participated in it. I would not have done so, but from a disposition to see that this individual should be fairly dealt with before the Senate and before the country.

Mr. BUTLER. The letter which Mr. Whittlesey wrote to me would never have seen the light but for remarks which have been made here. I should have made no disclosures in reference to this gentleman, because I might have done him injustice. I have been delicate where the character of a man comes in any manner under my control. I have never, recklessly at least, said anything about it. But if it were Mr. Kennedy's deliberate purpose to claim the two salaries, as Mr. Whittlesey and Mr. Williamson seemed to think it was, then it was evident that he intended to do it under this clause; and I suppose the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Dawson] will not deny that this clause was prepared by him and the Secretary of the Interior. Thus I qualified my remarks, and I wished to be understood thus far as saying, that if it was Mr. Kennedy's intention to claim but one, I would say, I would not impute to him an intention to defraud the Government. But I will leave that to the impression which may be made by the letters themselves. The letter of Mr. Whittlesey certainly made the impression on my mind which I have stated. I am sure that under the clause he could do it. There is no doubt about it. I will say to my honorable friend from Georgia, that, notwithstanding the display of the great names of Messrs.

Crittenden and Webster, I never choose to be very much awed, nor to rely very much on the authority of great names; but I choose rather to be governed by my own convictions. I will ask my friend from Georgia whether, if these great names should say that the office of the Census Board was still in existence, he would agree to it?

Mr. DAWSON. I have not looked into the question.

Mr. BUTLER. He certainly would be obliged to do so if he takes them as authority in this case.

Mr. DAWSON. I have not looked into the matter; but I have too much respect for the high and honored names I mentioned, not to be influenced by them.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish only to relieve myself from the shadow into which I am thrown by this contrast with the great names which the honorable Senator from Georgia has mentioned here, and to say that this is a question which stands on the truth of the proposition. The Census Board is as much in existence now, according to their opinion, as it was at that time. But I must say, however rash the assertion may seem, that I will stand opposed whenever so plain a proposition has to be judged of by a common intellect.

Perhaps I should say, in this connection, that I will not leave Mr. Kennedy under any imputation coming from me rashly; and can only say, that it comes in consequence of an act which would not have passed upon the recommendation of the Committee on the Judiciary, if my attention had been given to it. It is not, however, wholly my fault. It is an act which ought not to have passed in its present shape; an act different from what Mr. Stuart understood, and different from what the committee understood. It is true, we did not exercise due deliberation in connection with this clause, and we must take our share of the blame. I am willing to take my share. But I agree that, if the clause had been merely to give Mr. Kennedy a salary of $3,000, I would not have objected; but, as it now stands, he may claim both salaries.

Mr. DAWSON. It was the intention of Mr. Kennedy to have it put on the ground that he might receive $3,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Then let him have the benefit of the disclaimer.

Mr. WALKER. This is rather an interesting question, although it relates to what many Senators may regard as a small matter. As I regard it, however, it appears to me that there has been a most extraordinary course pursued by some members of this Administration, which I cannot characterize by any word so expressive as one which is used by the boys in the West—that of "wiggling"—wiggling to give a high salary to an officer of the Government. There appears to have been a good deal of wiggling done in these Departments—the first of which to which I shall refer, is contained in a letter of the Secretary of the Interior to Mr. Kennedy, on the 29th of July, 1852. I will read a part of it:

"Mr. J. C. G. KENNEDY:

"Sir: I have received your letter of this morning, in which you refer to the proceedings of the Senate yesterday, and request me to furnish you a statement of such facts as I am acquainted with connected with your claim for your official salary. In reply, I have to state, that when I took charge of this Department, in September, 1850, I found you receiving a salary of $3,000."

Just at this point let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Davis,] at what time does the communication which he introduced show that Mr. Kennedy was receiving a salary of $2,500?

Mr. DAVIS. I find the order—and the accounts agree with the order—of the Secretary of the Interior, authorizing the payment of $3,000 on account of the services of the offices, dated December 26, 1850. That is the order of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WALKER. I have not a copy of the letter before me; but if I remember right, the first letter states that Mr. Kennedy did not claim a higher salary than $2,500 for a long period.

Mr. DAVIS. For upwards of seven months.

Mr. WALKER. But Mr. Stuart says that when he came into the Department, he found Mr. Kennedy receiving a salary of $3,000 a year. It appears, therefore, that Mr. Kennedy did not claim this salary of $3,000 until seven months afterwards.

Mr. DAWSON. That fact is not made to appear. The Senator is making a statement as if to contradict the Secretary of the Interior. If the Senator has the fact before him, let us have it. Has the Senator the fact? I believe it is well known that whenever Mr. Kennedy has received any money as payment of his salary at a less rate than $3,000 per annum, it has been received under protest.

Mr. WALKER. As I wish to be perfectly certain in regard to the matter, I desire that that part of the communication of the First Comptroller, showing that Mr. Kennedy acquiesced in receiving $2,500 for his services, may be read.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know that I can readily find it. It is a long paper; but I know that to be the fact—that is, that it is so stated.

Mr. WALKER. Then, while I do not mean to charge the Secretary of the Interior with falsehood, I do say that the statement of Mr. Stuart is false in fact; that he did not come into the Department finding Mr. Kennedy receiving a salary of $3,000 a year.

Mr. DAWSON. When the Senator makes such a charge, I think it certainly becomes him to do so either upon his own knowledge, or upon such a statement of facts as cannot be disputed. It is making a charge against an individual upon false representations, which is calculated to wound and, perhaps, to injure him, while it will not benefit the Senator.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the Senator for his lecture, and I will endeavor to conform to his admonition.

Mr. DAWSON. The remark was not intended as an admonition at all, but merely that a gentleman outside these walls, who has no opportunity of defending himself here, should not be treated with injustice.

Mr. WALKER. I will repeat what I said. I observed that I would be guided by the Senator's admonition. I stated that the Senator from Massachusetts—

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I will read to him the information which he asked for a short time ago. The Comptroller says:

"My decision was, that his office as Secretary of the Census Board continued to the 31st of May, because the 1st of June was the day fixed by law for commencing to take the census, and the preparatory measures contemplated and provided for by the act of March 3, 1849, were completed, so far as that act was concerned."

"This was in accordance with the views of Mr. Clayton, and of Mr. Ewing, and of Mr. Kennedy himself, for he obtained pay by my decision to the 31st of May, 1850, which was the extent of his claim, and all he thought he was entitled to under the law. Near seven months elapsed before it flashed upon his mind that he was Secretary of the Census Board, and entitled to the salary of $3,000 per annum."

Mr. WALKER. Then I repeat what I said before, that if that statement of the Comptroller is true, the statement of the Secretary of the Interior, upon whom I do not mean to charge intentional falsehood, is false in point of fact; for he did not come into office and find the Secretary of the Census Board in receipt of a salary of $3,000 per annum; therefore that is one point disposed of—one on which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Dawson] based part of his argument. But there is another point. There seems to be great doubt among these wiggling gentlemen whether this office was in existence. The Comptroller thought that it was not; Mr. Stuart thought it was; Mr. Kennedy thought it was. Mr. Stuart directed that Mr. Kennedy's salary as Secretary of the Census Board should be paid at the rate of $3,000 per annum—this was on the 26th of December, 1850. Mr. Whittlesey resists, not being quite certain whether the office is in existence. In the meantime a letter is addressed to Mr. Webster and to Mr. Crittenden making inquiries respecting the existence of the Census Board.

Now, the first thing that strikes the mind of any person is, that if an office of that kind was in existence, and if its important duties were discharged by anybody, there should be a moment's doubt about the fact. Is it not a strange thing that none of the officers of the Government seemed to know whether this office of the Secretary of the Census Board, to which was attached a salary of $3,000 and extra, existed or not? Then the wiggling commenced! A letter was addressed to Messrs. Daniel Webster and J. J. Crittenden, on the 30th September, 1851—a kind of search-warrant was issued in order to ascertain whether this office existed, and, if possible, to find it; and on the same date Messrs. Webster and Crittenden replied in the following words:

WASHINGTON, September 30, 1851.

We have received your letter of to-day, and have the honor to reply, that we do not consider the Census Board (of which we are members) as dissolved, or Mr. J. C. G. Kennedy, the Secretary of that Board, as discharged from office. The duties for which that Board was constituted, and the Secretary appointed, have not been finally completed. We regard the Board as still continuing, and the Secretary as still in office, and as entitled as such to the salary of $3,000 per annum, and at that rate.

We are very respectfully, yours, &c.,

J. CRITTENDEN.
DANIEL WEBSTER.

Hon. A. H. H. STUART, Secretary of the Interior.

What was the object of creating the Board? An act was passed on the 3d of March, 1849, making an appropriation of $10,000 for the purpose of making preliminary arrangements for taking the census, and very strictly defining the duties to be performed by the Board. It enacts—

"That the Secretary of State, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General, shall constitute and be a Board, to be styled the Census Board; that it shall be the duty of the said Board to prepare and cause to be printed such forms and schedules as may be necessary for the full enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States; and also proper forms and schedules for collecting in statistical tables, under proper heads, such information as to mines, agriculture, commerce, manufactures, education, and other topics as will exhibit a full view of the pursuits, industry, education, and resources of the country—it being provided, that the number of said inquiries, exclusive of the enumeration, shall not exceed one hundred; and that the expense incurred in preparing and printing said forms and schedules shall not exceed $10,000."

Just bear this in mind. This act was passed on the 3d of March, 1849, and makes provision for taking the census; a subsequent act provides that the census shall be taken on the 1st of June, 1850; and yet this letter, dated 30th of September, 1851, shows that the office was then in existence, which is equivalent to a declaration that the Board was yet engaged in preparing and causing to be printed such forms and schedules as may be necessary for the full enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States; and also proper forms and schedules for collecting in statistical tables, under proper heads, such information as to mines, agriculture, commerce, manufactures, education, and other topics, as will exhibit a full view of the pursuits, industry, education, and resources of the country. This disposes of the great names which the Senator from Georgia has spoken of. Is it not astounding that we should find the great names of Webster and Crittenden appended to a letter on the 30th of September, 1851, stating that they were discharging duties which should have been performed on the 1st of June, 1850?

Mr. SEWARD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him, if it has escaped his recollection, that during the interval, a law was passed continuing that Census Board?

Mr. WALKER. No, sir. But all these search-warrants for finding the Census Board show that there could have been no duties for such an office to perform. The only duties prescribed were those which were named under the act of March 3d, 1849, and which must necessarily expire at the time the census was taken. Now, it seems astonishing that, at the end of a year and three months after the census was to have been taken, Messrs. Crittenden and Webster should answer that the Census Board was still in existence, and that Mr. Kennedy had not been discharged from the office of Secretary of that Board. I say, it is most extraordinary; but in that instance it may have been through inadvertence that they answered as they did. They did not advert to the law, it is evident; for they certainly could not have given the answer which they did if they had done so. Not considering or not knowing that the act was abolished, they took it for granted that the Board was still in existence, and that Mr. Kennedy was still in office. They could not have said, after examining the law, under such circumstances, that the Board was in existence. They must have signed the certificate most carelessly, as it seems to me. Under the twentieth section of this act, Mr. Kennedy received, as Secretary of the Census Board, down to the 30th of June, 1850, his salary at the rate of $3,000 per annum. At that time the duties of the office ceased. At that time he was transferred to a clerkship, the salary of which was $2,500 per annum. He received that salary for seven months after the duties of the Board had ceased, and made no complaint. Then, it appears, as he could bring so much authority to back him, he thought it would be better to make the claim for the increased salary of $3,000. If he could get Mr. Crittenden, and the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of State to assist him by their opinion in his favor, it would be a good ground for making the claim. And I do not attach so much blame to him either. I attach more blame to Messrs. Stuart, and Webster, and Crittenden, than to him. But there has been a great degree of carelessness, and a lack of inspection of the laws, as to what were prescribed duties, which is most unaccountable.

It is impossible that the Census Board could have continued down to the 30th of September, 1850. Why? Because the marshals were required to make their returns by the first of October, 1850. Where, in God's name, is the authority for such a statement as is contained in the letters of the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of State, that the office was still in existence, and that they were still discharging duties assigned to the Census Board? How is it to be accounted for that such a statement is made, except on the supposition of the most extraordinary carelessness and inattention, especially considering that, on the very day after the certificate was given that the Board was still in existence, the marshals were to make their returns to the Secretary of the Interior, who was then to enter on the business of classifying the matter returned?

Sir, we have been led astray in this matter; and yet I cannot say that this has been so much the result of the conduct of Mr. Kennedy as of other gentlemen. The Secretary of the Interior was mistaken; and his letter is untrue in point of fact, in which he said he found Mr. Kennedy receiving $3,000 per annum. The Census Board are in error, too, when they assert that that Board was in existence on the 30th of September, 1851; and the whole of them are mistaken in this matter, except Mr. Whittlesey and another gentleman, the disbursing clerk in the office. They, looking to the law, saw that the Census Board had ceased to exist; they saw that there could be no longer a Secretary of that Board; and they refused to pay a salary for a Secretary to a Board which had no existence. They have discharged their duty faithfully; and notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Georgia, I say that if ever there was a faithful servant of the public, it is this man, Elisha Whittlesey; and I will say here, that if there be a Democratic triumph next fall, of which I have no earthly doubt, one act of mine shall be to beg of the incumbent of the presidential chair, for the sake of honesty and justice, to retain that gentleman in office. I believe he is one of the most faithful of public servants, although in some matters his acts have been counter to my opinions. I will, however, award him the praise which I think he is justly entitled to receive. It seems to me to be cruel, that that man should have to bear one word of censure from the Senator from Georgia, or from any other quarter. I do not believe that, whatever may be the character of the next Administration, whether Whig, or Free-Soil, or Democratic, it would be right to turn a man out of office who has discharged his duty so faithfully as this gentleman has done.

Mr. DAWSON. As to the continuation of the Board, I beg to read an opinion. Here is a gentleman speaking in regard to the passage of this law:

"One word further. I act on the principle that, if it is going to trouble three Heads of Departments much, it must be exceedingly troublesome to one, unless we reverse the old maxim, and say that one head is better than three. The duties devolving upon the Board, under the act by which it was constituted, are nearly completed, it is true; but it is for Congress to determine to what extent they shall continue to act. Now, I propose to set the question at rest, by declaring that the Board shall continue to have the control of the matter until the work is completed."

I will refer to another letter which will put this matter in a light still clearer. It is dated from the Republic Office in August, 1850, and is addressed to Daniel Webster and N. K. Hall, members of the Census Board, and informs them, that their communication had been received, and that, in compliance with their request, they had ordered the printing of more blanks. This letter was signed by Gideon & Co., and was dated in August, 1850, after the act for taking the Census had passed. I find, also, in the Blue-Book, the sum of $43,479 39, which that Board paid to this firm. That, however, is not before us now. The only object I had in referring to this, was to show that in their opinion this Board was still in existence.

Mr. DAVIS. I have but a word or two to add. In the first place, after the remarks which have fallen from the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Dawson,] it is proper that I should disclaim the motives which he imputes, if he imputes any of them to me. I have ascribed motives to no man. I have given no character to the transaction. I have aimed at nothing more than to place the Senate in possession of the facts as they exist, and to draw attention to the legal provisions. Beyond that I did not go.

I stated, in my remarks, that by the act of 1850, the supervision of the printing of the preliminary matter which remained, was intrusted to the Census Board. I need not go into the details of that matter; but you will recollect, Mr. President, and others will very well remember, that the reason why that was done was, that it was represented to the Senate, at the time the bill was passed, that the printing was in a state of great forwardness, and nearly completed, and, therefore, that it was proper to leave it in their hands; but, mark! they were limited to printing "the preliminary matter," and nothing else. Now, I say it was the clear intention of that act, that if no duty remained to be performed after that act went into force, the Superintendent Clerk was to assume the charge; but will any Senator undertake to say that any duties remained to be performed after the 30th June, 1850, which would warrant the proceeding that it is now attempted to justify the payment of $500 per annum—a payment made after the returns of the Census Board were made, and the enumeration and collection of the other facts completed? The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Walker] has placed this matter in the clearest light. These certificates were evidently intended, on their face, and no other construction can be put on them, to show that the Census Board continued during the continuance of this office; and every one must see that the duties ceased long and long ago, and that nothing remained to be done after the 30th June, but the payment of some few bills. That is all I wish to say. I should be glad to have the question taken at once.

Mr. BRIGHT. If I had done my duty this morning, I should have insisted on taking up the Indian appropriation bill, which was the order of the day, at one o'clock; but hoping that this debate would terminate, I omitted to do so, until it was too late. I will now move to lay the subject on the table, for the purpose of going into Executive session.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator will not do that. Nobody wishes to speak any further.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will withdraw the motion if nobody wishes to speak, and the question can be taken.

Mr. BELL. I wish to say a word.

Mr. BRIGHT. I cannot withdraw my motion then.

Mr. BELL. I hope the Senator will allow me an opportunity to say one word.

Mr. BRIGHT. I should be glad to accommodate the Senator from Tennessee, but I am satisfied that the consequence will be that it will lead to still further debate. But I will not resist.

Mr. BELL. I think I may say with perfect truth, that I am guiltless of all this discussion with reference to the communications to and from the different Departments of this Government, and with regard to the question whether a fraud has been attempted to be practiced or not. I simply urged a few words in favor of the reconsideration of the joint resolution, limiting my remarks to the ground that this gentleman was entitled to $3,000. If the resolution remains as it is, he will receive only $2,500 per annum. That was the sole question before us; but other gentlemen, having different views, have thought proper to involve the Senate in a discussion of two hours on subjects which do not touch the merits of the case, which should be whether he shall receive $3,000 or $2,500 per annum.

One word more. I have said so much to show that I have done nothing towards getting up this storm of opinions from the different Departments giving advice to Mr. Kennedy, as it is said; that I do not mean to make any remarks upon that, except to say that I do not think there is sufficient evidence that any Department has made any statement which, under a fair view of the case, ought to be denounced as setting forth that which is false or should be so stigmatized. Nor do I think that it has been shown that Mr. Kennedy could have meditated a fraud in the manner stated by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I have endeavored to qualify that statement.

Mr. BELL. I know that the Senator disclaims it, except that the intention was to get two salaries.

Now, one word as to the alteration of the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, which has received the approval of the President. The latter clause of that bill has been amended by striking out the words "has been," in the concluding line, and by inserting the words "may necessarily be," so that it will read: "Out of which"—referring to the sum specified in the same section—"the said Secretary of the Interior may allow to the person employed as Secretary of the Census Board, a compensation after the rate of $3,000 per annum during the period he may necessarily be in their employment."

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is strongly impressed with the idea that an attempt was made to impose some gross fraud on the Committee on the Judiciary, or on Congress, or on the public. He acquits the gentleman of all attempt at fraud, if it should appear that he did not design to get more than one salary; but that Senator thinks that this gentleman would be entitled to receive two salaries.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly he would under the operation of the last act. It was a recognition of his right to get two salaries.

Mr. BELL. I will ask that Senator if he did not, in his last remark, express his strong conviction that there was no pretext, or ground, on which to predicate the opinion that the Census Board was in existence? And let me appeal to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Dawson] to state whether, after hearing the discussion, he would say that the opinions of the Attorney General and the Secretary of State were correct in regard to its existence? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] has remarked, with vehemence and clearness, that there was not the slightest ground to suppose that that act is in force, or that the Board is not functus officio, as a Board having any legal existence, or the right to pay a salary to a secretary. The Senator from Massachusetts has repeatedly called on gentlemen to show one single act that has been performed since the 1st of June, 1850. It is as clear to the mind of that gentleman, and of the Senator from South Carolina, that there is no such Board, as the light of heaven. I speak thus strongly, because it is impossible to express the convictions of these gentlemen too strongly.

In my remarks which I first addressed to the Senate, I stated that, according to my convictions, the first act appointing a Census Board was superseded by the second act. This sentiment has been clearly entertained and expressed by two of the most distinguished lawyers of this body—gentlemen who are not only distinguished as lawyers, but who are distinguished as statesmen—statesmen of long standing and experience, and of ripe judgment; and that sentiment being generally acquiesced in all round the Hall—the Senator from Georgia not undertaking to state but that their opinion was right on this point—where is the fraud that Mr. Kennedy could have committed or attempted to practice, by using the words suggested—namely, that "so long as he may necessarily be in their employ" he shall receive a salary of $3,000 per year? If he was not entitled to receive this amount according to their construction of the two acts together, then that act, as soon as it had passed, would have failed of its effect of perpetrating a fraud, even if Mr. Kennedy had intended it; because, according to their construction, he could not get a salary of $3,000, inasmuch as he was not, according to their argument, "necessarily" employed one moment.

Now, suppose it should turn out to be a fact, that the Board did not consider themselves discharged from all responsibility, that there were yet some acts to be done, and that Mr. Kennedy was called upon to record these acts, it would be "necessary" that he should be employed for the purpose, and he would receive a compensation at the rate of $3,000 per annum and no more. If it was done in a day, then his compensation would cease; and if it was done in three, four, or five months, his compensation would cease accordingly. So that giving the fullest latitude and the fairest construction to this whole amendment, and striking out the words "has been," and inserting the words "may necessarily be," no fraud could have been imposed on the Government or the officers of the Board, unless their duties did necessarily require them to employ a secretary until the 1st of July, 1850; so that, take it any way you please, if Mr. Kennedy meant to get two salaries by such a proposition, it seems to me, by every interpretation that you can give these words, he would be defeated by the very terms he had employed; because he was not, according to their statement, necessarily employed at all—at least not according to any suggestion which I have heard. He was only employed for the disbursement of the remaining funds in the hands of the Census Commissioners which they had not disbursed.

Now, sir, I have not another word to say, except that I have had no communication with Mr. Kennedy upon this subject, nor did I suppose that all the points which have been noticed here were connected with that resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. As I am appealed to, to allow the question to be taken, so that we may have an Executive session, I shall make no reply to the Senator. I will merely say that he has made an ingenious speech, but it has not convinced me.

The question was taken, and the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was then read a third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. BRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 4, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the further consideration of House bill No. 146, to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks and marshals of the circuit and district courts of the United States.

Mr. JENKINS. I rise to a question of order. On yesterday a resolution, authorizing the publication of certain maps to accompany the report of Captain Cram, was laid upon the table. I then moved to reconsider that vote, but subsequently withdrew it. I now renew the motion to reconsider that vote, and move that the motion to reconsider do lie upon the table.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. Before that vote is taken I move that there be a call of the House, and upon that I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 42, nays 86.

So a call of the House was refused.

The question recurring on laying the motion to reconsider upon the table,

Mr. STANTON called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CARTTER demanded tellers upon the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The House was then counted, and the tellers reported—yeas 21, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question again recurring upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table,

Mr. STANTON demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CARTTER and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—yeas 62, noes 52; no quorum voting.

[Cries of "Recount!" "Recount!"]

Mr. CARTTER called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been refused by the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let us have a recount.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of a motion to adjourn, or of a motion for a call of the House, the Chair will order a recount. The same gentlemen will act as tellers, and gentlemen will see the necessity of voting upon one side or the other.

The tellers resumed their places, and the question being taken, the tellers reported—yeas 70, noes 59.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

FEES OF CLERKS, MARSHALS, ETC.

Mr. OLDS. In pursuance of an understanding with the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. McLANAHAN,] I move to postpone the further consideration of the report, made yesterday by the chairman of that committee, in relation to the fees of clerks and marshals of the circuit and district courts of the United States, until after the Wheeling Bridge case shall have received consideration in the morning hour, and have been disposed of.

Mr. CARTTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether that motion, in that form, is in order. It is in order to postpone to a day certain; but whether it be in order to postpone until after another matter of business is disposed of, the Chair doubts.

Mr. CARTTER. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. That is the regular order of business.

Mr. BOWIE. I move to postpone its consideration until Wednesday next.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hope not.

It is an important bill, and should be disposed of.

Mr. McLANAHAN. Is the motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. McLANAHAN. It is an important bill, and ought to be passed without delay. I hope it will not be postponed to so remote a day.

The question being upon the motion of Mr. BOWIE—

Mr. CARTTER called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. CARTTER called for tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. ROBBINS and FOWLER were appointed.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—yeas 49, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

MEMORIAL OF THE CLERKS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is requested to ask the consent of the House to introduce a memorial from the clerks of the Treasury Department.

There being no objection, the Speaker presented a memorial from the accountants, clerks, messengers, &c., of the Treasury Department, praying an increase of twenty per cent. upon their respective salaries, to enable them to meet the increased expenses of living in Washington, growing out of the great influx of California gold into the United States.

Mr. GENTRY. I move that the petition be laid upon the table, and be ordered to be printed. I do not intend to press that motion to a vote. My object is to put the question in a shape that will authorize me to say a word or two in favor of the object which those petitioners pray for. My own experience, being a housekeeper in the city of Washington, enables me to state that the facts set forth in that memorial are true. I presume there is not a man in the city of Washington, who is keeping house, who will not bear testimony of the truth of the statement upon which they predicate their prayer for some increase of compensation. The price of all the articles necessary to support a family, bought in the market, has advanced twenty per cent. or more within the last two years; and I do not see how a clerk, with a family, receiving $1,000 a year, can live here at all. If they received a fair compensation of $1,200 or $1,500 a year, an increase of twenty per cent. would certainly be just and proper enough. I simply make these remarks, hoping that the thoughts of members will be directed to the subject, and that my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. HOUSTON,] and my honorable colleague, [Mr. JONES,] a member of that committee, will give their attention to this proposition for the relief of those meritorious men. I now withdraw my motion to print.

Mr. BRIGGS. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The question was put and the motion agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to propound an inquiry to the Chair. Some days ago the Wheeling Bridge case was under consideration as the report of a committee. It was at that time postponed until this day.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 5, 1852.

NEW SERIES...No. 130.

Mr. CARTTER. I call the gentleman to order. Mr. CLARK. I rise to a question of order. I wish to ask whether that case could not now assume the same position it occupied on that day?

The SPEAKER. Under the special order making it the duty of the Speaker and the House to receive reports, and to execute all the other business of the morning hour, the Wheeling Bridge case was reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and would be regularly first in order, but for the additional order made on Monday, by a vote of two thirds of this body, that the particular bill now under consideration be reported and take precedence. The two special orders are here in conflict. The Chair thinks that the last order ought to be considered the first. He does not know of any other rule to govern him. The bill reported on yesterday from the Committee on the Judiciary is first in order, and takes precedence of the Wheeling Bridge case.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I call then for the regular order of business.

Mr. STUART. I wish to make an inquiry in reference to this point of order. Do I understand the Chair to decide that because the House suspended the rules to allow this committee to make a report, it made that report a special order? There was nothing in the resolution which made it a special order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the House, by a two-thirds vote, ordered that that bill should be reported yesterday morning. The Chair decides further, that the authority to report carries with it the right to consider, and therefore gives the report precedence over the other business before the House.

Mr. STUART. I wish to make this point: The Speaker decided upon the railroad reports, that although they came from the same committee, the report first made was first in order, and that notwithstanding it was postponed to a particular day, when that day arrived it took priority according to the time of the report.

The SPEAKER. That has been the decision and practice under it.

Mr. STUART. I submit that this case, as it now stands, falls entirely within that principle. The House did not make a special order by authorizing this committee to report within the morning hour, and the bill comes in as if they had reported in the regular order of their call. When we reach a case which has been previously reported in the regular order, it takes priority in time. This is not a special order.

The SPEAKER. Well, what is it?

Mr. STUART. If the Chair will allow me, it is precisely as if the Judiciary Committee had reported this bill upon a regular call of the committee, and the House had gone on to consider it, and while considering it, a bill, which had been previously reported to the House—

Mr. McLANAHAN. I call the gentleman from Michigan to order.

The SPEAKER. Unless an appeal be taken from the decision of the Chair, further discussion is out of order.

The Chair will again state the case, and remind the House of the condition of things. Some months ago the House passed a special order that the morning hour should be devoted to the call of committees for reports, and to that alone. On last Monday, after a suspension of the rules by a two-thirds vote, it was ordered by the House that the Committee on the Judiciary should report this particular bill. The order having been given thus to report it, the Chair thinks it carries with it the right to consider; and that you cannot separate the right to report and the right to consider when it is reported. There is difficulty about the matter, the Chair admits, but that is his opinion with regard to the point of order.

Mr. STUART. From that decision I feel bound to take an appeal. I wish to state, in a few words, the views I take of this question.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. STUART. You can do that when I get through. If you happen to obtain the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan must be reminded of the fact, that this being a question of priority of business it is not debatable; nor is the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair debatable.

Mr. MILLSON. Is it in order to make an inquiry, as a matter of fact, of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be happy to hear the gentleman.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to ask whether this Committee on the Judiciary were ordered to make the report, or whether they were merely permitted to make it?

The SPEAKER. The committee were not ordered to make the report in terms, but it was especially authorized by a two-thirds vote of the House to report. Thus was precedence given over other committees to report; and if the right to report carries with it the right to have the report considered—as it is the opinion of the Chair it does—precedence was given over the reports under consideration at the time the rules were suspended.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order. Is there any question before the House?

The SPEAKER. An appeal has been taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CARTTER. I then call for the question upon the appeal. I believe it is not debatable.

Mr. STUART. I have a right to state the point I make.

Mr. CARTTER. The gentleman has been stating it for half an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman would have the right if he had not already done so, and he has based his appeal upon it.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman says that he has the right, after he takes an appeal, to state his point. I maintain he must state his point before he takes his appeal.

The SPEAKER. He did so, and obtained the decision of the Chair upon his statement.

Mr. STUART. I have the right to have the Chair state, before the House votes upon this question, what is the ground of the appeal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated it, but he will repeat his statement with pleasure.

Mr. STUART. With all deference to the Chair, I think he has not apprehended me. I wish the Chair to state the precise point I made. I believe I have that right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the gentleman cannot, if it be objected to, make a statement. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the appeal is not debatable.

Mr. STUART. I ask that the Chair shall state the ground upon which I have taken an appeal.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask that the 113th rule may be read.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I wish to make a single inquiry of the Chair. Suppose the House had suspended the rules upon the application of half a dozen committees, to allow them to make reports, which report would be first considered?

The SPEAKER. The one first made.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Then why does the Chair reverse that decision in this case?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the force of that point.

The Chair again states that the House made a peculiar special order some two months ago to the effect that the morning hour should be employed in calling committees for reports and to the exclusion of all other business. That was one special order. On last Monday a motion was made to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing a resolution, which was done by a vote of two thirds. The resolution was then adopted, authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to report this particular bill yesterday morning. The resolution was specific, that the committee should report on yesterday morning. The Chair has decided simply that between these two special orders he is inclined to the opinion that the right to report this particular bill from the Judiciary Committee carries with it the right to consider it before other reports from other committees. That is all.

Mr. STUART. That is not the point I made to the Chair at all.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman has been unfortunate in stating, or I have been unfortunate in understanding his point.

Mr. STUART. The point I made to the Chair is this: The report from the Judiciary Committee is not a special order, and the House only gave leave to that committee to report at a particular time.

The question was then put on the motion to lay the appeal upon the table, and upon a division there were—ayes 83, noes 44.

Mr. STUART demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. ROBBINS and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 84, noes 36.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] to recommit House bill No. 146, regulating the fees and costs to be allowed to the clerks and marshals of the circuit and district courts of the United States.

Mr. McLANAHAN. If it is the pleasure of the House, I move that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. BOWIE. I object. I wish to move an amendment to the bill.

The reading of the bill was then continued and concluded.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. This bill having been read, it is apparent to the House that it is full of details. I ask the Speaker, whether it is in order to make a motion to commit it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] is upon the floor. It would be in order but for the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the Chair whether the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CARTTER. What then will be the condition of the bill?

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending to recommit.

[Mr. WILDRICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined, and found truly enrolled, the act making appropriation for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853, and for other purposes, and the joint resolution of the House, No. 24, providing for the distribution of the laws of Congress and the debates thereon. They were then severally signed by the Speaker.]

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. HOUSTON; and it was decided in the affirmative.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 196, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on yesterday the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART,] to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] both in regard to the publication of the laws and public advertisements in the newspapers, was under consideration. It had been discussed, and the vote was about to be taken upon it when the committee rose. The question is, then, upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART.]

The question was then taken upon Mr. SMART's amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question then recurring upon Mr. MEADE's amendment, it was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The following section was then read:

"For proof-reading, packing, and distributing laws and documents, including cases, labor, and transportation, $10,000."

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment, which comes in at the end of this section:

For the purchase of such works as are immediately required for the library of the Department of State, $2,000; for the remodeling of the library of the Department of State, arranging and classifying the collection, binding the pamphlets which are contained therein, and preparing a catalogue of the same, $1,000.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BOWIE. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the clause appropriating, under the head of State Department, $1,000 for miscellaneous items, viz:

Whereas the Congress of the United States, on the 23d of December, 1799, "Resolved unanimously, That a marble monument be erected by the United States, in the capital, at the city of Washington, and that the family of General Washington be requested to permit his body to be deposited under it, and that the monument be so designed as to commemorate the great events of his military and political life;" which resolution remaining to be executed, to redeem the faith of the United States thus pledged, and commemorate the inestimable services and illustrious virtues of Washington, $100,000 is hereby directed to be paid out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury to the Washington National Monument Society, to aid in the erection of the monument now being built by that Society on the public grounds in the city of Washington.

Mr. HOUSTON. It appears to me that the amendment is not in order to this bill. I have no doubt in the world that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Bowie] could get such a resolution passed in either House at any time, if he would allow it to be examined.

Mr. BOWIE. It proposes simply to appropriate $100,000 to redeem the faith of the United States, pledged in the year 1799, to erect a monument to Washington, commemorative of the events of his life and character.

Mr. HOUSTON. I submit the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is constrained, under the rules, to decide that, in his opinion, the amendment is not in order.

Mr. BOWIE. A joint resolution in regard to this matter was adopted by Congress as far back as 1799, and this appropriation is merely to carry out in good faith that act of Congress. The amendment is clearly within the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised of any existing law authorizing the expenditure proposed by the gentleman.

Mr. BOWIE. It is embodied in the joint resolution of the two Houses. I refer to the action and legislation of Congress to satisfy the Chair of that fact. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, most reluctantly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Bowie] has submitted an amendment which has just been reported to the committee. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] makes a question of order. The Chair decides that the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Bowie] is not in order under the 181st rule, which reads, "that no appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills or be in order thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law." The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Bowie] appeals from this decision of the Chair, and the question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. BOWIE. Will the Chair permit me to state my reasons for the appeal? The rule is, that no amendment or no appropriation shall be moved as an amendment to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, except in conformity with some previous law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will also announce as another reason, that the amendment proposed is not germane to the bill, in the opinion of the Chair. For both reasons, now stated, the Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. BOWIE. I beg indulgence of the Chair merely to reply to the first reason assigned. There is a joint resolution of Congress making it obligatory and requiring that this work shall be done, but it has never been executed. I wish to carry out that law.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is not in order. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, demanded tellers; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and FOWLER acting as tellers, and there were—ayes 80, noes 39.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The following clause of the bill was read, viz:

"Northeast Executive Building.—For compensation of the superintendent and four watchmen of the northeast executive building, $2,250."

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, moved to amend the above clause by adding thereto the following:

And that the two watchmen employed on the two wings of the Capitol shall have the same police powers which are imposed by law upon the regular police of the Capitol, and receive a salary of $730 per annum, being the sum they now receive, and continued no longer than the completion of the building.

Mr. S. said: It will be seen, by that amendment, sir, that the object of it is not to increase the salary of these men. It is not to take one single dollar out of the Treasury more than will be taken out of it anyhow. The simple purpose of the amendment is to clothe these men with police powers to enable them to aid the regular police of the Capitol in suppressing riots, preventing depredations from being committed upon the work, and protecting the materials.

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means yesterday, when I presented a similar amendment, and made the same explanation, held up to me a little book, which, he said, contained estimates from the Secretary of the Treasury, and, inasmuch as he could not find any estimate made for this appointment, he therefore could not go for it. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] his colleague upon that committee, opposed the amendment without understanding what the object of it was, and led, perhaps, the House to believe that the design was to increase the salaries of these men, to fasten them upon the Treasury at a higher rate of pay than they had before. I explained to him that such was not the object of the amendment, nor is it the object of the amendment. It is simply for the purpose I intimated. I do not know how it is, or why it is, that we should sit here merely for the purpose of doing what the Committee of Ways and Means think proper to dictate to us. There are other committees in this House. This amendment comes from my committee, which is the Committee on Public Buildings. We have investigated it. It has been recommended by the proper officers of the Government, and officers whom the law requires should make recommendations to our committee, and we report them to the House. But we are told, sir, when such a proposition is made from our committee, that it has not been before the Committee of Ways and Means, and that the estimates are not presented in the Secretary of the Treasury's report, and that, therefore, the House should not vote for it. I make these remarks to show that I, for one, am not disposed to sit quietly in my seat here, and do whatever the Committee of Ways and Means may think proper to dictate to me and to the House.

They may say now that this is not provided for by law, and therefore it cannot, under the decision of the Chair, come under the rule. Well now, sir, it is provided for by law. The President has been given power by this House, and the other branch of Congress, to carry on this improvement of the Capitol. He has full power to do it. He has power to appoint an architect, to appoint a superintendent, and to appoint all other officers that are necessary to carry out the objects of the law. These men were said yesterday not to have been appointed according to law. Now, are they not appointed according to law? You have given the President power to do it. You have given him money to do it. You have given him all the requisites to carry out these objects, and this is one of them. The law does provide for it, and I hope the House will adopt the amendment, and let these men have the authority which is necessary to enable them to discharge their duty.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Kentucky has made a very extraordinary speech in support of his amendment. In the first place, sir, I attempted no such thing as to mislead the House yesterday with regard to his amendment. I merely stated the number of policemen here, and the compensation they received; and, sir, if the gentleman has a committee, and is not disposed to sit silent and permit others to get their bills in, let him report the bills which ought to come from his committee, and ask the House to consider and pass them. Again, sir, the gentleman says that you have invested the present President with power to appoint an architect and all these officers, and that it is in accordance with law. I do not controvert that; but if it is as he says, why the necessity of reenacting that law? Why not let it stand, as I said yesterday—which I believe is the better policy—under the superintendence and supervision of the President and the architect of these two wings, until the building shall be completed; and then, if it is right to have the permanent police of the Capitol increased, it will be time enough to do it. Why is this amendment brought in here at this time? If all this power is vested in the President and the architect, and they have the power to appoint a police, and they have exercised that power legitimately—which I do not pretend to controvert—there is, according to the gentleman's own showing, no necessity for any legislation upon this subject at this time.

Again, I say, that it is wrong for this House, or Congress, to recognize by the amendment a permanent police about this building under an appointment by the architect. If they have to be increased, do it, sir, according to law, and as it should be done. If this temporary police are wanted, as I understand it from the gentleman himself—by the architect—for the purpose of watching and protecting the building, and the tools which the workmen may leave there, then I say this is all legitimate and proper under the law vesting the President with the power of appointing an architect; and there is no necessity, I again say, for its coming into this bill at this time.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I propose to amend the amendment by striking out $30, and inserting $50, so as to make the salaries $750 per annum.

Mr. S. said: The question upon this amendment lies in a nut-shell. It is whether the police officers appointed by the architect for the purposes which are admitted even by my colleague to be useful and proper, shall be clothed with police powers. I presume there is nobody here who will differ as to the importance of that point; and nobody will refuse to give them that power. Then there is another question involved in that amendment—whether the salaries of these men shall be paid out of the appropriation for the Capitol, or paid out of the common Treasury? It is a matter of no consequence whether it comes out of that appropriation, or whether it comes out of the Treasury by appropriation in this bill. I presume there can be no question about that. The important point is as to police powers.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to explain? I will say that the amendment does not propose to pay these police officers out of the Treasury, but to pay them out of the funds from which they have already received their money.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Then I was mistaken on that point. There is another point upon which I desire to say a word, and I address myself particularly to my friends upon this side of the House.

Now, when they will point out any particular item that is extravagant in the expenditures of this Administration, that is wrong, improper in itself, and illegal, I shall be as ready to condemn it as any man upon this floor, and to hold the Administration responsible for these illegal or extravagant expenditures, or for any conduct of the Administration that may make such expenditure unnecessary. But when my friends upon this side of the House go into the approaching presidential canvass upon the principle that the expenditures of this Administration amount to such an enormous sum—

Mr. HOUSTON. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to his amendment.

Mr. STANTON. I propose to increase the expenditure $20, and therefore my remarks are in order.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman's remarks are not in order upon his amendment.

Mr. STANTON. I say that the expenditure of the next Administration will be greater, and must be greater—

Mr. HOUSTON. I again call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman from Tennessee is not in order.

Mr. STANTON. Why, I propose to increase the expenditure $20, and I am discussing the question of expenditure.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It certainly is in order. The gentleman wishes to increase the expenditure of the Government, and then charges it to the Administration. Certainly that is in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANTON. So great is the demand for money for the exercise of the powers of this Government that during the next Administration the expenditure will and must be increased.

Mr. HOUSTON. I again call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is not in order.

Mr. STANTON. Then I submit to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is a little extraordinary—

Mr. STANTON. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am in order. I am speaking against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama rises to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and to be in order his remarks must be confined to that amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will say that it is a little extraordinary that the gentleman from Tennessee should attempt to introduce into debate here, which we are all endeavoring to confine to the legitimate subject-matter before the Chair, that which is irrelevant.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair again states that the gentleman from Alabama must confine his remarks in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the Chair will enforce the rule upon every member. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] said that I held up a little book yesterday. I presume it is a book he has never read. It contains the estimates laid before Congress at the commencement of this session, and I presume the gentleman is not acquainted with it. It contains estimates for all appropriations that were submitted to the committee of which I am a member, and upon this particular point we have reported all that was asked for. I do not know what estimates the gentleman may have in his pockets. I am not required to go to him for estimates. The estimates are sent to us from the proper departments of the Government, and we act upon them. That is what we have done now.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Did you report all the estimates recommended by the Secretary of the Interior for the public grounds and public buildings?

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Kentucky asks if we reported all the estimates sent to us. Clearly we did not. We cut down the estimates from all the departments and bureaus in many instances, but in this case we gave what was asked from us.

Mr. FICKLIN. I desire to call the attention of the honorable chairman to this point, that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky continues those persons in office—not annually—but until the Capitol is completed.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; that is another point. The amendment, as I understand it, fastens A and B—the men now in office—upon the Government until this Capitol is finished.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Not at all. Mr. HOUSTON. But then I ask the chairman and the committee this question—for while there may be nothing particular involved so far as the amendment is concerned, in regard to the amount of money, there is a principle involved in it: we are called upon to acknowledge and indorse an appointment made by the architect, as I contend, without the authority of law. Now, if there had been any law for it, I reckon the gentleman would have shown it. He takes the ground, that the President is invested with authority to conduct these buildings, and with power to appoint an architect, and that he had power to appoint everybody else who might be necessary. Why, that is certainly a singular doctrine. Has the President the power to appoint forty policemen? Why, if he has the power to appoint one without law, he has the power to appoint one hundred without the authority of law; and it is only the enormity of his conduct, according to the gentleman from Kentucky, that would strike the sense of the country or Congress, and not the principle involved. Now, I have never seen the law by which this police was appointed, and I do not believe any law exists for that purpose. I have no doubt the gentleman from Kentucky is candid and sincere in the construction he gives to the law, but I differ with him entirely. I contend that the President, under the law to which the gentleman has made reference, has no authority, nor has the architect of the building authority, to appoint policemen ad libitum, or other officers, without discretion and without the control of law, and put them upon the country, and Congress is to be called upon to indorse them without investigation.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I propose to amend my amendment, so as to increase the salaries of these policemen $10.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman cannot propose to amend his own amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that the gentleman has no right to propose to amend his own proposition. He may modify or change it before the vote is taken, but he cannot be permitted to propose an amendment to his own amendment for the purpose of discussion.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. That is not my proposition. It is a proposition from the Committee on Public Buildings, and I, in my representative character, propose to amend their order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. I now offer the following amendment, which will, in all probability, relieve all objection that gentlemen may have taken on the score of money. It is as follows:

That the two watchmen employed upon the two wings of the Capitol shall have the same police powers as are imposed by law upon the regular police of the Capitol.

Mr. FICKLIN. I submit, sir, that that amendment is not in order. It is conferring police powers upon A and B, by name, and has no connection with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If the attention of the Chair had been called to the matter at the time, he would have been constrained to rule that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] in the first instance was not in order, as not germane to the proposition upon which he proposed to base it as an amendment. As the attention of the Chair is now called to it, he is compelled to rule this amendment out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. Under the instructions of the Committee of Ways and Means, I offer the following amendments:

After the word "fifty," in line 103, strike out the words "eight thousand nine," and insert in lieu thereof the words "nine thousand one;" and after the word "dollars," in the 104th line, insert the following:

The salary of one of the clerks created by the act of the 20th of April, 1818, and who is now acting as assistant chief clerk in said office, being hereby increased to $1,600 per annum.

The clause will then read:

"For compensation of the Third Auditor, and the clerks, messengers, and assistant messengers in his office, $59,150; the salary of one of the clerks created by the act of the 20th of April, 1818, and who is now acting as assistant chief clerk in said office, being hereby increased to $1,600."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The clause proposed to be amended is as follows:

"For compensation to temporary clerks employed in the office of the Third Auditor, in making out certificates of service from the muster rolls of 1812, and the several Indian wars, $35,000: Provided, That no clerk shall receive more than at the rate of $1,000 per annum under this act, except one, whose salary shall be $1,600."

The amendment is, to add to the above clause the following:

And four others, whose pay shall be $4 per diem.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I would inquire whether those officers are provided for by law?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This amendment is to give them exactly what they are entitled to under the law in pursuance of which they were appointed.

Mr. STANTON. Do you not propose to give them additional compensation?

Mr. JONES. This amendment is to make their pay conform to what was provided by the law under which they were appointed.

The question was then taken on Mr. JONES's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

After the word "thousand" in the 124th line, strike out the word "two," and insert in lieu thereof "four," and add to the clause the following:

The salary of one of the clerks created by the act of the 20th of April, 1818, being hereby increased to $1,000 per annum.

The clause will then read:

"For compensation of the Register of the Treasury, and the clerks, messenger, and assistant messenger in his office, $30,400, the salary of one of the clerks created by the act of the 20th of April, 1818, being hereby increased to $1,000 per annum."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the same committee to offer the following amendment, to come in after the 166th line among the appropriations for the office of the Third Auditor:

For expenses of arranging the document rooms, and preserving files and papers, $1,000.

The amendment was adopted.

The following clause having been read—

"For compensation to temporary clerks employed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, $100,000: Provided, That no clerk shall receive more than at the rate of $1,000 per annum under the act"

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to strike out all after the word "provided," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That no clerk shall receive more than at the rate of three dollars and thirty-three and one third cents per diem, except two, whose compensation shall be $1,200 per annum. Provided further, That the said limitation shall extend to the appropriations for clerks contained in the act "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1852," approved July 31st, 1852.

Mr. J. said: By the law under which temporary clerks in the Pension Office were originally employed, their compensation was fixed at $3 33½ per diem, which is some $40 over $1,000 per annum. In the deficiency bill, an appropriation for deficiencies in the payment of these temporary clerks passed this House, limiting their compensation to $1,000 per annum. It went to the Senate, and the Senate struck out that provision, and inserted that their compensation should not exceed $1,200, intending thereby that it might be graded from $1,200 down. When it came back to the House, the House added a proviso that the compensation of these clerks should not exceed $1,000, except two, whose salaries should not exceed $1,200.

This proviso is to make this bill correspond with what the two Houses did in the deficiency bill, and to correct that part which limited the compensation to $1,000, instead of to $3 33½ a day. The paying clerk in that office has gone on and paid at that rate, and it is necessary to adopt this amendment in order to enable him to settle his accounts, and to make the compensation of these clerks what it was under the law originally passed.

The question was then taken on Mr. JONES's amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment: In line two hundred and eighty-one, after the word "General," strike out the word "two," and insert in lieu thereof the word "three," so as to make the clause read:

"For the compensation of the clerks and messengers in the office of the Surgeon General, $3,650."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am also instructed to offer the following: In line three hundred and seventeen, among the appropriations for the office of the Chief Engineer, strike out "$175," and insert in lieu thereof "$225," so as to make the clause read:

"For blank-books, binding, stationery, and printing, $225."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the same committee to move to insert after the words "one hundred," in the three hundred and eighteenth line, the words "and fifty," so as to read:

"For miscellaneous items, $150."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment: After the word "office," in line three hundred and fifty-four, strike out the word "eleven," and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve," so as to make the clause read:

"For compensation of the Chief of the Bureau of Navy-Yards and Docks, and of the civil engineer, draughtsman, clerks, and messengers in his office, $12,600."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SIBLEY moved to amend that portion of the bill relating to the Territory of Minnesota by inserting after the word "twenty," in the four hundred and fifty-fourth line, the word "three," and after the word "thousand," in the same line, the words "four hundred," so as to make the clause read:

"For compensation and mileage of the members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, clerks, and contingent expenses of the Assembly, $23,400."

Mr. S. said: I move to increase that item to $23,400, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Chairman, the estimate upon which the Committee of Ways and Means acted was based upon a communication from the Secretary of the Territory of Minnesota, made immediately after he entered upon the duties of his office. Subsequent examination satisfied him that he had under-estimated the sum necessary to defray the legislative and other expenses of the Territory, and he sent in to the Treasury Department a corrected estimate, amounting to the sum I now ask for. The estimate has not only received the indorsement of Mr. Whittlesey, the Comptroller, but also that of the Secretary of the Treasury, as I have before stated. The sum heretofore appropriated has been $24,000, and even that has been insufficient to meet the expenditures, and I have been necessitated to ask an additional sum of Congress, during the present session, to make up the deficiency. I do not wish the Delegate from Minnesota to be placed in a position hereafter which will render it necessary for him to urge up on this House the appropriation of money to pay arrearages. It is embarrassing and unpleasant to be obliged to press such a measure. The sum mentioned in my amendment will suffice to pay the expenses of the territorial government; less will, in my judgment, be insufficient. I can conceive of no reason why the appropriation should be diminished. I do not think the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means can bring forward any evidence to convince the committee that the sum can properly be reduced from former appropriations, or that the territorial authorities of Minnesota have expended the annual allowance otherwise than in a proper manner, and in accordance with law.

The document, recommending the increase to the sum specified in my amendment, is now in my hand, together with a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, directed to myself, which is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 6, 1852.

SIR: In reply to the joint letter of yourself and Alexander Wilkin, Esq., addressed to the First Comptroller, relative to the insufficiency of the estimates for Minnesota Territory, I have the honor to transmit a copy of a communication from this Department to Hon. Speaker BOND, dated 22d January last, concurring with the recommendation therein inclosed for the increased appropriation, in accordance with the suggestion of Secretary Wilkin.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THO. CORWIN,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. H. H. SIBLEY, House of Representatives.

I trust that the committee will agree to my motion, notwithstanding the opposition of the Committee of Ways and Means, although I confess I have not much hope of succeeding in any measure which does not receive the favorable consideration of that committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee of Ways and Means inserted $20,000 for the legislative expenses of the Territory of Minnesota, which was the amount first estimated for by the Secretary of that Territory. That is the amount estimated for Utah, New Mexico, and Oregon. Only $19,000 has been asked in some cases. All the other Territories get $20,000, or under, for the very same items of expenditure. This appropriation is based upon the estimates presented by the Secretary of Minnesota since the meeting of Congress. Here are the corrected estimates to which the gentleman has referred, and I regret to say that almost all the estimates for the Territory of Minnesota seem to be increased. The Delegate from Minnesota succeeded in getting into the deficiency bill several thousand dollars more than was estimated for, and more than the Committee of Ways and Means really thought they ought to have. Knowing that a feeling of indulgence towards the Territories generally prevails in this House, we were disposed not to scrutinize their expenditures too closely. We give them in this bill their first estimate, and we give them as much as is given to all the other Territories, except Oregon, and we give them more than we give Oregon.

Mr. SIBLEY. I would ask the gentleman from Alabama whether the Committee of Ways and Means had any evidence before them that the appropriations previously made for the government of the Territory of Minnesota have not been expended according to law? And further, if there is any evidence that the sum of $24,000, which has been heretofore appropriated, has been more than sufficient?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will answer the gentleman's questions: I do not know what he calls the codifying of the laws, the employment of extra clerks, and all that class of expenditures, which were directly in the teeth of the law of 1842. But we concluded to give that to them, in the deficiency bill, notwithstanding that it was an expenditure contrary to law. But, then, why should we give $24,000 to Minnesota, and only $19,440 to Oregon? Is there any propriety in that? Is there any reason for it?

We may not be able to say that the money has been fraudulently disposed of, and yet there is such a thing as being more extravagant than is necessary. I take it for granted, that the price of everything necessary to enable the Legislative Assembly to proceed with the administration of the government, is quite as high in Oregon as it is in Minnesota.

A VOICE. Double that amount.

Mr. HOUSTON. My friend says double the amount. I have no doubt it is. I know it is very much larger. We gave them all they asked, until the Secretary took a second examination, when he made larger estimates. I think the appropriation in the bill is large enough, and I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. SIBLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate upon the amendment is in order.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, offered the following amendment to the clause of the bill providing for the territorial expenses of the Territory of New Mexico. After line four hundred and sixty-three insert the following:

For compensation of the Acting Secretary of the Territory of New Mexico, from the 5th of April, 1851, to the 20th of June, 1851, $425.

Mr. H. said: Mr. Chairman, the Delegate from New Mexico is here, and can probably explain this matter better than I can. I will, however, say this: The papers are before the House going to show that Governor Calhoun, after having arrived in New Mexico, found it necessary, in his opinion, to appoint a Secretary of the Territory, in advance of the ratification of the nomination of Secretary Allen, whose nomination was afterwards ratified. I am aware that he had no authority to appoint a secretary—none at all; but in the deficiency bill Congress made an appropriation for paying an Indian agent, which he had appointed as much without authority by law as in this case.

He states that the appointment of this secretary was necessary, and that he could not have got along without him. It was in advance of the ratification of the appointment of Secretary Allen by the Senate. In view of the action of the House relative to the Indian agent which he appointed, the Committee of Ways and Means saw fit to recommend this amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON, under instruction of the Committee of Ways and Means, moved to amend the section providing for the salaries of the district judges, by inserting in line four hundred and seventy-six, after the word "seventy," the word "two," so that the section would read—

"For salaries of the district judges, $72,000."

Mr. H. said: The object of this amendment is to remedy an omission upon the part of the Secretary of the Treasury. He shows that in sending his estimates here, he omitted to provide for the district judge for Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The following clause of the bill was then read, viz:

"For defraying the expenses of the supreme, circuit, and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia, also for jurors and witnesses in aid of the funds arising from fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853, and previous years, and likewise for defraying the expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, and of prosecutions for offenses committed against the United States, and for the safe-keeping of prisoners, $300,000."

Mr. HOUSTON, under instructions from the Committee of Ways and Means, moved to amend the above clause, by striking out $300,000, and inserting $550,000.

Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is this: In passing upon this bill, the Committee of Ways and Means put in $300,000, in view of the action of the Committee on the Judiciary, in reporting a fee bill, because we did not know what amount would be necessary under that bill. Since that time the bill has been reported. I furnished the Secretary of the Treasury with a copy of it, and asked him to predicate estimates upon it, and furnish them to us. This he has done, and the amount of his estimates is what the Committee of Ways and Means now recommend to be inserted in this section. He estimates $550,000 as the amount which will be necessary for this fiscal year. The $300,000 which the committee put into the bill is an arbitrary sum. I will remark here, that Mr. Whittlesey informed me—and the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. McLANAHAN] has a knowledge of this subject—that the estimate now presented is a larger one, for the reason that the law is a new one, and if it should pass, he did not want to have a deficiency.

I will state furthermore, that the estimates of the Department, of the same officers, under the existing laws, is $692,000, so that there will be a saving of $142,000 if this bill should pass in its present form. The Committee of Ways and Means propose to insert what has been estimated by the Department, predicated upon that bill.

The question was then put, and the amendment agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I want to offer an amendment to the four hundred and seventy-seventh line.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have passed that portion of the bill, and it can only be returned to by unanimous consent.

Mr. MARSHALL. I send my amendment to the Chair, and ask to have it read.

It was read, as follows:

Add to the section the following, viz:

Provided, That the district judges of the United States shall receive each an annual salary of not less than $2,000; so that the whole section would read as follows, viz:

"For salaries of the district judges, $70,000: Provided, That the district judges of the United States shall receive each an annual salary of not less than $2,000."

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I object to returning to that clause of the bill.

Mr. MARSHALL. I desire to say to the gentleman who objects, that this is an amendment that the Committee on the Judiciary have instructed me to offer to this part of the bill.

Mr. JONES. I ask if the gentleman from Kentucky is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to debate the amendment, if objection is made to its reception.

Mr. MARSHALL. Then I will offer it, to come in at the end of the pending section; which relates to the judiciary establishment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to decide that it is not in order to come in at the end of the section now under consideration, because it is not germane to the subject of that section.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the Chair allow me to suggest, that the section under consideration provides for defraying the expenses of the judiciary establishment, and I cannot see why it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. A preceding section provided for defraying the salaries of the district judges.

Mr. MARSHALL. I know it would have more properly come in in the section to which the clause alludes, but it seems to me that it is sufficiently germane to the section under consideration to make it in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky, that his amendment is perhaps not in order upon another ground: that amendment reduces the salary of some of these officers while they are in office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must again remind gentlemen that this debate is not in order. The Chair has decided that the amendment is not in order. Does the gentleman appeal?

Mr. MARSHALL. If my amendment is not in order as an amendment to the section under consideration, I will offer it as an independent section, to come in immediately after the one now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, that will not change the question of order in the least. The Chair will again be compelled to rule it out of order.

Mr. MARSHALL. Have we not the right to offer an independent section connected with the subject of the judiciary?

The CHAIRMAN. A proposition which is submitted as an amendment to another proposition under consideration must be germane to that subject under consideration. Now, we have already passed that clause in the bill which appropriates money to pay the salaries of the district judges of the United States. We have passed that point, and are now providing for defraying the ordinary expenses of the courts. The Chair, therefore, thinks it is not in order to offer as an amendment to the section a proposition relating to the salaries of the judges.

Mr. MARSHALL. I beg respectfully to submit to the Chair—without intending to appeal from his decision—whether, when we are considering the judiciary establishment and the expenses for that establishment, he will decide that we have not the right to add an independent section relating to the salaries of the judicial officers? We have an appropriation of $70,000 to pay the salaries of the district judges, and I submit whether we cannot add a section providing that the minimum salary shall be $2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark that there is another objection to the amendment of the gentleman which might be urged against it. The salaries of some of the judges are more than $2,000, and we have no right to provide that the salary of a judge shall be diminished during his continuance in office.

Mr. MARSHALL. If the Chair will allow me, my amendment will not be subject to the point which the Chair raises. It does not provide for diminishing the salary of any judge. It only provides that the salary of no judge shall be less than $2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The Chair decides that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is not in order. Does the gentleman appeal?

Mr. MARSHALL. I do appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire if the committee have not prepared and reported a bill fixing the salaries of the judges at a sum above $2,000?

Mr. MARSHALL. They have not.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is not in order. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] submits an amendment to come in at the end of line five hundred and two—at the end of a section providing for the ordinary expenses of the supreme and district courts of the United States. The amendment is, "provided that the district judges of the United States shall receive each an annual salary of not less than $2,000." The Chair decides that the amendment is not in order, because it is not germane to the subject of the section to which it is offered. From this decision the gentleman from Kentucky appeals, and the question therefore is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. MARSHALL demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. LANDRY, and STANTON of Tennessee, were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 56; no quorum voting.

The roll was then called, and the following gentlemen answered to their names:

Messrs. Abernethy, Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Averett, Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Bowie, Bragg, Breckinridge, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Burrows, Busby, B. Carrington Cabell, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Chapman, Churchwell, Clark, Cleveland, Cobb, Cullom, Curtis, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Dockery, Eastman, Edmundson, Evans, Ficklin, Fitch, Floyd, Fowler, Thos. J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Gorham, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hall, Hascall, Haven, Hawes, Hebard, Hendricks, Hennen, Holladay, Horsford, Houston, Howard, John W. Howe, T. M. Howe, T. Y. How, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, Geo. W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, Meade, Milson, Miner, Meloy, John Moore, Morehead, Morrison, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Orr, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Penniman, Phelps, Riddle, Robbins, Rohie, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Stuart, Smith, Staully, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Thurston, Townshend, Venable, Walbridge, Walsh, Watkins, Wells, Alexander White, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Woodward.

The committee then rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman, (Mr. PHELPS,) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had, according to order, under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 196, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853, and having found itself without a quorum, had ordered the roll to be called, and instructed him to report the facts to the House, with the names of the absentees, which are as follows:

Messrs. Charles Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Barrere, Bartlett, Beale, Bell, Bennett, Bibbhausa, Bissell, Biscock, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Albert C. Brown, George H. Brown, Buell, Burt, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chastain, Clingman, Colcock, Conger, Cottman, Darby, George T. Davis, Dawson, Doty, Duncan, Dunham, Durkee, Edgerton, Ewing, Faulkner, Florence, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Gamble, Gentry, Gilmore, Green, Grey, Grow, Hall, Hammond, Harper, Hibbard, Hillyer, Hunter, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, Kuhns, Kurtz, Mace, Mann, Edward C. Marshall, McCorkle, McDonald, McQueen, Meacham, Miller, Henry D. Moore, Murphy, Olds, Peaslee, Penn, Perkins, Polk, Porter, Powell, Price, Rantoul, Reed, Richardson, Robinson, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Savage, Scudder, Scurry, Snow, Alexander H. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, St. Martin, Strother, Sweetser, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Toombs, Tuck, Wallace, Ward, Washburn, Welch, Addison White, Williams, and Yates.

A quorum being now present, the committee again resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon sustaining the decision of the Chair. The tellers (Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and LANDRY) will resume their places.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 56.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The following clause of the bill was then read by the Clerk:

"For supplying light-houses containing 3,272 lamps with oil, tube-glasses, wicks, buffskins, whiting, and cotton cloth, transportation and other expenses on the same, and for repairing and keeping in repair the lighting apparatus, §182,330 78."

Mr. EVANS offered the following amendment:

Add at the end of the above clause the following, viz: "And the President is hereby authorized and required to levy the same light duties and charges upon foreign vessels entering the ports and harbors of the United States, or passing the light-houses thereof, as are charged by any corporation, or by any foreign Government, to the citizens or subjects of which such vessels may belong, upon vessels of the United States. The said money, when so collected, to be carried into the Treasury, and the amount thereof to be reported annually to Congress."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit whether that amendment is in order or not?

Mr. EVANS. I propose my amendment to come in directly after the first clause of the bill, relating to light-houses, and it relates exclusively to light-house establishments.

The CHAIRMAN. The opinion of the Chair is, that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. EVANS. I propose to raise means for the support of light-houses. And if it is not in order, I am not capable of drafting an amendment that is in order. I hope the Chair will reconsider his decision. I think he will come to the conclusion that the amendment is in order. If there is any doubt about it, I should like to have the benefit of that doubt. It would save us a great deal of money, and it would not interfere with our establishments at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is still of the opinion, after an examination of the amendment, that it is not in order.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, requested that the amendment be again read; and it was read accordingly.

Mr. JONES. It is clearly out of order. The bill under consideration is for appropriating money, and the proposed amendment is for raising money.

The CHAIRMAN. Such is the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GORMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] if that is not the law now?

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" and "Hear him!" "Hear him!"]

Mr. EVANS. It is not; but I cannot explain it to any extent now.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition under consideration is to appropriate money for the purpose of keeping up our light-houses. The proposition submitted by the gentleman from Maryland proposes to levy a tax or duty upon foreign vessels which may enter our ports and pass our light-houses. The Chair decides that the amendment is not germane to the proposition now before the committee.

Mr. EVANS. If I modify the amendment so as to apply this money to the light-house system, will the Chair then decide it in order? I will make that modification, if it will obviate the objection of the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. That will not alter the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. EVANS. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has submitted the amendment which has been reported by the Clerk. The clause under consideration provides for the support and repairs of light-houses, and the gentleman's amendment provides for levying a tax or light money upon foreign vessels entering our harbors and passing our light-houses. The Chair decides that the amendment is not germane to the bill, and therefore not in order. From that decision the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] takes an appeal. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. McCORKLE demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. MASON, and FULLER of Maine, were appointed.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 64.

So the decision of the Chair was not sustained.

Mr. EVANS. I request the attention of the committee to this very important question.

The light-houses of England are under the control of a corporation known as the Trinity Board. The English Government makes no appropriation out of the National Treasury for the support of lights, but permits the corporation to farm them out to individuals, who, under its direction, collect its dues and defray the expenses.

I hold in my hand a copy of a correspondence which took place between our Minister, the Hon. Abbot Lawrence, and Viscount Palmerston upon the subject of these light-house dues. I believe this correspondence has not been yet printed by order of our Government, but it has been in England, and I have thus been enabled to procure it. I will call the attention of members to certain facts to be found in that correspondence, and also to the difference between the English and American system of maintaining lights, in order that they may perceive the unjust discrimination which is made against American commerce and American shipping.

We, as everybody knows, make appropriations out of the Treasury of something like a million of dollars annually for the erection and maintenance of light-houses, and then throw them open free to all the world. English vessels arrive at and depart from our ports and harbors free and untaxed.

In return, what treatment have our ships in English harbors? Every American mail steamer entering at Liverpool pays for light dues sixty-two pounds for each voyage. If we charged the English steamers at the same rates, we should collect from them annually no less a sum than three thousand two hundred and twenty-four pounds, (£3,224.) The two steamers, the Washington and Hermann, running from New York to Bremen, touching only at Southampton, have paid in a single year, £800, including the charges for the Heligoland light, which, Mr. Lawrence says he is informed, those steamers have never seen.

This Heligoland light, I have been informed, is the property of two English ladies, of a wealthy family, who reap its revenues.

One commercial house in New York, says Mr. Lawrence, running sixteen ships between that port, Liverpool, and London, paid in a single year £2,498 for light-house charges; about $12,000. Another American shipping house paid for lights in 1846 £2,252, or about $11,000. Mr. Lawrence further remarks, that—

"Within ten years past the shipping of the United States has contributed upon 7,872 vessels, the aggregate tonnage of which was over 4,681,925, the immense sum of two hundred and thirty-four thousand pounds sterling, or over $1,000,000, for the support of the light-house system of the United Kingdom."

He continues—

"During the last year, (1850,) there appears to have been levied upon the shipping of the world for the light dues of the United Kingdom, between £400,000 and £500,000. Of this one fourteenth part was paid by citizens of the United States; while British subjects, with a fleet doubtless equally large in the ports of the United States, have not been taxed at all for the maintenance of lights. The Government of the United States, in view of its liberality, is justified in asking Her Majesty's Government to do away with this great inequality, and remove this restriction on commerce."

Enough of these quotations, for I shall print the whole correspondence between Mr. Lawrence and Lord Palmerston, and I trust that it may be widely read.

These, then, are the unjust differences made between the treatment of American ships in English waters, and of English ships in American waters. It amounts to a discrimination in ten years of $1,100,000 against our commerce. Moreover, the discrimination is odious; for I have heard, and I believe, that the whole amount thus collected by British corporations, is not necessary for the support of their lights, but that a large portion of it goes to pamper and support particular families, pensioners, and others. It is high time that this pitiful system was changed for the better; and the tone of argument and curtness of final action made use of by Viscount Palmerston, renders this a very necessary way of retaliating, and thus either of compelling an abandonment by the English of their unjust system, or, if that cannot be done, of compelling British ships to pay towards the support of our light-houses the same amount that our ships pay towards the support of their light-houses. That is fair and just, and must be brought about.

Neither is this any time for continuing special favors and immunities to British shipping. We have lately beheld upon our northeastern frontier a British squadron, with little or no notice, seize, capture, and confiscate the vessels of our hardy fishermen. Britain had doubtless forgotten the immunity from light charges and light dues which we, with unexampled generosity, have so long granted to her shipping on our waters; but I, sir, am now disposed to remind her of it, and to convince her, by thus putting her vessels and our own upon the same footing—by this act of just retaliation—that we accord favors only when they are generously returned, and that we can withdraw them when they are abused to our own injury.

Sir, there is no reason that I know of why this amendment should not be adopted. It provides only that a foreign ship shall pay for the support of lights in our waters the same amount that our ships pay for the same purposes in foreign waters. Why a cotton ship from Charleston, or a merchant ship from New York, should be paying hundreds of dollars in England for lights, while English ships pay nothing at Charleston or New York, is beyond my conjecture. I trust that the adoption of this measure may at least induce the British Government to support its own lights, as we support our lights; or, if that purpose fail, this at least we shall gain—we will put our commerce upon an equality with theirs as respects charges, and shall derive a large revenue from their shipping for the support of our lights. I subjoin the correspondence:

MR. LAWRENCE TO VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.

"UNITED STATES LEGATION,
"138 Piccadilly, December 31, 1850."

"The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor, under instructions from his Government, to invite the attention of Viscount Palmerston, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to the subject of the light dues exacted of the mercantile marine of the United States entering the ports of the United Kingdom.

"It is nearly two years since Her Majesty's Government determined to respond to the invitation of the United States, made to the world many years ago, and recommend Parliament to repeal the prohibitory navigation laws of the kingdom; and the commerce of the two nations has been conducted for now just one year, on the reciprocal basis established in accordance with such recommendation. The United States ask Great Britain to carry out this principle; to establish reciprocity in fact, as well as in name—to do justice to the commerce of the United States.

"The light-houses, floating-lights, buoys, and beacons on the whole sea and lake coast, and rivers of the United States, were constructed and are maintained by the Federal Government, an annual appropriation being made by Congress for these objects. No light dues of any kind are levied, either on vessels of the United States or on ships of foreign nations. In the year 1792, there were but ten lights in the Union. In the year 1848, there were two hundred and seventy light-houses, thirty floating-lights, one thousand buoys, besides numerous fixed beacons. There are probably at this time, including those under construction on the Pacific coast, more than three hundred light-houses, with a proportionate number of floating-lights, buoys, &c., all of which are given to the use of the world by the United States, without tax or charge.

"The commerce of the United States is not met with a corresponding liberality in the ports of the United Kingdom. The reciprocity intended to be established by the navigation law of last year, and so much to be wished for between the two greatest commercial nations of the globe, will not be realized if American tonnage continues to be subjected to onerous light duties in Great Britain, while British vessels enjoy, without pay, the lights, &c., upon the coast of the United States.

"The undersigned is not unaware that the system of light dues in this country is somewhat complicated; but he believes that as reforms have been made in many other laws and customs adopted in former ages under a different state of society, so changes can be made in these, adapting them more to the present condition of the world, and to the liberal policy of other nations.

"In the illustration of the onerous and unequal operation of the present system of lights in Great Britain upon American commerce, the undersigned has the honor to ask Viscount Palmerston's attention to a few examples.

"The American mail steamers entering at Liverpool pay for light dues the sum of £62 for each voyage. If the British steamers were subjected to the same charge in American ports, it would amount annually to the great sum of £3,224. Two steamers, the Washington and Hermann, returning from New York to Bremen, and touching on the way at Southampton, paid last year light dues to the amount of £800, including the charges for the Heligoland light; which the undersigned is informed they have never seen. The steamer Franklin, running between New York and Havre, and touching at Cowes, but without anchoring, merely to land its mails, has been subjected to light dues; which have been paid by order of the Trinity House, but under protest of the consignees. One commercial house in New York, running sixteen ships between that port, Liverpool, and London, paid last year for such dues £2,498 3s. 6d. Another American shipping house paid for lights in 1849 the sum of £2,252.

"The undersigned will not multiply individual examples of the amount of this tax. The number of American ships that entered the ports of the United Kingdom for nine months, ending October 1, 1850, was 602, with a tonnage of 473,900. If one third be added for the last quarter of a year, the total will be 752 ships, and about 600,000 tons, being an average of nearly 800 tons to each ship. Assuming this calculation to be substantially correct, it appears from the trade list that 3,909 American vessels have entered the ports of the United Kingdom in the last four years, with a tonnage of 2,422,492. During the last ten years the number of American vessels entered into the United Kingdom has been 7,872, with an aggregate of 4,681,925 tons.

"The light dues are not the same in all the ports of the United Kingdom. The rate at Liverpool is 10d. or 11d.; whereas in London, the charge is 13d. per ton. If the average is taken at 1s. per ton, a ship of 800 tons would pay £40, and 752 ships, with 600,000 tons register, would pay about £30,000, or $146,000 annually, and it is not probable that the amount of tonnage will decrease in coming years; 3,909 American ships must have paid, with a tonnage of 2,422,492, the sum of £121,000, or nearly $600,000. And within ten years last past, the shipping of the United States has contributed upon 7,872 vessels, the aggregate tonnage of which was 4,681,925, the immense sum of £234,000, or over $1,100,000, for the support of the light-house system of the United Kingdom.

"During the last year, there appears to have been levied upon the shipping of the world, for the light dues of the United Kingdom, between £400,000 and £500,000. Of this, one fourteenth part was paid by citizens of the United States; while British subjects, with a fleet doubtless equally large in the ports of the United States, have not been taxed at all for the maintenance of lights. The Government of the United States, in view of its liberality, is justified in asking Her Majesty's Government to do away with this great inequality, and remove this restriction on commerce.

"The undersigned believes that no other nation levies so heavy a tax upon ships, in the form of light dues, as this. There are in the United States many more light-houses, &c., than in the United Kingdom; yet the annual appropriation for the construction of new, the repair of old light-houses, and the maintenance of both, does not equal one fifth of the annual amount raised for this purpose in the United Kingdom by the tax on the shipping coming into its ports.

"In conclusion, the undersigned, on behalf of his Government, expresses the wish that Her Majesty's Government may take this grave subject into consideration; that it may speedily set free American shipping from so unequal and so onerous a restriction; that it may complete its great measures for commercial freedom, and may thus increase still more the intercommunication which is already producing such happy results.

"The undersigned, &c.,

"ABBOTT LAWRENCE."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON TO MR. LAWRENCE.

"FOREIGN OFFICE, February 6, 1851.

"The undersigned, &c., has the honor to inform Mr. Lawrence, &c., that her Majesty's Government has had under its consideration the note which Mr. Lawrence addressed to the undersigned on the 31st of December, complaining that heavy light dues are levied on American shipping in the ports of the United Kingdom, whilst no dues of the same kind are charged upon British ships frequenting the ports of the United States; and Mr. Lawrence says that he is instructed by his Government to request that measures may be taken in order that American vessels may enjoy in British ports, in regard to exemption both from light dues and other similar charges, the same advantages which British vessels enjoy in the ports of the United States.

"In reply, the undersigned has the honor to state, that the difference between the treatment of British vessels in American ports, and that of American vessels in British ports, in regard to light dues, is a consequence of the difference which exists between the system on which coast lights are maintained in the United States, and the system on which such lights are maintained in the United Kingdom.

"In the United States, the coast lights are erected and maintained by the Federal Government, and the expenses connected with those lights form part of the general expenditure of that Government. The Federal Government, therefore, has a right to determine whether it shall reimburse itself for this outlay by levying light duties upon shipping, or whether, on the whole, it may not be more for the advantage of the United States, and more conducive to the commercial prosperity of the nation, that this charge should be borne by the public revenue, and that the commerce of the Union should be freed from any burden in the shape of light dues upon vessels frequenting the ports of the Union. The Government of the United States having power to decide this question, has determined wisely, as Her Majesty's Government think, as well as liberally, to free the commerce of the Union from any burden on this account, and to defray out of the national revenue the actual cost of erecting and maintaining the coast lights.

"If the coast lights of the United Kingdom had been established upon the same principle, and if they had been erected and were maintained at the public expense, and if they were managed and administered by a department of the State, it is possible that Her Majesty's Government might think that it would be best for the general interests of the nation that the system of the United States in regard to these matters should be adopted in this country, and that the commerce of the United Kingdom should be relieved from the burden of light dues.

"But the British Government has not the power to deal with this matter as it pleases; the various lights which are established round the coasts of the United Kingdom have been erected and are maintained by various corporate bodies; and those corporate bodies are entitled, by patents and by acts of Parliament, to levy certain dues upon shipping, in order to raise the necessary income for paying interest on the capital laid out in the construction of the lights, and for providing the means requisite for defraying the expense of maintaining those lights.

"Her Majesty's Government have no right or power to order these corporate bodies to abstain from levying these dues, and these dues could not be made to cease, unless Parliament was to vote such sums as would be necessary to buy up for the public interest which the private parties concerned have in these lights; nor unless Parliament were at the same time to authorize the Government to abolish light dues for the future, and were to charge upon the public revenue the expense of maintaining the lights.

"The expediency of adopting such a course has, indeed, from time to time been suggested, but the question has not hitherto been considered with a view to any practical decision.

"Her Majesty's Government, however, cannot admit that the difference which exists between the system which prevails in the United States, and that which exists in Great Britain, in regard to coast lights, has the effect of infringing upon that principle of commercial reciprocity between Great Britain and the United States, which forms the basis of the treaty of 1815. It is no part of the engagements of that treaty, that the internal system and local arrangements of the two countries, upon commercial matters, shall be the same. But the principle distinctly laid down in the second paragraph of the first article of the treaty of 1815 is, that the vessels of each country shall, in the ports of the other, be treated, in regard to duties and charges, in the same manner and on the same footing as national vessels; and this stipulation is strictly observed in regard to the light dues which are levied upon American vessels in British ports, for no other or higher light dues are levied in those ports upon American vessels than are levied in those ports upon vessels belonging to the United Kingdom.

"But if the British light dues cannot be deemed to be any infringement of the principle of reciprocity which forms the basis of the treaty of 1815, neither can they be considered as in any degree conflicting with the liberal principle upon which the present navigation law of Great Britain is founded. For that navigation law relates to the admission of foreign ships into British ports with certain goods on board, and coming from certain voyages, which goods and voyages would, before the passing of that law, have involved an exclusion from a British port; but that law has no reference to light dues or harbors dues, nor does it make any mention of such matters, and it cannot, therefore, be appealed to as requiring, for its complete execution, that any change should be made in such matters.

"Her Majesty's Government are quite ready to discuss with the Government of the United States any question which may arise in regard to any supposed incompleteness in the mutual application of that principle of reciprocity in matters of navigation, which is contained in the act 12 and 13 Vict., cap. 29; but willing and desirous as they are to carry out the provisions of that act to the fullest extent, with respect to all countries which are disposed, as the United States have declared themselves to be, to pursue a similar course, yet Her Majesty's Government cannot admit the force of arguments founded upon a constructive application of that law to matters which are wholly beyond the range of its enactments.

"The undersigned, &c., PALMERSTON."

MR. LAWRENCE TO VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
138 Piccadilly, February, 12, 1851.

"The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of Viscount Palmerston, Her Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, of the 6th inst., in reply to the former note of the undersigned to Lord Palmerston on the subject of the imposition of light dues on the tonnage of the United States within the ports of the United Kingdom, and will not fail to transmit a copy to his Government by the earliest opportunity.

"The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to correct an error into which Her Majesty's Government seem to have fallen with reference to the request made by the undersigned, on behalf of the Government of the United States, on this subject.

"The Government of the United States is not unaware of the difference between the system on which coast lights are maintained in the United States and the system on which such lights are maintained in the United Kingdom. On the contrary, the undersigned alluded to that difference in the former communication he had the honor to make to Viscount Palmerston, with reference to them. That fact does not, however, diminish the pressure of this tax upon the shipping of the United States. And while the undersigned disclaims all intention of discussing the particular mode by which the lights of the United Kingdom are maintained, he still cherishes the hope that there is nothing in that system to prevent the changes for which his Government has asked.

"The Federal Government does not rest this request on the provisions of the convention of 1815. Lord Palmerston justly says, that 'it is no part of the engagements of that treaty, that the internal system and local arrangements of the two countries upon commercial matters shall be the same.'

"Neither does it seek to view the present navigation law of the United Kingdom as liberating the commerce of the United States from the tax. Were that the case, there would have been no occasion to instruct the undersigned to make the communication of the 31st of December last.

"The Federal Government rests this request solely on the fact that the commerce of Great Britain enjoys, without charge, the lights, beacons, and buoys, maintained by the United States on a coast several thousand miles in extent; while the commerce of the United States is heavily taxed for the support of similar lights, beacons, and buoys, in the United Kingdom. In view of this fact, it asks Her Majesty's Government to meet the liberality of the United States with a reciprocal liberality. And, as an additional reason for granting the request, it points to the present commercial policy of the two nations, founded professedly on the principle of reciprocity; and it invites Her Majesty's Government to extend the principle still further, and treat the commerce of the United States as liberally as the United States treat the commerce of the United Kingdom.

"The undersigned trusts that no question will arise in regard to any supposed incompleteness in the mutual application of that principle of reciprocity in matters of navigation, contained in the act 12 and 13 Vic., c. 29, to render necessary the discussion for which Viscount Palmerston expresses the readiness of Her Majesty's Government.

"The undersigned has great pleasure in learning that the expediency of adopting such a course as that of the United States has been, from time to time, suggested, and renews the expression of the hope that Her Majesty's Government may devise some way to remove or to lighten this burden, which now falls so heavily on the commerce of the United States. The undersigned, &c.,

"ABBOTT LAWRENCE."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON TO MR. LAWRENCE.

"FOREIGN OFFICE, February 14, 1851.

"The undersigned, &c., has the honor to inform Mr. Lawrence, &c., that he has received, and has referred to the proper department of Her Majesty's Government, the note which Mr. Lawrence addressed to the undersigned, on the 12th instant, relative to the light dues which are levied on American shipping in the ports of the United Kingdom. The undersigned, &c.,

"PALMERSTON."

MR. BAYLY, of Virginia. I agree with the gentleman from Maryland [MR. EVANS] in some of his views.

THE CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman that by the language of the rule he must oppose the adoption of the amendment.

MR. BAYLY. The Chair will excuse me. I understand that point perfectly well, but it does not follow that, agreeing with much that the gentleman has said, I approve of his amendment; for there may be other reasons which he has not stated that will show the impropriety of his amendment, although all he has stated may be true.

THE CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

MR. BAYLY. I therefore say, sir, I agree in most that the gentleman from Maryland has said, but I desire to call his attention to a point, upon which, I confess, I am not prepared to give a definitive opinion to this committee, because the proposition has been sprung upon the House, and without notice to me. It has only struck me at the moment. I desire to know of the gentleman to what extent his amendment will interfere with our treaties with Great Britain, and whether his attention has been directed to that point? My impression is that it will conflict with them.

MR. EVANS. Lord Palmerston, in this correspondence, says expressly that it will not. He says it has no connection with it.

MR. BAYLY. By our treaty relations with Great Britain, she is put upon the footing of the most favored nations, and we have agreed that we will impose no higher or other charges upon her vessels than we impose upon our own. Now, this amendment provides that we are to levy and collect light-house duties from those nations which collect them from us, and none others; and it proposes to impose charges on British vessels which we do not impose upon our own. I doubt whether such a provision as that is precisely in accordance with our treaties. But granting that the object aimed at is proper, and I have long thought that it was a proper mode of supporting the light-house system, yet I do doubt exceedingly whether this committee ought to pass it before we have more time to look into the facts relating to this subject. I approve of the object, but unless the gentleman is informed upon the point I have suggested, I am opposed to its adoption. They ought to be looked into.

MR. EVANS. I will merely state that it only puts her upon the footing of the most favored nation.

THE CHAIRMAN. Further debate is not in order.

MR. STANTON, of Tennessee. I propose an amendment to the effect that the duties shall be the same as those levied in Great Britain.

MR. EVANS. That is there now.

MR. STANTON. It differs from the proposition of the gentleman in this: he proposes that the vessels of each nation shall be charged the same light-house duties which American vessels are charged upon its coast. The objection stated by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] has validity. Great Britain might justly complain that she was not placed upon a footing with the most favored nations; but if we pass a general law fixing a light-house duty applicable to all vessels of all nations, there could be no complaint, and the objection of the gentleman from Virginia vanishes. But so long as Great Britain might have that ground of complaint, the gentleman's argument would be correct. I propose this amendment simply as a suggestion to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS.] I agree in all that he has said, except in that particular part of his proposition which makes different charges upon vessels of different nations, of which, according to our treaties with Great Britain, she might justly complain.

Mr. WALSH. I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee. This is a matter which it seems to me at this time we should not give our attention to at all. The facts alluded to ought to be ascertained by a committee of this House. We ought to see what Governments levy these light duties against us, and the matter should be looked into under the direction of Congress, if it be possible, and the President should not be left to find out all these facts for himself. The true jurisdiction is here, sir. I am against the amendment for another reason. I am opposed to it upon the grounds which have been mentioned by my honorable colleague and friend, [Mr. EVANS.] I am opposed to this system of pouting. I do not want to say to Great Britain that because she has interfered with our fisheries upon the north, we will put at her by levying these duties. I understand that if we say that to them we have received sufficient satisfaction for all she has done in this matter. I trust that at this time this committee will do no such thing.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I suggest to the gentleman that the motive for this proposition is the duty charged by Great Britain for her light-houses and not the fisheries.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that is the ground, but it will seem otherwise if we adopt the amendment, because her vessels are now upon our coast. I do not mean to say that is the motive, but the honorable gentleman says that she cannot complain of it because she has done this injury to us. I hope she will be called to an account for that injury in another way.

Mr. STANTON. So do I.

Mr. WALSH. I hope we will not pass the amendment at this time, for the world will say that we have done it like a child in a passion. I trust that is not the motive. I hope Great Britain by this time is aware that she has to make satisfaction in a different way; and before any negotiation is entered into, that the Government and Executive may understand the matter.

Mr. STANTON. This subject was under consideration by the Ministers of the respective Governments before this fishing difficulty occurred.

Mr. WALSH. I understand, in addition to that, that my honorable friend complains of the manner in which the British Minister has treated ours as an additional reason. Let us see all of these things. Let us see the correspondence. Let us see how he has been treated. Let us understand what light duties Great Britain levies upon our citizens trading there. Let us ascertain what light duties are levied by France and other Governments upon them. Let us have a system; and let Congress take it under its jurisdiction, instead of leaving it to the President to ascertain all of these facts. Let us not do it now. I am one of those men, Whig as I am, who trust that the Secretary of State is not at this time carrying on any negotiation. If he is carrying on negotiation in the face of the British fleet off our northern coast, he ought not to be kept in his office.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I should like, if it be in order, to ask the gentleman a question.

A MEMBER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made the gentleman cannot proceed.

The question was then put upon the amendment of Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. FULLER. For the purpose of making an inquiry, I move to strike out the word "President" from the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, so that it will read: "There be and hereby is," &c. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Maryland, who introduced this resolution, whether the British Government discriminates and levies light-house duties upon our commerce and our navigation which she does not upon her own?

Mr. EVANS. No, sir.

Mr. FULLER. Then I would ask if there would not be a difficulty on the part of our Government discriminating by levying a duty upon their shipping and not upon our own?

Mr. EVANS. No, sir. The duty on our shipping is levied by the general appropriation from the Treasury. They levy a special tax upon our commerce. If the amendment be adopted, their shipping in our port will only be put upon the same footing that ours is in their ports.

Mr. BROOKS. I am in favor of the principle of this amendment, but I agree with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY]—at least it is my present impression—that it is inconsistent with the treaty of commerce we have with Great Britain of 1815.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine is the only one now under consideration.

Mr. BROOKS. I propose to speak against the adoption of the amendment for the levying of this light duty. By the treaty of 1815, and reciprocal laws in pursuance of this and other treaties, Great Britain is placed upon the footing of the most favored nations. If, therefore, we attempt to carry the proposition out, discriminating against British vessels, we will not only have to levy a duty upon England, but a like duty upon all other foreign nations, and also a like duty upon our own commerce. In order to carry out the principles of the treaty of 1815, and our reciprocal navigation acts, it strikes me just now that we shall be obliged to levy a like duty not only upon all other European nations, but upon all American vessels, because the duties must be uniform. A British ship now has the right to come into an American port subject exactly to the same duties as an American vessel. Nevertheless, if the principle proposed can, it ought to be carried out. Great Britain deserves that retaliation from us, for the wrong she inflicts upon our people in her light taxes exacted by the Trinity Board, is a great one; but it is a wrong that is inflicted upon herself, and upon all other nations of the earth, as well as the United States of America. We cannot complain of it as unequal, or as discriminating. I shall certainly not resist with any ardor the adoption of this amendment in committee, and I do not know that any harm would arise in sending it to the Senate for their examination. My impression is, nevertheless, that it is inconsistent with the treaty of 1815.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. As the gentleman's time has not expired, I will make a suggestion. Our treaty with Great Britain, which requires that she shall be placed upon the footing of the most favored nations, would not require, in levying light-house duties, that we should levy them upon our own citizens as well as those of other nations.

Mr. BROOKS. Our treaty of commerce and navigation with Great Britain, and our reciprocal laws, provide that British vessels shall enter the ports of the United States upon the same terms and regulations, as to tonnage or other duties, as American vessels. A perfect reciprocity now exists under our treaties and navigation acts, and such a reciprocity has existed since the British navigation act of June, 1850. Collecting light-house taxes, both of American and British vessels in British ports, is no violation of that reciprocity, and my impression is we cannot retaliate, unless we levy the same duties both on British and American vessels in American ports.

Mr. FULLER, with the unanimous consent of the committee, then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MEADE. I submit the following proviso to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland:

Provided, That such duties shall not conflict with existing treaties.

I think there is a provision in our treaty with Great Britain, to the effect that her vessels shall enter the ports of the United States upon the terms granted to other nations. I believe there are provisions to that effect in nearly all of our treaties. If that be the case, we cannot discriminate so as to levy a tax upon the vessels of England, or of any other nation with whom there is such a treaty, unless that tax be a uniform one. Now, the tax Great Britain levies may be a uniform one. She may levy those duties upon every vessel entering her ports, and if so, there is no discrimination against the United States. But if we pass this amendment, the President of the United States is required to levy these duties upon the vessels of such nations as levy similar duties upon our vessels. Now, sir, if we tax the vessels of Great Britain and France, or any other nation with which we have such a treaty as I have described, it would be a discriminating duty upon the vessels of such a nation, which would not be entering our ports upon terms as favorable as those granted to other nations.

Mr. EVANS. I shall accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MEADE. Then I have only another word to say. It is very evident that this is an important step taken in the commercial regulations of the country, and I am opposed to doing so without having maturely considered the subject. It has been sprung upon this House, and the remarks which have already fallen from gentlemen in committee, show that this is a question we ought to consider maturely before we adopt it.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. When the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland was first read, I must say that I was favorably impressed with it, but the discussion which has ensued has satisfied me that it would be improper to adopt that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment now under consideration is the one proposed by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I suppose that the amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, being a proviso to it, will have the effect either to restrain or enlarge it, and that, therefore, the merits of the original proposition are, to a certain degree, under consideration. Now, I understand the gentleman from Maryland to say this matter has been the subject of negotiation, or at least of correspondence between the British Government and our Minister. That correspondence has not been laid before this House that I am aware of. For my part, it has not fallen under my observation, and I am unprepared, at this time, to say whether we ought to adopt that amendment, bearing as it does upon our treaty stipulations with foreign nations—particularly with Great Britain. If the correspondence that has ensued admits the proposition, which I understand the gentleman to hint, that if we pass these provisions we shall not infringe the treaty stipulations between us and Great Britain, then, sir, one impediment will be removed.

Mr. EVANS. With the gentleman's permission, I will call the attention of the committee to one quotation.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I should like to have the whole correspondence read to the committee before it is called to pass upon this proposition. If it cannot be, I hope they will vote against it.

Mr. EVANS. I call attention to the following extract:

"The Federal Government does not rest this request on the provisions of the convention of 1815."

Lord Palmerston justly says, that—

"It is no part of the engagements of that treaty, that the internal system and local arrangements of the two countries upon commercial matters shall be the same."

In order to obviate objection, I am willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE.]

Mr. SEYMOUR. This is a general proposition. It applies to all nations with which we have treaty stipulations, and I think, for one, it will be imprudent at this time to adopt so general a proposition without a thorough investigation by one of the committees of this House. I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. EVANS. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE.]

Mr. DEAN. I move to strike out the word "President." I do this merely for the reason, that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] saw fit to withdraw it. I see no way in which you can execute this law, if you authorize the President to levy this light duty. It strikes me that if this system should be adopted, it should be adopted by a special act. If the gentleman will look at his own amendment, he will see that it can never be executed by the President. It makes a discrimination; and we have to find out what each Government does, and then the President must direct somebody to collect it for him. It seems to me that this amendment can never be carried out. If the system is right, let it be presented in a bill, and then we will adopt it after discussion.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I rise merely to state, that I am opposed to this amendment and the original amendment. This is a very important question, and the more it is discussed the more evidence we have of its importance. Our relations at the present time with Great Britain are very delicate. It is necessary that we should understand this whole matter before we adopt the amendment or the principles of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS.] I hope that the whole amendment will be voted down; and if this matter is to be acted upon, I hope that the Committee on Foreign Relations will bring the subject before the House with all the evidence necessary to enlighten us in regard to the principle contained in the amendment.

Mr. EVANS. I should like to say to the gentleman that this bill has to go to the Senate, before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that committee can consider it.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DEAN'S amendment, and it was rejected.

The question then recurred on Mr. EVANS'S amendment.

Mr. EVANS demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. EVANS, and CAMPBELL of Illinois, were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—yes 64, noes 52.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The following clause of the bill was then read:

"For supplying light-houses, containing 3,272 lamps, with oil, tube-glasses, wicks, buff skins, whitening, and cotton cloth, transportation, and other expenses on the same, and for repairing and keeping in repair the lighting apparatus, $182,330 78.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I move to strike this section out. I make this motion for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the inequality in the appropriations from the National Treasury for the protection to internal and external commerce.

It will be recollected, that in the river and harbor bill, which passed this House a few days ago, about five sixths of the amount appropriated in that bill were appropriated to the protection of foreign commerce.

This morning the House voted down a resolution from one of the standing committees of the House, authorizing the engraving of maps of a survey for a canal round the Falls of the Ohio, which would have cost some $600 or $700.

It is now proposed in the clause which I propose, to strike out to appropriate $182,330 for keeping up the lights upon the Atlantic coasts. The whole amount appropriated for light-houses is $429,905. There is also, in a subsequent part of this bill, an appropriation of $366,000 for the continuation of the coast survey; making an aggregate of $795,905 appropriated in this bill for the protection of foreign commerce. I presume it is true that the condition of the Treasury will not warrant the appropriation of as large sums as could be profitably expended in the protection of the internal commerce of the country. But I shall always insist that such appropriations as are made shall be distributed with some sort of equality to the different sections of the country, according to the wants and necessities of commerce, whether domestic or foreign. The pressing necessities for appropriations for the western rivers cannot be denied; yet they are steadily and constantly refused. And, while I admit the necessity for these light-house appropriations, yet I would refuse them, until gentlemen should make some reasonable appropriations for western rivers.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman is forgetting altogether, in the course of his remarks, that the whole lake coast, from the St. Lawrence border, belonging to us, the coast of Lake Ontario, of Lake Erie, of Lake Michigan, Lake Huron, Lake Superior, all the upper lakes, the Mississippi river, and the whole lake coast of Ohio, is lighted, as well as the Atlantic coast.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. There are no light-houses upon the Mississippi.

Mr. BROOKS. If it be in order, I should like to show the gentleman that, instead of throwing his obstruction in the way of appropriations upon the Atlantic coast, he should direct his remarks to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and convert the people there as to their policy in improvements. Large masses of people there are against him, and he should correct them before he assails us. The difficulty lies in the gentleman's own neighborhood. Hence, these remarks against the Atlantic States are uncalled for and unnecessary; but they are frequently made without any particular purpose or any particular direction.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I move to reduce the sum $50,000. I agree in the remarks of my colleague as to the propriety of making these appropriations upon some basis that will be equal. A very simple proposition was made this morning in regard to a very important improvement—

Mr. HOUSTON. Is that debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that any discussion of a proposition pending in the House this morning is not in order, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] must confine his remarks to the amendment which he has submitted.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I desire to say that I see no reason why this enormous amount of money should be appropriated to the light-houses, when nothing is proposed to be done for the great commercial interests of the Mississippi valley. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] talks about the light-houses upon the Ohio and Mississippi and the western waters; when, in fact, such a thing as a light-house upon any of those great rivers would be regarded as a great curiosity. When a gentleman as intelligent as the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is presumed to be, makes an assertion of that kind, it illustrates the character of legislation that we have here in relation to western interests, and the extent of the information of members of the East as to our real condition. We ask as a matter of right, if you will give us nothing there to facilitate the great commercial interests of that region, that you shall reduce the amount of your taxes upon us for the purpose of keeping up your light-house system upon the sea-board and the northern lakes. I said the other day that there is and has been a combination here of the commercial interests of the sea-board and lakes, against the great valley of the Mississippi and the interior rivers of the country.

Mr. MARTIN. Where do you want light-houses?

Mr. CAMPBELL. We do not want light-houses. Take out the snags. But if you do not take out the snags give us lights, that our steam-boats and other craft may steer by them in the dark hours of the night. We demand something to be done there, that human life and property may not be endangered. Until this is done, I will vote to strike out every dollar for light-houses in this and every other bill. I will do all I can to "shut off the gas" from the lights we have so long kept up for your benefit, unless you will give some just and substantial aid to remove impediments to western navigation.

It is the only way left by which we can successfully bring this House to a proper appreciation of the vast interests of the West. I propose to strike out the present sum and insert $50,000. That is enough under the circumstances, and it is ten times as much as should be given until there is something done for the other interests of the interior, which have been so long and so shamefully neglected.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I will say in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, that even supposing everything he says is true, this is not the proper place to make the reform that he proposes. Light-houses run through three bills. The light-house bill proper comes from the Committee on Commerce, and they authorize all of the new structures which are to be made. After they have been authorized by law, they then go into the Army appropriation bill, and whilst they are in course of construction they are under the charge of the War Department. But after they are finished, they then go into the civil and diplomatic bill, and the appropriations in this bill are only for light-houses already established, and already existing. Now, I do not suppose that the gentleman, because he thinks justice is not done to the West, wishes to leave without support, light-houses that have actually been constructed.

A MEMBER. Yes, he does.

Mr. BAYLY. Very well; if he proposes that I have nothing more to say.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. We once had snag-boats on the Mississippi which you allowed to go down for want of appropriations.

Mr. SMART. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, I will occupy the remainder of his five minutes. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] says that there are no light-houses located in Ohio.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I beg to correct the gentleman. I did not say so at all. I said there were none on the Ohio river.

Mr. SMART. I will read from the Blue-Book a list of light-houses in Ohio, that will show that the gentleman is mistaken if he says there are no light-houses in that State.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman is misrepresenting me. I said there were no light-houses on the Ohio and other western rivers. I repeat once more, I did not say there were none upon the lake shore.

Mr. SMART. I may have misunderstood the gentleman, but—

[Cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The five minutes of the gentleman from Virginia have expired.

Mr. SMART. Then I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$50,000," and inserting "$40,000" in lieu thereof.

I will say, without any reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] that upon examining the Blue-Book, I find a list of light-houses in the State of Ohio.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I must correct the gentleman again. In reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] who stated that there were light-houses on the Missouri and Mississippi rivers, I expressly said there were no light-houses on the western rivers.

Mr. SMART. Without reference to the assertion of the gentleman, I suppose it is still competent for me to show how many light-houses there are in the State of Ohio, and that is what I intend to do. If the gentleman will permit me, I will read from the Blue-Book the list of light-houses in that State. It is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, these are all light-houses in Ohio, and I want to ask the gentleman if he wishes any more. If he does, let him make his application to the Committee on Commerce, and the wants of his section will doubtless be considered.

I should like to know if he wishes to put out every light on the coast of the United States? I ask him whether these light-houses are not remotely for the benefit even of his section of the country? I wish to know how the gentleman could get his products to the European market, if all the lights were blown out from one end of the coast to the other? I do not think that is a very statesmanlike proposition, come from what quarter it may. It strikes me that it is not. I find that there are twelve light-houses in the State of Ohio, and I think that under the circumstances, considering that there is very little coast in Ohio, that will do very well. The gentleman need not be quite so squeamish about this appropriation for light-houses. It seems to me, that it would be a very remarkable thing if the American Congress were to blow out the lights on the whole coast, from Maine to Florida—"shut off the gas." That is the proposition of the gentleman, as I understand it. It is suggested to me by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] that they have more light-houses in Ohio in proportion to their extent of coast than we have in Maine. Such, sir, is the fact. The coast of Maine is a very long one. It has a shore line of 1,355 miles.

Mr. GIDDINGS said: I am opposed to the amendment to the amendment. But I rise to enter my protest against the ideas advanced by my colleague, [Mr. CAMPBELL.] Sir, I have sat here during the discussion on the harbor and river bill, and heard myself and my colleagues of the lake-shore assailed, as having entered into a combination with the gentlemen from the sea-coast in order to procure appropriations for the lakes and sea-board while we neglected the western rivers. Now, sir, I desire to know on what my colleague has based this unfounded assertion.

[Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will my colleague allow me to explain?

Mr. GIDDINGS. Not now, for I have only five minutes. My colleague may have ten minutes afterwards, if he can get it. [Laughter.] I believe my colleague supports the present Administration—

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio must confine his remarks to the amendment which he is opposing.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I intend to do it most strictly. I now say that the proper bureau has all the intelligence upon this subject which can be procured; and the head of that bureau tells us where these appropriations for light-houses on the lakes and sea-board, and for the removal of snags, and so forth, on the rivers are necessary. Now, let me say to the country, that every dollar recommended by the present Executive for the improvement of western rivers has been embraced in the bill which we have passed for that purpose; and the wrath and denunciation of my colleagues have been poured out upon gentlemen here, because we did not go beyond the proper bureau, and take upon ourselves the province of declaring appropriations necessary and important, where the Executive has not done it, and where we had no knowledge that they were necessary. Sir, I feel a little upon this subject. I have confidence in the bureau that has this matter in charge, and when they tell us what is necessary, I believe them, for they have the means of knowing better than my colleague or myself, or other gentlemen.

Now, in regard to light houses. My colleague wants to put out the lights on the lake shore. Sir, will he stand up here and say that he is opposed to this appropriation to light the tempest-tossed mariners on our lakes? Will he say to his constituents, and to the people of Ohio, that those lights should be extinguished, and that the sailors upon our lakes shall wander in the darkness and storms, liable to be cast upon our iron-bound shores for want of lights? No, sir. I understand this matter. I understand these denunciations. I understand this charge of conspiracy. Who have entered into any such combination? I hope my colleague will point them out. I undertake to say that there has been no such thing as the gentleman has imputed to us dreamed of. No man ever thought of it. I have voted for every appropriation for harbors and for rivers that has been recommended by the proper bureau and reported to this House. The Committee on Commerce cut down the appropriations recommended by the Department for harbors on our lakes, but not so with the rivers. My own district has been denied the amount recommended by the Administration, but not so with my colleague's district and the other districts upon the river. There, every cent recommended by the Department was given them. Yet with the full amount proposed by the Topographical Bureau, while the lakes are not allowed the sums recommended, gentlemen on the river turn round and charge us with opposition to their interests. Sir, in every bill that has come before us for fifteen years, I have voted every dollar to the rivers which has been recommended by the Administration, and I advise gentlemen to be more cautious in making charges so utterly unfounded. There can be no grounds for misapprehension. The recommendation of the Department has been before us during the whole session. I merely state this, in order that the country shall understand that there is no foundation for the imputation which my colleague has been making and reiterating during the discussion of the harbor bill, and has repeated here to-day.

Mr. SMART. I will now withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

The question recurred upon Mr. CAMPBELL's amendment, and being put, it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I propose to reduce the amount of the appropriation to $75,000. I desire to say to my honorable colleague from the lake shore, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] that although I may not be able to prove specifically, combinations, I can refer generally to the votes and to the actions of gentlemen representing those sections, for the purpose of showing that there has been strange unanimity of action between the sea-board and the lakes, in voting down all propositions to improve the rivers of the interior.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the subject-matter of his amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I only desire the same latitude that was allowed to my colleague. Now, it is a little remarkable that my colleague, (whose feelings and votes are never sectional, we all know,) if he looks to all the great interests of this country, should have voted as he did this morning, against a simple proposition to print, upon the plates already provided, the maps designed to impart to this House and to the country the most reliable information in regard to an improvement of great interest to the entire West, at the Falls of the Ohio; still he is ready always to vote any amount of money for anything upon the lake shore, which he immediately represents. Now, sir, my constituents are interested about as much in the trade of the lakes as they are in the trade of the western rivers. The people of my district trade both with the North and South. I come here to legislate for the whole country—for the lake shore, for the sea-board, and for the great rivers of the West, and I ask—as I have a right to ask—on behalf of my constituents, and of other sections whose people bear their share of these expenditures, and whose interests have long been neglected here, that there shall be something like equality now and in the future.

The question has been propounded to me by my colleague, whether I would shut off the light from the light-houses on the lakes, and let the lives of the sailors on those lakes be endangered for the want of such lights? I say in reply to my honorable colleague, that the lives of the sailors and flat-boatmen on the Ohio, and other inland rivers, are as dear to me as the lives of his constituents on the lakes, and I shall stand here to protect the rights and interests of those who navigate those dangerous waters, as well as the lives and interests of those upon the lakes. And, sir, until gentlemen come here prepared to extend to them the arm of protection against the dangers of those waters, I say you shall not take money out of the Treasury, in which they have a common right with you, for the purpose of protecting other interests. Let all stand upon terms of equality. If you protect the lives of your sailors upon the lakes, and the interests upon your sea-board, I demand of you, as the representatives of the American people, that you shall give equal protection to the lives and property of the people of the great West.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] speaks of the number of light-houses upon the lakes. He makes no point on me in that way, because these light-houses are on the lakes, and the ground of my complaint was, that the interests of the lakes and sea-board were alone protected by our legislation here to the great neglect of the interests of the navigable rivers. Sir, I stand here to-day to oppose the continuance of this unequal and oppressive system of taking the money from the pockets of the people of one section, and expending it for the advantage and benefit of other sections of this Union.

Mr. SMART. I ask the gentleman if he claims that any injustice has been done him or his section of country, or the valley of the Mississippi?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not represent any district upon this subject, but I speak now the prevailing sentiments of all classes and all portions of the West. I represent, and desire to protect, alike the interests of all classes and all sections of the country; and I therefore denounce this inequality in your appropriations.

Mr. CARTTER. I am ready to acquiesce in any reasonable humbug for the benefit of the West, [laughter,] any plausible humbug; but when you come to talk about light-houses upon the Ohio river I am ready to filibuster. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I presume the gentleman did not understand me as proposing any such thing.

Mr. CARTTER. I understand my colleague to be opposed to light-houses upon the lakes because there are no light-houses upon the Ohio river.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not at all; I am opposed to appropriating money for the purpose of building light-houses upon the lakes until a bill has been passed to take the snags out of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers.

Mr. CARTTER. Well, under the most favorable aspect of the question, I understand the attitude of my colleague to be that the frontier and sea-coast of this Republic are to be kept in midnight darkness hereafter, because there are no light-houses upon the Ohio river.

Now, in reference to this conspiracy, which my colleague talks about, between the lakes and the Atlantic, I want to say a word. I am in favor of that conspiracy. It is a conspiracy in necessity—a conspiracy in nature, and that description of conspiracy which is authorized by the defenses of the Republic and her maritime interests; and the idea of checkmating it by talking about light-houses upon the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, is one unworthy the position of a statesman; for anybody who knows anything about these rivers, knows that all this talk about building light-houses upon them is a fiction. They sail upon these rivers within half a mile of each shore, with headlands and land-marks within view of the pilot at all times when you can make a passage in the channel, as anybody who knows anything about these rivers knows. Yet my colleague, in his effervescence for the interest of the rivers, endeavors to elevate them to the position of the high seas. Now, I protest against the whole of this; and if my colleague sees fit to give it the character of a conspiracy, I say that there should be a conspiracy between the lakes and the Atlantic coast; for there is nothing distinguishable between the perils of the navigation of either.

I protested against the connection of the subject of rivers with the lakes and the Atlantic coast, as the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will bear me witness, in the early part of the session. There is no natural alliance between them. Your high seas require national protection for the national defense, and this joining them with the rivers is an adulterous connection, which never ought to have been formed in the Committee on Commerce, and against which I enter my most solemn protest. If you have any national object for improvement upon your rivers, make your improvements, and make them upon their own merits; but do not attempt to harness down the winds and the waves upon your high seas to the narrow channels of your rivers. Do not attempt to involve your national highways for the national defense with the mere question of commercial convenience. It is an adulterous connection which never ought to be maintained.

The question now being upon Mr. CAMPBELL's amendment, it was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GOODENOW. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, moved, pro forma, to strike out the 544th and 545th lines.

Mr. S. said: I offer that amendment merely for the purpose of enabling me to make a remark in reply to my colleague. My colleague from the Ashtabula district [Mr. GIDDINGS] wanted to know what evidence there was of a combination between the lakes and the sea-board?

Mr. HOUSTON. I must insist upon the enforcement of the rule. It seems to me that we are not carrying on a legitimate discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio must confine his remarks to showing reasons why this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. STANTON. My colleague said he voted for all the improvements estimated for. I wish to correct him in this particular.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

There is an estimate from the proper Department for a canal around the Falls of the Ohio at Louisville. He voted against that.

[Cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is not in order.

Mr. STANTON. I am as much so as my colleagues were in the questions which they discussed.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I want to correct my colleague, for I know he would not willingly misrepresent me. I said nothing about estimates; I said recommendations.

Mr. STANTON. Very well; recommendations. There has been a standing recommendation for the enlargement of the canal around these Falls for years past. Here is a resolution offered from a committee this morning for an expenditure of only four or six hundred dollars, and my colleague votes against it, as he votes against every amendment of this kind.

[Cries of "Order!"]
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is not in order. The Chair will be compelled to enforce the rule, and confine all debate within its legitimate sphere.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I hope my colleague will be allowed to proceed. I want to see him show this thing out. He says there is a combination. Let him go on and show it.

[Loud cries of "Order!"]
Mr. STANTON. Well, I will only say that both my colleagues have been allowed to speak upon the question. I have been arraigned by them upon it, and I insist that I ought to have the right to reply.

Mr. HOUSTON. I insist upon the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. STANTON. Why did not the gentleman from Alabama insist upon the enforcement of the rule, in reference to my colleague?

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]
The question was taken upon Mr. STANTON'S amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The following section was then read by the Clerk:

"For salaries of three hundred and twenty-one light-house keepers and twenty-four assistants, (twenty-four of them charged with double lights, and two with triple lights,) and including $1,200 for salary of an inspector of lights on the upper lakes, $136,753 33."

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I wish to know what is meant in that appropriation, by an "inspector of lights?" The law makes collectors ex officio inspectors of lights.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark, that the appropriation is for the salary of an inspector of lights upon the upper lakes.

Mr. BAYLY. I am aware of that, but as I understand it, there is no such officer recognized. The collector is ex officio inspector of lights.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman move an amendment?

Mr. BAYLY. Yes, sir. I move to strike out the appropriation.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will examine, he will find that such appropriations have been made in the bills that have passed the two or three last Congresses, and that it is made in pursuance of law.

Mr. BAYLY. I only wanted the matter explained. I know the collectors have been inspectors of lights, but I am told by a gentleman on my right that there is such an officer where there is no collector. If such is the case, it is satisfactory. I will now, with the consent of the committee, withdraw my amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HOUSTON, under instructions of the Committee of Ways and Means, offered the following amendment, to come in at the end of the clause appropriating $12,000 for the expenses of coloring and numbering all the buoys, under the act of September 28, 1850, viz:

For additional expenses incurred for fog-signals authorized by the act of September 28, 1850, and for the application of horse-power to some of them, $1,000.

Mr. H. said: That, the Secretary of the Treasury states to the Committee of Ways and Means, is in pursuance of a contract made under the law of the last Congress.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. LOCKHART. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to—ayes 37, noes not counted.

The following clause of the bill was read, viz:

"For salaries of the assistant treasurers of the United States, at New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis, $11,500."

Mr. BROOKS. I move to amend this clause, so as to give the assistant treasurer at New York

$1,000 in addition to the sum at present provided for. I do this as a matter of duty to the country, without solicitation from that officer. He has often under his care public money to the amount of $6,000,000; and the salary which he now has is entirely insufficient for the amount of responsibility incurred.

A MEMBER. What is the salary?

Mr. BROOKS. It is $4,500. It was with the utmost difficulty that the President of the United States could obtain a sub-treasurer when the old officer, Mr. Young, died; and a like difficulty will occur under any party, whenever a change may be made. It is of the highest importance that the large sum of money placed in the sub-treasury at New York should be sufficiently secured. The security of the last sub-treasurer was $800,000; but the Government were under the necessity of reducing the security from $800,000 to something like $400,000; and it was with great difficulty that a sub-treasurer could be obtained even then. I throw out these facts to the country. It is easy enough to get persons who will take the office. I know a good many persons who would give a great deal to have it—some as much as $100,000. I have no doubt of that; but we want a competent person for the office. We want a man of property and a man of position; a man who, by the force of his character, can secure great guarantees from men of wealth. The security should be $800,000, and in order to secure such an officer, the salary should be increased $1,000.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to know if the officer has threatened to resign?

Mr. BROOKS. I know the gentleman did decline after the office was given him. He would not occupy it; and it was from the solicitation of friends and the impossibility of getting another person of the property and character to come forward and give this large security that he was induced to accept the office. In order to obtain this officer, therefore, it was necessary to reduce the amount of the security nearly one half.

The question was then put, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ORR. I move that the committee rise, and upon that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MEADE, and FULLER of Maine, were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 25.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 196, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30th, 1853, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

RESIGNATION OF MR. MARSHALL, OF KY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs leave to announce the resignation of Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, a member of this House.

The following letter of resignation was then read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, August 4, 1852.
SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I have this day resigned my seat as a member of the Thirty-second Congress.

In parting with this body I tender to its members my sincere wish for their future prosperity and welfare.

For yourself, sir, believe me truly, &c.,

H. MARSHALL.

Hon. LINN BOYD, Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. CLARK here obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question which I believe to be one of privilege. I suppose it is necessary for this House to request the Speaker to communicate the fact of the resignation of Mr. MARSHALL to the Governor of the State of Kentucky.

Mr. STANLY. Not this session.

Mr. JONES. I think it should be done.

The SPEAKER. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] has already addressed the Governor of Kentucky upon that subject.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a privileged motion. I move the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order while the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CLARK] has the floor.

Mr. CLARK. I beg leave to call up a little bill from the Senate, which contains but one section, and which can be read in less than two minutes. It provides for the relinquishment by the United States of a small strip of land in the town of Bellview, Iowa, on the Mississippi river. That town needs it, and it does not contain over four or five acres. I ask the House to take it up.

Mr. McCORKLE. I object.

On motion by Mr. CARTTER, the House then adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock, a. m.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ALLEN, of Illinois: The petition of James Dick-ey, and many other citizens of Gallatin county, Illinois, asking Congress to establish a mail route from Shawneetown, along the middle road known as the Cypress road, to David Keaster's, in said county.

By Mr. BROWN, of New Jersey: The petition of sundry citizens of Morristown, New Jersey, for the passage of the bill introduced by Mr. STANLY, in aid of colonization, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit with the States the fourth installment of the deposits of the public money directed to be made by act of June 23, 1836."

By Mr. BOWNE: The memorial of Conklin Brush and others, of Brooklyn, New York, for the passage of a law for the better protection of the lives of passengers in vessels and boats propelled by steam.

By Mr. PARKER, of Pennsylvania: The petition of D. Stewart Elliott and 65 others, citizens of Blair county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to pass the bill introduced into the House of Representatives by the Hon. E. STANLY, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit with the several States, the fourth installment of the deposits of the public money directed to be made with such States, by the act approved June 23, 1836."

By Mr. BRIGGS: The memorial of W. H. Franklin and others, for the passage of a law for the better protection of the lives of passengers on vessels propelled by steam.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 5, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. President, I move the suspension of the morning order of business, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the President's message, in relation to the North American fisheries.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN resumed and concluded the speech which he commenced on Tuesday, of which a report will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow, for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SOULE. Allow me to suggest to the Senator the expediency of postponing the consideration of this matter—upon which I shall probably have something to say—till some day next week, in order that in the mean time the communications made to this body by the Department of State may be printed, that we may have possession of them, and look into them and see what are their contents and their bearing. I would therefore suggest the further postponement of the consideration of this matter until Thursday next, as I understand that it will take that much time to have the communications printed.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DAVIS. Whenever those papers are printed, I wish to suggest that there is a bundle of papers here which were communicated some time ago, connected with the subject, as I understand, which should also be printed. They were communicated at a former session, and I understand that they contain a great deal of information on this subject. Perhaps it would be as well to allow the whole subject to go to the Committee on Printing, and let them select such portions of the papers on file as are important, that they may be printed with this communication. The papers to which I allude were never ordered to be printed, and if the gentleman will let the whole question of printing lie over until to-morrow, we might look into them.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have no objection to that. I have no particular interest in this question. My object was to get at the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MASON. This matter engages, and properly engages just now, the earnest attention of the American people. It is a matter apparently of some conflict in the present posture of affairs between us and Great Britain, and I do not think a little matter of economy in spending more or less for the printing of the documents should be considered on such an occasion. I submit, therefore, that it would be better to print all the documents.

Mr. DAVIS. I should be glad to print them all if they are pertinent documents. There was a file of them sent here at a former session, and, I believe, though I have not had time to examine them, that they throw great light on this subject. I certainly wish that all the papers applicable to the subject should be printed. The papers to which I allude were upon the table of the Secretary the other day, and I should be very glad to have them go into the hands of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to be ordered to be printed, or such portions as the committee should see fit to select, in order that they may be printed along with this document.

Mr. MASON. There must be some delay in looking over such a mass of documents by any committee or any Senator; and at the present stage of the business of the Senate I should think that was impracticable. I would suggest to the Senator to withdraw his objection, and let all the documents be printed. There is nothing involved in the printing but a little economy.

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand the Senator to wish to have these documents printed, together with the former file to which I refer?

Mr. MASON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MASON. Then I make that motion.

Mr. BRIGHT. I accept that proposition. I move to postpone the further consideration of the message until Thursday next, and to print all the papers upon the subject.

Mr. WELLER. All that have not been heretofore printed.

Mr. CASS. I coincide with the Senator from Virginia. The cost of a few dollars more or less in printing these papers ought not to be considered as a matter of great importance. We want to see the whole of the documents. If they remain scattered among the documents of the last few years we cannot go and search for them. The whole of the papers ought to be given together to the Senate and to the public.

The motion of Mr. BRIGHT was agreed to.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the daily hour of the meeting of the Senate be eleven o'clock, a. m.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives "making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30th, 1853," the question pending being upon the fourth amendment of the Committee on Finance, which was to strike out the following clause:

"For the payment to the Shawnees of moneys due them under and by virtue of the treaties of the 7th of November, 1825, and 8th of August, 1831, between the United States and the two divisions of said tribe of Indians, the same being the net balance received into the Treasury for sale of their lands in Ohio, $66,246 23: Provided, however, That said tribe of Indians shall first express their assent that the payment of the above sum shall be made equally to the whole tribe, rather than to either division thereof."

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I move to amend the clause which the Committee on Finance propose to strike out, by striking out all after the word "provided," and inserting:

That the validity of their claim shall be first investigated by the Attorney General of the United States, according to the true intent and meaning of said treaties, and if in his opinion the same be just, then the said sum to be paid to the whole nation of Shawnees residing upon the Kansas, per capita, but upon the following conditions: First, that the said Shawnees shall by some valid act of the national authority, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, agree to receive said money in common. Second, that they will hold in common, as one nation, the lands assigned by the treaty of 1825. Third, that all claim of the Ohio Shawnees to the exclusive grant of 100,000 acres under the treaty of 1831, be forever released.

The object of the amendment which I have offered, is simply to perfect the clause before the question is taken upon the motion to strike it out. The amendment which I have sent to the Chair neither affirms nor denies the justice or propriety, or validity, of the claim; but it proposes—as there is probably a valid claim on the part of the Indians for the amount which is here proposed to be appropriated—that, as it is a litigated question which we have neither time nor opportunity to investigate, we should refer it to the Attorney General, with full and plenary powers, not only to investigate the whole matter, but to act upon the provisions of the treaty of 1825, and that of 1831, which control the appropriation and govern the right. If, in such case, the Attorney General should be of opinion that their claim is a valid one, then the amendment regulates the disposition of the money in a manner different from that in which the appropriation now stands. It provides, first, that the two wings of the Shawnee tribe, who appear to have intentions somewhat hostile to each other, and interests somewhat conflicting, should agree to receive this amount per capita. It provides, also, that they should enjoy their lands upon the Kansas river in common; and it further provides that the 100,000 acres provided by the treaty of 1831, shall be released to the United States, and that no further claim shall be set up by these Indians in consequence. In other words, Mr. President, it provides for all the difficulties which seem to be involved in the present claim; so that if the appropriation should be made subject to the decision of the Attorney General according to the true intent and meaning of the treaties of 1825 and 1831, then the amount of money is to be paid on the conditions the propriety of recognizing which will be made to appear on the very face of the claim which they make.

The explanation of this claim given by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. ARCTURSON,] the other day, was so lucid and so correct, that it will excuse me from the necessity of going into a history of it again. I do not propose to recapitulate the facts on which the claim is based. I have nothing to do with that now. The amendment, as I have said, neither affirms nor denies the validity of the claim. It provides, however, a mode of investigating its justice, which I think is preferable, and better calculated to enable us to arrive at the truth than any mode as yet presented, at this late period of the session, and with our present lights.

The reason why I offer the amendment is, that I think there is extreme plausibility in the claim, and it all depends upon one point, that is: whether the treaty of 1825 conflicts with the treaty of 1831, or whether the hundred thousand acres to be conferred on the Ohio Shawnees was an additional gratuity—something over and above the common right acquired by the treaty of 1825, made with the Missouri Shawnees. If the hundred thousand acres were in lieu of the common right which they acquired by the treaty of 1825, then there is no claim; but if it was an additional right acquired by one treaty, beyond what was acquired under the other, then there is a valid claim for the amount of compensation which they seek to recover from us. It seems to me to depend entirely on that question; and for the purpose of determining that question, I do not believe that we now have the necessary lights; and that we would do well to throw the investigation during the recess, on the Attorney General, who will have access to all the files, and all the papers connected with this case. By this means, that unsolved problem could be elucidated, and it would be clearly comprehended whether the provision in the subsequent treaty was in fact one of the provisions of the first treaty, or whether it was an independent gratuity. That appears to me to be the only question; and the amendment provides for its investigation.

Mr. CASS. I feel some interest in this application, not only because I believe the claim to be a very equitable one, but in consequence of the personal relations that have subsisted between myself and that band of Indians whose case is presented before us as applicants on this occasion. I have received a paper which I will ask the Secretary of the Senate to read.

The paper was read, as follows:

3d August, 1852.

DEAR SIR: We address you as an old friend of our nation upon our business now before the Senate, as we hear it said that the money for our land should not be paid until further investigation, because there is some doubt as to whether the Missouri or Ohio Shawnees are entitled to it.

We are the delegates of our whole nation, and the authority under which we act was granted in general council with the consent of all our people of both parties, and with a perfect understanding that the money received for our lands was to be divided amongst all of us. We have lived a long time together and enjoy our annuities in common. When the Ohio Shawnees settled on the Kansas river, the Missouri Shawnees received no annuity whatever; but since our amalgamation, the annuity of the Ohio Shawnees has been shared by all of us in common.

The undersigned represent both branches of the tribe, and they have never heard that any other members of either branch of the tribe had authority to do so. They have heard that a paper was signed by a few of their people, claiming that the money due for their land should be paid to the Missouri Shawnees. They have never seen this paper, but understand it was not the act of the tribe in council, and that it was not witnessed by any Government officer. They hope you will ask for it, and see what it is, and whether it is the act of the tribe.

The clause in the Indian bill now pending in the Senate is just as the undersigned and their nation desired it. It proposes to pay the money to all our people, and we hope it will pass. We have all lived peaceably together, and if there is anybody trying to create a strife amongst us about this money, they are more our enemies than our friends.

We have been trying a great many years to close up this business, and to get our money from the Government, that we might improve our farms and educate our children. We have had several deputations here upon this business, and it has cost our nation a great deal of time and money; and all we ask now is, that just what money the United States has received for our land shall be paid us.

Our nation thinks that we should have the money received for our lands, because the Government cannot give us a patent for the one hundred thousand acres they had promised us in the treaty of 1831. When our nation shall have given its receipt for the money now asked for, it will have no further claim on the Government for the land; and we cannot see what more the Government wants. As the Government cannot give us the one hundred thousand acres, we have nothing under the treaty of 1831 to treat further about. This is a simple question, whether the Government, having the money for our lands, shall return it to us.

We hope that you, as the old friend of our tribe whom we have looked up to, will explain this matter and see that justice is done us.

We hear that the protest that we have alluded to above was sent here by our friend Colonel Mitchell, of Missouri. We cannot think this is so, as all our other papers have come through his office as Superintendent of Indian Affairs; and if that paper had come through him, it would have been sent to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and we should have been told of it there. We think it must have been sent by somebody who had no authority to act for our nation. If it was handed in by any "Colonel Mitchell," it must have been some other man, and not Colonel D. D. Mitchell, superintendent of Indian Affairs at St. Louis.

We herewith inclose you a copy of the letter from our agent, Major Moseley, dated March 4, 1852, which shows that all we have stated is true, and that when we were sent here, it was agreed by our whole nation that this money shall belong, when paid, to "the entire Shawnee tribe."

Please return the inclosed letter to us, as it belongs to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Very respectfully, your friends,

BLACKHOOF, ✕
JOSEPH PARKS, ✕
SAR-KEE-SE-MOE, SPY BUCK, ✕

Hon. LEWIS CASS.

Mr. ATCHISON. I wish to state that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] introduced the remonstrance referred to in the communication which has been read, and which purported to be from members of the Missouri Indians. It was presented to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs in the House of Representatives by Colonel Mitchell, of Minnesota. It was reported as being Colonel Mitchell, of Missouri; but I remember hearing the Senator from Virginia say distinctly, Colonel Mitchell, of Minnesota. That was correct. Colonel Mitchell, of Missouri, never presented such a paper. That explanation corrects the mistake.

Mr. CASS. Accompanying this paper, I have a letter from their agent, Major Moseley, but I will not detain the Senate in reading it. Major Moseley states the favorable condition of the Indians, and speaks highly of them.

Sir, I have had a good deal of official intercourse with these Shawnee Indians, and I know them well. The tribe is a very remarkable one among the aborigines in the United States. They are emigrants from the South, a kindred tribe to that of the Cherokees, and came a century and a half ago and established themselves on the Ohio river. They are remarkable for their bravery as well as for their intelligence, and have been so ever since we have had any acquaintance with them. Sir, Logan belonged to that tribe; he who commanded or rather led the Indians at the battle at the mouth of the Kanhawa, and whose celebrated speech has been so much commented upon and admired by the public for its eloquence, and which was given to the world by Mr. Jefferson.

Tecumseh also belonged to that tribe, a name well known to the Senate and to the country. He was a remarkable man; and there have been two men in our Indian history who stand prominently out upon the historic canvas, and have been actuated by the same motives—men who lived a century apart. At the time the English conquered Canada, the Ottawa chief Pontiac exercised prodigious influence over his countrymen. He was one of nature's great men. He saw that the whites were determined to drive the Indians before them, and that they must finally disappear; he saw that the English were the predominant civilized power; and his object was to unite various tribes into one confederacy, and with the aid of the French, oppose their further progress. It is a matter of history, as we all know, that his plans were deeply laid. He contemplated simultaneous attacks upon all the British posts in the northwest. The day was fixed, and the attack made. Michilimackinac and St. Joseph's were taken, and Detroit escaped by a mere accident. He had to yield to the superior fortunes of the English. Tecumseh followed the same course with the same object. The English was, however, the power to which he looked for aid, for a new party had risen in the United States, equal to the English and the Indians.

Tecumseh followed the same course. He was not at the battle of Tippecanoe in 1811. If he had been there the result might have been different. Perhaps his presence might have turned the fate of the day; such was the extent of his influence. He was at that time in the South, among the Creeks, with the view of bringing them over to his measures. His object, as I have said, was to unite the Indian tribes into a general confederacy, something like the Achaean league in Greece, under the influence and power of England, with the view of stopping further encroachments, as he considered it, on the part of the United States.

His brother, the prophet—a fanatical man, who had the command—exercised great influence over the Indians, who believed not so much in his superior intelligence as in his holding communication with the Great Spirit. In the war that followed, the party of Tecumseh and of his brother, the prophet, went over to the British, while a large portion of the tribe remained attached to the United States. His brother was with the southern Indians, inducing them to cooperate, and to second their efforts in checking our progress, and preventing our further encroachment upon them. Here is a speech made by Tecumseh to Proctor, and a very extraordinary one it is. I am not going to read it to the Senate, however. It is too long for that; but allow me to say that in it he reproaches Proctor for his cowardice, and tells him that he is preparing to flee away—that he is fleeing before the Americans, while his duty is to fight his own battles and those of the Indian, and not to run. He also shows that the efforts to induce the Indians to enter into hostilities against the United States were made by direction of the British authorities. Of the truth of this there is no doubt.

"My brother, the Prophet, is among the Creeks. They are doing what you directed when I visited them. The war is prosperous. Our lives are in the keeping of the Great Spirit. You have plenty of arms and ammunition. Leave them with us if you must go. We are resolved to fight, and leave our bones on the lands that belong to us, if so the Great Spirit will."

Well, the British army retreated; they lost the favorable opportunity which Tecumseh wished they should improve, by attacking us upon the debarkation, and he fell whilst contending for his policy.

If the Senate will pardon me—it is rather out of place, I know, but like a former experienced associate of ours, who is now no longer with us—I want to occupy ten minutes in "vindictating the truth of history." If I am a little garrulous, the Senate will kindly attribute it to my belonging to that category, which has a prescriptive right to tell old tales.

There are two historical points which have been much debated on, about which I wish to say a few words; both are connected with Colonel Johnson and these Shawnees. The question has been often mooted as to who was the author of the movement by which the mounted regiment commenced the attack upon the British at the battle of the Thames.

Probably I know as much upon that subject as any other man now living, and the facts are these: General Harrison had prescribed the order of battle, and promulgated it in the usual manner; that order directed that the army should move, infantry in front, with a portion of the force placed at right angles to the main body, to prevent the enemy from turning the flank. The cavalry were to remain in the rear, to follow up all the movements of the infantry. They were posted with the Thames on one flank and an almost impassable marsh on the other. Just as the arrangement was completed, I was sitting on my horse when General Harrison rode up, and said to me, "I have a great mind to change my order of battle. I feel very strongly inclined to let Colonel Johnson's regiment attack the British line first." I replied: "You have undoubtedly considered the difficulty attending the charge; the mounted men are brave, but undisciplined, and their horses unused to service. If defeated, they may be upon our line, and do us irreparable injury." His answer was; "Colonel Johnson says he can break the British line, and I will let him try." Well, the movement was made, and was successful; and never, from that day to this, have I had a doubt that Colonel Johnson proposed the movement to General Harrison.

One other point, and I am done.

Mr. BUTLER. Did Colonel Johnson's regiment charge the enemy with swords or rifles?

Mr. CASS. The men were all on horseback, armed with rifles; few of them had swords; they rode down the British forces; broke their lines almost without impediment. I talked about it afterwards with some of the British captured officers, and having expressed my surprise at the little opposition the movement met with, asked why they allowed their lines to be broken, and their men to be rode down? They replied that "their men had become alarmed, for they had heard our bugles in the swamp on the left," where they supposed that we had a heavy force of regular cavalry. The bugles, Mr. President, were some old tin horns, and we had no force there at all.

I had some conversation on the subject the other day at Lexington with a very intelligent gentleman, Captain Johnson, a younger brother of Colonel Johnson, who was there, and we compared notes, and agreed in our recollections.

Now, as to the other historic but disputed point: Who killed Tecumseh? [Laughter.] I will tell you what I know. Tecumseh fell in the battle, as we are all aware; but the following year the Prophet, Tecumseh's brother, and his son, young Tecumseh, a very intelligent young man, often came to see me, and we had several conversations respecting the series of events in which his father was engaged. The young man was near his father's side in the battle, but his uncle, the Prophet, was in the Creek country, upon the mission to which I have referred. The young man described the battle very graphically—the persons, the parties present, and the incidents, without hesitation, from the beginning to the end, and I have no more doubt, from his narration, than I have that I am here, that Colonel Johnson was the person who killed his father. There were three of the Johnsons in the battle, and they were as brave men as ever followed the standard of their country to war.

Now, with respect to this Shawnee claim, there is up in the gallery before us, watching our deliberations, a white man, whose name is Parks. I have known him since 1814. When a boy, he was taken prisoner by the Indians, and was brought up among the Wyandots and Shawnees; and a more reliable man, or one more faithful to the country, has not existed since the landing of the Pilgrims upon the Rock of Plymouth. The Government, in 1814, were necessarily driven to change the policy they adopted. They at first determined not to employ the Indians; but had they known them as well as the frontier settlers, they would not have attempted such a policy. The English Government called the Indians together from every portion of their dominions, gave them immense quantities of ammunition, provisions, and clothing, and invited them to take up the tomahawk against the United States, and they did so. An Indian must sometimes go to war, and at all times he has a strong inclination to do so. It is a part of their education; and no young man stands well with his nation who has not imbrued his hands in blood. They hold great periodical assemblages and feasts, where the whole tribe is collected, and a post is erected. Every warrior comes to that post, and strikes it, and sings his war-song, and recounts his feats of arms, and boasts of his prowess. If he has no deed of daring to tell; if he cannot relate his hair-breadth 'scapes, and the number of scalps he has taken, he is no man. He dare not tell a lie before his whole village; for he would soon be covered with shame. Well, if he cannot take part in this cherished ceremony, this tried ceremony, and say "I killed, or aided in killing such a man, and under such circumstances, and took his scalp," he is no warrior; the very squaws would laugh at him; and my friend from Missouri [Mr. Archison] knows well how disagreeable such female contempt must be.

And therefore it was that during the late contest with England our Government was compelled to change its policy, and consequently, in 1814, General Harrison and myself were appointed commissioners to invite the Indians to join us, as we had found, by dear experience, that if they were not with us, they would be against us. We met them at Greenville, Ohio, where the largest number of Indians was collected together that I have ever seen, before or since. They took up the tomahawk, with their own imposing ceremonies, and they generally remained faithful to us, and many of them rendered very efficient services to our cause. A party of the Shawnees accompanied me from the treaty ground to the northwestern frontier, then in great peril from the incursions of the hostile Indians, and in a defenseless condition, in consequence of our force having been ordered below to aid the operations upon the Niagara. They were ranging in the woods around Detroit, and we had an engagement with them within two miles of the town, and an inhabitant was killed in the town itself. It was under these circumstances, that Parks, then but a lad, and Blackhoof, the principal chief of the tribe, whose son is also in the gallery before me, with a party of their people, came to the rescue, and saved us perhaps from destruction. They crossed into Canada, and were with General McArthur in his expedition there, by which the quiet of the frontier was secured. And there is a third Shawnee, sitting there with his two friends. He is the son of a true and brave chief, called Captain Tommy, a son of an Indian aid-de-camp to General Harrison, who was with him during his operations in the Northwest, and possessed, as well as merited, our confidence; and, for many years, while they occupied that country, I had relations, political and personal, with the Shawnees, which left a deep impression upon my mind; and whenever they are in any difficulty, I will remember them and their bravery and fidelity, and endeavor to be useful to them.

Now, a word in regard to this treaty. In 1825 a treaty was executed in the State of Missouri providing for the removal of that band of Shawnee Indians living at Cape Girardeau, to lands west of the State. Sir, in that very year I was instructed to visit the Shawnees of Ohio, in order to persuade them to join their countrymen west of Missouri, and they peremptorily refused to do so. They would not stir one step, because they liked their position, and did not wish to abandon it. Now, what does this treaty provide? It provides, "that in consideration of the cession aforesaid, 'the United States do hereby agree to give to the Shawnee tribe of Indians within the State of Missouri, for themselves and for those of the same nation now residing in Ohio, who may hereafter emigrate to the west of the Mississippi, a tract of land equal to fifty miles square.'"

It is my decided conviction, that when that treaty was made, it was not expected nor intended that the whole of the Ohio Indians would go to take possession of this land. At the very time I was with the Ohio Shawnees, there were delegates from the Missouri Indians asking them to go, and they would not do it. I am satisfied that this clause was inserted to induce as many as chose to go to do so, holding out the inducement that if they would go they would be sure of a residence; but I do not believe it was contemplated at all or expected that the whole band of the Ohio Shawnees would come in under this clause. Why? For an obvious reason. Certain it is, that we have obtained a double consideration for the land. We have a cession of the Cape Girardeau and of the Ohio lands—the two tracts—and we have paid but one consideration, the reservation west of Missouri, which was expressly given for the Cape Girardeau purchase.

The Ohio Indians would not have needed such a provision if they had intended to emigrate in a body. They had lands of their own. They had the same powers as the other Indians to go and secure a country for themselves; but what did the United States do? They sold in 1825, to their relatives and friends in Missouri, a given tract of land, and then in 1831, resold a part of it to these very Indians upon Wapaghkonetta, saying to them, "Go you and occupy 100,000 acres of what you were authorized to occupy seven years ago." I do not see that there can be any doubt upon this question; and certainly, looking to their relations with the United States previously, and to the conduct of these Indians, and their intelligence—for they are the most intelligent Indians upon our borders—looking to the pertinacity with which they adhere to this claim, and to the fact that they are perfectly convinced of the justice of it, having prosecuted it for years, and looking to the equity which ought to characterize our intercourse with all the Indians, and to the faithful conduct of these Indians in dark and doubtful times, I think we ought to allow this claim without hesitation. What is such a claim to this Government? Why, these Indian claims are not to be measured, as I said the other day, as you measure a matter in dispute before a justice of peace. You must look to your relative position with them, and consider that you have superior strength and intelligence; you may spread out before them your designs, and your papers, but they have a very imperfect idea of what is upon your piece of paper. How can the Indians understand with precision what is written? They cannot do it, and you cannot explain it to them. They look upon it, but can acquire but very general conceptions of it. They trust to you. They have a general idea of what you give them and of what they yield; but as to any correct understanding of the minute details of the treaty, their notions are necessarily imperfect. It is, therefore, our duty to look at the claim, and not rigidly insist upon every word, when we are satisfied that they have a fair claim upon us.

Now, I will not oppose this proposition of the Senator from Arkansas, although I would much rather the appropriation stood upon its original ground; but I do beg the honorable Senator from Arkansas, together with the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. ARCHISON,] whom I know to be actuated by the best motives, to appropriate a small sum for the expenses of this delegation, that they may not find themselves here without the means of returning.

Mr. ARCHISON. Certainly; I have no objection to that.

Mr. CASS. It will be but a small amount. Let us pay these men who have come here to see to this claim; and then if gentlemen insist upon it, we can between this and the next session investigate the matter, and see what can be done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not rise to answer the question, who killed Tecumseh? That has been a question which has been mooted considerably in the State of Kentucky, and indeed a great deal discussed many years ago. The claims of Colonel Johnson, and of a private soldier by the name of King, were brought before the people of that State, and made the topic of investigation very generally, but it is a matter of great indifference as to who accomplished that act. They were equally brave men, and either one of them would have performed the feat with as much cheerfulness as the other. I leave that subject undisposed of.

I have a word or two to say with regard to this claim, circumstances having induced me to look a little into it. I am decidedly of opinion that this money, legally and properly belongs exclusively to the Ohio tribe of Shawnees, and that the Missouri tribe of Shawnees have no interest in it, except so far as it may be conceded to them by the Ohio tribe. But I am very happy to see that fraternal spirit which has been manifested and expressed in the paper which the honorable Senator from Michigan has caused to be read, and laid upon the table. I am prepared, and I am willing to vote this appropriation, and to make up the compensation to them, now, provided that the rights of the Government can be sufficiently guarded, and all that I rise for is to express the hope, that my friend from Arkansas [Mr. SEBASTIAN] will modify his amendment in such a manner as to require that a relinquishment shall be made by the Ohio tribe, of their claim to the 100,000 acres and for all future compensation from the Government, sufficiently explicit to justify the payment, immediately, to the whole tribe. If such an amendment can be adopted I will vote for the appropriation immediately.

If the Senate will give me their attention, I will attempt to show that this is a just appropriation, and I think the grounds upon which the claim rests can be so presented that no one can gainsay them. By the treaty made with the Missouri Shawnees on the 7th of November, 1825, it was stipulated to give to the Missouri Shawnees, in consideration of land which they owned upon the Mississippi river, fifty miles square of territory. That fifty miles square was, by the terms of the treaty, adjoining the southwest angle of the State of Missouri; but the treaty contained a provision, that if the Indians did not wish to select the land there, they might take it elsewhere. In pursuance of that provision, the fifty miles square were, in the end, laid off for them upon the Kansas river. Now the Senate will be pleased to remember that these fifty miles square were to be given by the Government to the Missouri Indians in consideration of the title which they had to the land upon the Mississippi river. In the treaty of 1825 this clause was inserted, which I will now read, and which constitutes the foundation upon which all the difficulty rests:

"It is further agreed by the contracting parties, that, in consideration of the cession aforesaid, the United States do hereby agree to give to the Shawnee tribe of Indians within the State of Missouri, for themselves and for those of the same nation now residing in Ohio, who may hereafter emigrate to the west of the Mississippi, a tract of land equal to fifty (50) miles square."

Now, sir, why was this insertion made, that the United States would agree to give fifty miles square, if this is for themselves and for those of the Ohio Shawnees who might choose to emigrate and settle with them. Why was it inserted? These Ohio Shawnees at that time were no parties to this treaty. They at that time held their own land in the State of Ohio, and the United States did not acquire the land of the Ohio Shawnees till 1831, six years afterwards. Suppose these Ohio Shawnees had never sold their lands to the United States, might they not have retained them to this day? Nobody can deny that. Suppose that they had never emigrated and settled with the Missouri Shawnees. Was there any obligation until they were parties to the treaty? No, sir, none whatever. Could anybody have compelled them to do it? No one whatever. Suppose the Ohio Shawnees had never sold their lands and emigrated and amalgamated with the Missouri Shawnees, would not the Missouri Shawnees have held the whole of the fifty miles square, every foot of it? Can anybody doubt it? Is it not a complete contract, by which the Missouri Shawnees would have held every foot of the fifty miles square in consideration of their lands which they surrendered upon the Mississippi river? Nobody, it seems to me, can possibly doubt it, if they will take the trouble to look at the facts.

Well, sir, six years after that the Ohio Shawnees agree to sell their land to the United States; and in the treaty of 1831 with the Ohio Shawnees the United States assume that they will lay off out of the fifty miles square 100,000 acres, to be exclusively appropriated for the use of the Ohio Shawnees. What right had the United States to carve out any special part of these fifty miles square, which they had given before to the Missouri Shawnees, so that the Ohio Shawnees should have it? That was a mere act of courtesy on the part of the Missouri Shawnees to say: we will receive our brethren, if they choose to come. But there was no right in the United States to select one foot of the 100,000 acres, or any part of that territory which had been given to the Missouri Shawnees, and say we will set that apart exclusively for the use of the Ohio Shawnees. Yet the Government did do it, and I say that the Government had no right to do that. The title of the Missouri Shawnees was complete to the whole of the fifty miles square, independent of the title by this treaty, which took place six years after with the Ohio Shawnees. This being the fact, what is the condition of things? You have obtained from the Ohio Shawnees their lands, and you have promised them 100,000 acres within this tract of fifty miles square, which you had already stipulated that the Missouri Shawnees should have; and you said that if good lands could not be obtained within that tract, then you would give them 100,000 acres adjoining somewhere else. You never did give them the 100,000 acres adjoining; you had no right to give it within the tract of fifty miles square. It is as clear as that two and two make four, that you have obtained the lands of the Ohio Shawnees, and never paid a cent for them. That is the state of the case. These Ohio Shawnees ought to be paid either in money or in land. You promised them 100,000 acres of land, and you did not give it. You cannot, if you are faithful to the Missouri Shawnees, take it out of that tract, which you had given six years before to them; and you have never laid it off in any adjoining tract according to the treaty of 1831, although you have pocketed the money of the Ohio Shawnees.

Now, what has been done? I say that, according to the letter which has been read here, and which is highly creditable to the hearts of the Ohio Shawnees, if they are agreed that the money shall be divided in common among them—and it is said that the Missouri Shawnees have allowed the Ohio Shawnees to participate in their annuities—if they are agreed that the Missouri Indians shall participate, I think it would be right enough to make the appropriation for them all in common. But the Ohio Shawnees ought to make some relinquishment to the United States of their claim to this land, or that country which has been sold to the United States. If my friend from Arkansas [Mr. SEBASTIAN] could so modify his amendment as to embrace that—and I merely make the suggestion to him—I think we might make the appropriation absolute. The proviso as it now stands is—

"Provided, however, That said tribe of Indians shall first express their assent that the payment of the above sum shall be made equally to the whole tribe rather than to either division thereof."

If the Senator will so alter the proviso as to include that portion of the Missouri Indians who formerly constituted a portion of the Ohio Shawnees, and then add at the end of the section some words providing further that they shall relinquish all claims to which they might be entitled by the treaty of 1831, I could agree to the appropriation being made at once.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The amendment which I have offered embraces the very suggestions which the Senator from Kentucky has made. It provides that the money shall be received in common between the Missouri and the Ohio Shawnees; that they shall enjoy the grant in common; and it provides further that they shall release their claims on the Government to the exclusive right to the hundred thousand acres of land provided by the treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Precisely. I will state to my friend the difference between the two propositions to which I wish to call his attention. I approve entirely of the provisions of his amendment. I think they embrace exactly my wishes. But if I comprehend those provisions, the payment of the money cannot take place until all the other things specified take place. My object was to have the amendment made in such a manner that when the relinquishment of the claim is made in full, the money may be paid over without further delay. I am so thoroughly convinced of the propriety and justice of this claim that I would be willing to make the appropriation without further delay. Hence, I make the suggestion to my friend that if he will make the amendment I have intimated, the appropriation might become absolute, and the money could be taken out of the Treasury upon the execution of a relinquishment of the claims of these Indians against the United States. That is the only difference between my proposition and that of my friend from Arkansas. But if that does not meet with his approbation, and some other friend does not propose such an amendment, I shall certainly vote for the amendment which he has offered.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The Senator can attain his object by moving to strike out that portion of my amendment which prevents the appropriation from being absolute and unconditional. The reason why I cannot myself accede to the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky is, that this amendment is offered by me, under the direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is not my own individual amendment, but I express the view of the Committee on Indian Affairs in offering it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know there is some little difficulty in a gentleman occupying my position interfering with the business of the Committee on Indian Affairs, or any other committee, when they understand the business so much better than I profess to do. They can immediately place the amendment in a proper shape; but if any obstacle arises, I can look at the amendment and endeavor to make its phraseology conform to my views. I would be glad if some gentleman would prepare an amendment to meet my views, to provide that the money shall be given forthwith.

One word now with regard to these Shawnee Indians. As my friend from Michigan has talked about them, allow me to say that I have stood side by side with some of them in the battles of the country, in the war of 1812, and I believe they are, of all the Indians upon the continent of America, the most formidable foes when they are your enemies, and the most reliable friends when they stand by your side.

Mr. CASS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him if he cannot state the good conduct of Tecumseh and some of his countrymen; and how serviceable he was?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am going to do it. It was with that object I adverted to the subject. I was going to state a fact, which, perhaps, ought to be made historical. I saw Tecumseh with my own eyes; and I saw him under circumstances which made an impression upon my heart which never can be eradicated. He was, personally, one of the finest-looking men that my eyes ever gazed upon. He had all the lineaments of nature's noblemen. He had an eye of fire, and a countenance which showed the keenest enterprise, and the greatest genius, and a capacity for military operations such as I have hardly ever witnessed in the form of a man in my life. And, with it all, he had something like that heavenly benevolence which always goes with the character of an elevated and great man. Upon the occasion of which I speak he interposed to save the lives of those who were being butchered by the Pottawatomies and other tribes of Indians.

Mr. CASS. I hope the honorable Senator will be good enough to state the fact, that he himself was there, and knew all about it. The honorable Senator was wounded there. I want the Senate to understand the condition of those Indians.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the fact; but I do not like to speak of myself. I was there. The facts I speak of in relation to Tecumseh are true, and they ought to be historical. He was then dressed in the Indian costume, riding on a fine horse, having at his side one of the most elegant English swords that I ever saw; and wore the title of brigadier general in the British service.

Mr. CASS. Did he not stop the massacre?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have already said that he did interpose, and did stop the massacre.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, I am very glad to have these historical reminiscences brought to our notice. They interest us not only as matter of general history, but as connected with some of our own honored members. I have no objection to the time which has been spent in alluding to them, as they have been alluded to most feelingly and eloquently; but I do not perceive the connection which they have with this question. Although it may be thought a little presumptuous in me, in the matter of a claim upon the Government, to differ from my honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] especially—because I find him in general so very accurate in his investigations—yet I must say, that I differ with him entirely in regard to his whole view of this subject. Before I proceed, however, to state my own views, as I am disposed to do, not at much length, however, but as briefly as I can, after the manner of reading a lawyer's brief, if possible, I wish to call for the reading of Mr. Moseley's letter, in order that the Senate may have what I consider to be the true view of the facts established in this case, as they are recorded in the history of this Government. And then, if the Senate choose, from generosity to this noble band of Indians, to make this donation to the Shawnees, I shall not obstinately object; or if they need this money, (considering the fidelity which they have exhibited to the United States since they have become its friends,) to aid them in the education of their children, and to make more rapid advances in civilization, I do not know that I should object very obstinately against the payment of the sum of money which they now demand. But before I proceed with my explanation, I wish that the honorable Senator from Michigan would send to the chair, for the purpose of having it read, the letter of Mr. Moseley, the Indian agent. I want to see what are the facts stated in that letter.

The Secretary according read the following letter:

KANSAS AGENCY, March 4, 1852.

SIR: On the 2d instant I was requested to attend a general council of the chiefs, councillors, and headmen of the Shawnee tribe of Indians, at their usual place of meeting. When assembled, the chiefs made known to me, through the United States interpreter, that it was the wish of the entire tribe to send a delegation to Washington, for the purpose of settling with the Government for whatever balance may be due their tribe, in virtue of a treaty made at Wap-paugh-konnetta, in the State of Ohio, on the 8th day of August, A. D. 1831, and ratified by the Senate of the United States, on the 6th day of April, A. D. 1832.

The chiefs now requested me to draw up an instrument and general power of attorney for them to sign, authorizing their delegates, with the power and authority of the tribe, to make settlement with the United States Government for all balances due said tribe, in virtue of said treaty, and to sign, seal, and deliver to the United States Government, the necessary and proper receipts for whatever received.

Blackhoof, one of the principal chiefs of the tribe, Captain Joseph Parks, Sar-kec-se-moe, another chief, and Spy Buck, a councillor, were duly chosen and appointed as delegates by said general council, to proceed to Washington in discharge of their mission.

That portion of the seventh article of said treaty of August, 1831, which the tribe desire to settle, will be found as follows: "Said fund to be continued during the pleasure of Congress, unless the chiefs of the said tribe or band, by and with the consent of their people in general council assembled, should desire that the fund thus to be created should be dissolved and paid over to them; in which case the President shall cause the same to be paid, if in his discretion, he shall believe the happiness and prosperity of said tribe would be promoted thereby." It is agreed in this general council assembled, that the sum of money found to be due in virtue of said treaty, when received, shall be for the use and benefit of the entire Shawnee tribe.

In giving an opinion, as agent for this tribe of Indians, with regard to the beneficial use to be made by the Shawnees of this fund, I take great pleasure in stating, that the Shawnees are advancing more extensively in the moral and other useful employments and business than any of the tribes of this agency, or any of the adjoining ones. The chiefs stated to me that the object in getting possession of this fund due them is mainly to build for their tribe a good saw and grist-mill—the one heretofore built by the Government for them having long since gone to decay and ruin. They also wish to build for the tribe a comfortable council-house; the balance, if any, will be paid over to the tribes, for the purpose of enabling them to pay their debts, improve their houses, and enlarge their farms.

I cannot do otherwise than give it as my opinion that the money, when received, will be expended by them judiciously, by a very large majority of the tribe, if not the whole of them.

Thus believing, knowing well their wishes and condition, I hope the President may, according to the unanimous wish of the tribe, direct that the funds referred to be paid over to the delegates sent, as provided by said treaty of 1831, believing the Shawnee people will be benefited thereby, as I have great confidence in their general prudence and management of the things pertaining to their melioration as a people.

The delegates sent are personally known to me; they are among the most influential and respectable, moral, and discreet men of the tribe. Blackhoof and Sar-kec-se-moe are chiefs of great influence; Spy Buck is an influential councillor; Captain Joseph Parks is too well known at the Department to require indorsement from me. They all well deserve the kind notice and attention of the Indian Department, and I bespeak for them early action in the business which takes them to the seat of Government.

The chiefs of the Shawnee tribe request me to say to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that in the event the delegates should not succeed in receiving from the Government the funds now expected by the treaty of 1831, they wish the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to furnish the delegates a sufficient sum of money, out of the annuity due them for 1852, as they will defray their expenses, incurred by them in going to and returning from Washington, and any receipts given by them, shall be good and valid to the United States, against their tribe for the sum advanced out of the said annuity of 1852. Most respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS MOSELEY, Jr.,
United States Indian Agent.

Colonel D. D. MITCHELL,
Superintendent Indian Affairs, St. Louis, Missouri.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, I called for the reading of the letter, that there might be some distinct ground upon which to base some of the remarks which I propose to make on this subject. I find a general disposition among the members of the Senate to vote this claim. I repeat what I said a moment ago, that if it should be the pleasure of the Senate to be generous to this tribe, I should not be pertinacious in my objection, particularly since the associations which some of our honored members and distinguished friends have brought to our notice, however defective the claim may be as a question of right. I had the letter read for the purpose of showing to the Senate that this delegation came here to prosecute no such claim as that now presented. It is a remarkable fact in the history of its progress, although I will not undertake to say it never existed heretofore, yet the presumption is very fair, that it has been set up since the delegation arrived in this city. At all events, I have heard it said that until 1844 or 1846, no such claim was ever thought of against the Government. Now, all at once, since this delegation has arrived here, has this new claim ripened into such truth, and discovered to be founded upon such strong reasons of justice, as well as of generosity, that I find honorable Senators—even those who are most watchful upon occasions of this kind—ready to give their assent to an absolute appropriation of this large amount of money.

The proposition of the honorable Senator from Arkansas proposes to refer the question of the liability of this Government for this claim, to the opinion of the Attorney General. I have great confidence in the opinion of the Attorney General, and doubt not that if he were to give the question a thorough investigation, he would arrive at a correct conclusion, and do justice both to the Shawnees and the Government of the United States. But I am at a loss to conceive why, in such a case as the present, it is necessary to refer the decision of such a question to any officer of the Government. I do not see the necessity of making any provisional legislation upon the subject, unless we are first satisfied that there is some ground to suppose that the claim is well-founded.

I should like to know from the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] who is more intimately acquainted than I am, from his reading and long experience with the Indians, and has more knowledge of the history of the various tribes that inhabit the western frontier, whether his historical recollection or knowledge have never led him to trace the former connection of these Shawnees living in Missouri, at the time the treaty of 1825 was made, and those that lived in Ohio at the same time. When were they separated? Were they not a part of the same original tribe of Indians? They bear the same name. They are a kindred people. When did they become separated?

Mr. CASS. If the honorable Senator wishes me to answer the question, I would say that I do not know when they were separated. It is a long while back, before I knew anything about them. It is a most common occurrence in Indian history for tribes to separate. I suppose this tribe must have separated sixty or seventy years ago. They have been separated during the last forty years, during which time I have known them.

Mr. BELL. My information is that these Indians of Ohio, of whose sagacity the honorable Senator has spoken so eloquently—when they found that they were to be swept from the country which they occupied on this side of the Mississippi—when they found that the powerful people who had settled the Atlantic slope would never give them rest while they were within any territory which they could lay claim to, particularly after the Revolution, in which the independence of the United States was won—they all went west of the Mississippi together. They petitioned the Spanish Government for the privilege of establishing themselves on the right bank of the Mississippi. The Baron de Carondelet made a grant to them, which has been alluded to in the debate, to hold the tract of territory near Cape Girardeau. But the grant was made to them in the usual way under which the Indians held lands of the Spanish Government, which is the same as our own, providing specifically, that when they thought proper to remove, their lands should revert to the Government, and be public property. This grant of the Baron de Carondelet to the Shawnee Indians, was made in 1793, I believe. All the Shawnees went there, except, perhaps, a few stragglers. I know that there were some on the Tennessee river remaining. That is the narrative which I have had of it. I have understood that they all remained in Missouri till 1805, or until some later period, when this Ohio band returned and established themselves north of the Ohio.

Mr. CASS. Will the Senator allow me to observe, that his information on the subject is not warranted by the historical facts. These Indians were on the Maumee in 1794, and a treaty was made with them in 1795. A portion of these very Indians were then in that same region.

Mr. BELL. I know that in 1794 and 1795, a part of this tribe were with the Creeks and Cherokees on the Tennessee river; and they were some of the most formidable enemies that the settlers on the Tennessee and Cumberland rivers had to contend with, and a portion of them may still have remained in Ohio. But, at whatever period they settled on the right bank of the Mississippi, under this grant, my information is, that those bands that remained in Ohio, and were treated with in 1831, were a part of the same tribe which resided in Missouri. At what precise period what are called the Ohio Shawnees returned from the west to the east of the Mississippi, I do not know; but it seems to be certain that they did return and settle the Ohio, and then they got possession of the lands which they ceded to us by the treaty of 1831. This explanation is necessary in order to understand the treaty of 1825. I can assure the honorable Senator from Kentucky, that he is mistaken in regard to there being any separate right of the Shawnees of Missouri to these fifty miles square. The article of the treaty of 1825, by which we obtained the cession from the Shawnees, is in these words:

"It is further agreed by the contracting parties, that in consideration of the cession aforesaid, the United States do hereby agree to give to the Shawnee tribe of Indians, within the State of Missouri, for themselves, and for those of the same nation now residing in Ohio, who may hereafter emigrate to the west of the Mississippi."

Then it was given to the very people who originally constituted part of the band who held the twenty-five miles square in the neighborhood of Cape Girardeau. This tract of fifty miles square west of the State of Missouri, was intended as a provision for the Missouri Indians, and for those who had separated from them many years before and settled in Ohio. Those Ohio Indians were a part of the very tribe to whom the twenty-five miles square of land were ceded by the Spanish Government.

Again, sir, it became the policy of this Government, and it was acted upon in several treaties prior to 1825, to collect all the scattered bands and tribes of Indians residing in any part of the States, or within the organized Territories of the United States, and place them upon territory without the organized boundaries of the States and Territories. That was the policy pursued, I know, in the Creek and Cherokee treaties of 1817 and 1819. We have a right to presume, from our knowledge of the then policy of the Government, that the treaty of 1825 was made with the view of providing a home for the Shawnee Indians who were in Ohio when they should cede their lands in that State. This is an additional argument to show, that the provision in the treaty of 1825, requiring the Missouri Shawnees to admit their brethren of Ohio to share with them a part of the fifty miles square ceded by the Government in that treaty, was made in pursuance of an original right and claim of the Ohio Shawnees in the grant of the Spanish Government, to be admitted to enjoy a part of the fifty miles square. It was further necessary to make this provision, to carry out the policy of the Government, to collect all these bands together, get them out of the States as rapidly as possible, and concentrate them upon some separate Indian territory, where they could be free from the molestations of the whites, and could govern themselves according to their ancient usages. I presume the honorable Senator from Michigan has no knowledge of the history of this tribe that will contradict that statement of mine with regard to their being originally of the same band.

The twenty-five miles square were ceded by the Spanish Government to the entire Shawnee tribe including those that afterwards removed to Ohio. It was with those that removed to Missouri that the treaty of 1825 was made. Under that treaty the Missouri Shawnees ceded the twenty-five miles square, equal to 625,000 acres of land, which had been ceded by the Spanish Government. Honorable Senators have said that there was no consideration given by this Government to the Ohio Shawnees for their Ohio lands, ceded by the treaty of 1831, in which it was provided that the Shawnees of Ohio should have 100,000 acres of land out of the fifty miles square given to the Shawnees of Missouri by the treaty of 1825. They have said that the 100,000 acres of land had already been ceded by the treaty of 1825, and that the Government of the United States had nothing to give—that it was a fraud, on the part of the Government, on the Indians in Ohio. Now, let us see what they did give by the treaty of 1825 to the Indians of Ohio, as well as the Indians of Missouri. The twenty-five miles square which the Shawnees of Missouri then held in the neighborhood of Cape Girardeau, they gave up for fifty miles square, which was ceded by the Government, on the western border of the State of Missouri. The Government gave them four square miles for one—gave them four acres for one. In the neighborhood of Cape Girardeau they held 625,000; and upon the Kansas, under the treaty of 1825, the Government gave them 1,600,000 acres of land, four times the quantity they formerly held. The Government did not only double the amount which might well be supposed to have been quite sufficient for the bands still remaining in Missouri, but having in view the removal of the Ohio band, the Government gave four acres to one—four square miles to one, a tract of fifty miles square.

As some appeal has been made to the generous feelings of the American people and of the Senate upon this subject, I would like Senators to explain to me the value of the fifty miles square given by the Government to the Shawnees upon the Kansas river. I understand that that land is worth, upon an average, $5 per acre to-day, and that two thirds of it is worth $10 an acre. These Shawnees are, at this day, the richest tribe in America, in proportion to their numbers.

I come now to the treaty of 1831. Under the second article of that treaty these Shawnees set up the claim now under consideration for themselves, as the claim was originally understood, and now, it is said, for the whole tribe. That article is in these words:

"In consideration of the cessions stipulated in the foregoing article, the United States agree to cause the said tribe or band of Shawnees, consisting of about four hundred souls, to be removed in a convenient and suitable manner to the western side of the Mississippi river, and will grant by patent in fee-simple to them and their heirs forever, as long as they shall exist as a nation, and remain upon the same, a tract of land to contain 100,000 acres, to be located, under the direction of the President of the United States, within the tract of land equal to fifty miles square, which was granted to the Shawnee Indians of the State of Missouri, by the second article of a treaty made at the city of St. Louis, in said State, with the said Shawnees, of Missouri, by William Clark, superintendent of Indian affairs, on the 7th day of November, in the year 1825; and in which it is provided that the grant aforesaid shall be for the Shawnee tribe of Indians within the State of Missouri, and for those of the same nation now residing in Ohio, who may hereafter emigrate to the west of the Mississippi; but if there should not be a sufficiency of good land unoccupied by the Shawnee Indians, who have already settled on the tract granted, as aforesaid, by the said treaty of St. Louis, then the tract of 100,000 acres, hereby granted to the said Shawnees of Ohio, parties to this compact, shall be located, under the direction of the President of the United States, on lands contiguous to the said Shawnees of Missouri, or on any other unappropriated lands within the district of country designed for the emigrating Indians of the United States."

That shows the policy of the Government. Honorable Senators may inquire why the Government designated 100,000 acres for those Indians? I presume the Indians insisted on it. Why does the treaty go on to provide that if 100,000 acres of good land cannot be found within the fifty miles square, these Indians should be located on good lands, to be designated by the President, contiguous to the fifty miles square; and if not there, at any other place that should be agreed upon? I presume—because we have as much right to make inferences on this side of the question as there is upon the other—that it was because, as the Shawnees of Ohio were ceding about 100,000 acres in the State of Ohio, they wanted to make sure of at least 100,000 acres of good land in the country to which they were invited to remove.

Honorable Senators have said, under this head, that the Government of the United States had not the power to carry into execution this part of the treaty of 1831. What has been the fact in relation to it? The Indians agreed to remove under the treaty of 1831. They did remove. They settled with their brethren of Missouri within this tract of fifty miles square. They have lived since as one tribe—as one band of Indians—as a band of brothers, claiming what? Claiming the whole fifty miles square; and, as you have heard announced by honorable Senators who take the other side of this question, they admit that they have been receiving annuities in common, no distinction being made between the Ohio Shawnees and the Missouri Shawnees—claiming no separate rights or privileges—governed by one council—uniting in the selection of the same delegates—controlling their people as one people, without regard to their former separation, which might have been expected when you refer to the fact that they were originally the same tribe of Indians. We hear of no separation among them—of no division—and they regard themselves as one band.

Honorable Senators say that these Indians have not received the 100,000 acres of land stipulated in the treaty of 1831. I should like to know how that is made out. The 100,000 acres provided to be granted to them under the treaty of 1831, were not held in fee-simple, technically. The Shawnees were not at liberty to hold the land in severalty, as individuals, and sell at their pleasure; but an express provision was made, that they should hold—I may use words which are nearly equivalent, and which mean the same thing—the lands, as Indian lands are generally held under the public law of this country, as long as they continue to occupy them as a nation, or until they agree to sell them to the Government of the United States. The patent proposed to be issued was limited, and was not to extend beyond the Indian tenure,—I mean the tenure by which Indians generally hold land before it is purchased by the United States.

Then honorable Senators say, that the Government has not complied with this contract. Sir, I deny the assertion. The Government has complied with the contract. It has given these Indians not only 100,000 acres of land, but about 900,000 acres, which are held by the same tenure that they held their lands in Ohio, or would have held them if there had been a patent issued to them according to the strict letter of the treaty of 1831.

I very much question, after all that honorable Senators have said in behalf of the Indians who are making this application, that if we should agree to lay off 100,000 acres for them, according to the letter of the treaty of 1831, and explain to their brethren the consequences, the conditions to which they may be bound to comply if we make this grant to them, whether they would not reject it; and why? Because they would get merely 100,000 acres of land, instead of 800,000 or 900,000 acres, which they now hold, for if we are to issue a patent under the terms of the treaty, they will get but 100,000 acres. They will thus have to relinquish about 800,000 or 900,000 acres, which they now hold. Thus, if they separated themselves from the other members of the tribe, and accepted the 100,000 acres, they would be less wealthy than they now are; they would be eight or ninefold less wealthy, when they came to be restricted to a tenancy, by Indian tenure, to 100,000 acres; whereas, they now have at least 800,000 or 900,000 acres.

It will be remembered that a majority of those Indians are composed of the Ohio band; that they hold in common with the others; neither party sets up a separate claim to the fifty miles square, containing 1,600,000 acres; but they hold the land in common. They hold the councils of their government as one band of Indians, without reference to their former temporary separation. They manage their concerns as one government, just as much as the Cherokees, the Creeks, the Chickasaws, or the Choctaws. Hence I say, that if this provision were made, as I understand the grounds on which it is proposed to be made, the Indians belonging to the Ohio band ought to protest against it; for they would be reduced to comparative poverty, relatively to the other portion of the tribe; for I understand that the Missouri Shawnees are only about three or four hundred souls; whereas, the Ohio band has now increased to about five hundred.

Honorable Senators may inquire why seventy cents an acre were reserved in the treaty of 1831. In fact, my honorable friend from Kentucky has undertaken to state that we have never paid the Indians a cent for the lands which they have ceded in the State of Ohio. The honorable Senator cannot have looked into the subject at all, or he would not have made such a statement. Why, I understand that the Government now has, in stocks for these Indians, the amount of $39,000, being the remainder of the proceeds of the sales of their lands in Ohio by the Government, after deducting the expenses of their removal west, and several items provided for them in the treaty of 1831. They have been regularly paid the interest upon that amount; and it seems that the interest upon these lands has been distributed among the whole band; and they have been paid interest from the time of the sale of their lands under the treaty of 1831. That is certainly something.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 6, 1852.

NEW SERIES.....No. 131.

I wish here to make a remark to elucidate the nature of this case, and the history of the claim itself. For the purpose of having these stocks converted and paid to the Shawnees, in solido, according to one of the provisions of the treaty of 1831, this delegation has visited this city; and if we are to judge from the letter of the agent, Mr. Moseley, which has been read to the Senate this morning, they come upon no other mission but this. Instead of having it held in stocks for their benefit, and interest paid to them, they wish us to pay them the whole sum in solido, as it was provided that Congress and the President should have the discretion to do, by the terms of the treaty of 1831.

The amount of seventy cents per acre on the sale of their lands in Ohio was reserved by the treaty of 1831; and Senators may inquire why did the Government of the United States reserve this amount? I have heard gentlemen, conversing upon this subject outside of the Senate Chamber, call it a very hard and rigorous measure to exact from the Shawnees of Ohio any part of the proceeds of the sales of their lands; and they say that we ought in generosity to them, in the exercise of a liberal policy in regard to the Indian tribes, give them the seventy cents an acre which we have reserved. Why, we do not usually deal with the Indian tribes in that way. We generally think it proper for the maintenance of the power of this Government that we should have something remaining after we pay the Indians all that we stipulated to pay them for the usufruct of their lands. We may be presumed to have made some reservation of the proceeds of the sales of these lands in Ohio for the purpose of getting money into the common Treasury for the common purposes of Government, as we proposed to do, and have done, under nine tenths of the treaties we have heretofore made with the Indian tribes.

Those who made the treaty of 1831 may be presumed to have intended to reserve seventy cents an acre in consideration—of what? In consideration of the 100,000 acres we stipulated to give the Shawnees, which they were to hold upon the same tenure, upon the borders of the State of Missouri, by which they held their land in Ohio. We reserved seventy cents an acre out of the proceeds of the sales of their land, and gave them, in fact, 800,000 acres—not of ordinary prairie land, not land of the quality usually found upon the great prairies west of the Mississippi and the Missouri, but upon lands which, I am told by the Senator from Missouri himself, are worth at this day, upon an average, five dollars an acre, and two thirds of them are worth ten dollars an acre. I have not estimated their value, but I presume the lands which these Indians occupy west of Missouri are worth $10,000,000, and that upon a free and unrestricted sale at public auction, they would bring that amount of money. I am told that they comprise some of the richest lands to be found on the continent, and they border immediately upon white settlements. It was in consideration of such a gift as that to these Shawnees that the United States, without any illiberality, may be supposed to have retained seventy cents an acre upon the sale of the Shawnee lands in the State of Ohio. At all events, we see no more reason for supposing that it was made for any other purpose, or to say it was done with a view to appropriate it at some future day to the benefit of this tribe, than we have to take up any of the old treaties and say that we have no right to reserve any moneys from the sale of the lands except to pay the expenses of Indian removal, survey, and bringing the lands into market.

It is somewhat curious how so many gentlemen have been led into what I consider a very great error in relation to this question. It has been stated, in the course of the discussion, that the United States actually issued a patent to the Shawnees of Missouri exclusively for the fifty miles square; and therefore it is concluded by honorable Senators that the Government cannot comply with the treaty of 1831 with the Ohio Indians. Let us see whether this is the fact; and if it were a fact, no officer of this Government had, by law, any authority to issue such a patent; because the treaty of 1825 does not authorize it. Let me advert to the patent which issued, in order to see whether there is not some mistake as to the fact. The patent contains this clause:

"Now, know ye that the United States of America, in consideration of the premises, and in execution of the agreement and stipulations in the aforesaid articles of convention, have given, and by these presents do give, unto the said Shawnee tribe of Indians, who were within the State of Missouri, and who are designated in the aforesaid second article of the convention, 'for themselves, and for those of the same nation who were residing in Ohio, and who are also referred to in said second article of the agreement and convention made and concluded at Wapah-Kanetta, in the county of Allen, and State of Ohio, on the 8th day of August, in the year of our Lord, 1831.'"

This patent, on which some gentlemen rely to show that we ought to pay this money on the ground that the land has been patented to the Shawnees of Missouri, shows on its very face that there was a reservation made for the benefit of the Ohio Shawnees. It is a most singular fact, that no authority ever existed to issue such a patent. I have read a portion of the patent for the purpose of showing that it reserves the rights of the Shawnees of Ohio, and for the purpose of showing that this thing called a patent in the treaty of 1831, and the like of which was issued in 1844 to the Shawnees of Missouri, was only given to content them. It was a sham; it was a pretext. They thought they would be more secure under it than they were under the stipulations of the treaty. But it gave them no other rights and no other privileges than those which they had under the treaty. It was expressly reserved in the patent, that they should only hold the land as long as they continued to reside upon it as a nation, and that they should sell only to the United States. But the treaty of 1825, under which the patent purports to have been issued, never had a stipulation for the issuing of a patent in any form. The patent stipulated in the treaty of 1831, gives no other, or better, or higher title than the treaty provided had no patent been stipulated.

It is a little singular that this claim comes supported by the decision of the Department of the Interior, the head of which is a gentleman of distinguished talent, character, and standing in every way. I attribute the errors into which he has fallen, to the vast amount of business that he is charged with, to which he has to give his attention and examination, connected with the various branches of business in his Department—Indian affairs, public lands, &c. I think we shall find out from this the ground upon which many gentlemen have been misled. This is the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitted to Congress, with the recommendation that this claim should be allowed. It is right that the claimants should have the benefit of this recommendation; but still it is proper to investigate a little the statements which he makes in that opinion. He states:

"There is no evidence, historical or otherwise, going to show that this tribe was, until this time, associated in any manner with the 'Shawnees of Ohio,' who, as a separate and distinct tribe, were dwelling upon lands of their own in a distant region."

I might as well allude here to what is said by Captain Parks, whom the Senator from Michigan so well knows, and who seems to be a responsible gentleman, one whom I respect. He is a gallant and noble chief. With a portion of his warriors, he was in a campaign in Florida, and acted most gallantly, and I would have no objection to do anything that is proper for him. He says that the Shawnees of Ohio did once form part of the Shawnees settled in Missouri, under a concession of the Spanish Government, but that they became discontented, and separated and settled afterwards in Ohio.

This broad statement of the Secretary of the Interior goes back to the origin of the tribe. The honorable Senator from Michigan did not deny that originally they all belonged to the same tribe. He supposes that the Shawnees of Missouri separated from the body of the tribe in Ohio, whereas the fact appears to be that all went to the west of the Mississippi for a while, except some straggling individuals. The Secretary continues:

"One of the stipulations of the treaty of 1825, was, that the land in question should be conveyed by patent in fee-simple, to the Missouri Shawnees."

Sir, there is no such stipulation, and you can easily see how the Secretary misled himself when he assumed such premise, because it was impossible for him, with such an assumption, not to come to an erroneous conclusion. He goes on:

"This provision was complied with on the 11th May, 1844, when a patent was issued to them, following the conditions of the treaty. It conveyed the fifty miles square of land on the Kansas, to the Shawnees of Missouri, for themselves and 'those of the same nation' who were residing in Ohio, subject to the right secured to the Ohio band of Shawnees; which right, as will appear hereafter, was only a right of occupancy, no consideration passing from them. They were at that time living in the State of Ohio, on lands owned by them in their own exclusive right."

What does he mean by that? He assumes that it was only the right of occupancy that was given to the Indians of Ohio. What other right was given to the Shawnees of Missouri by the treaty of 1825? Nothing more. They are to retain possession as long as they reside as a nation, and they can only sell to the United States. But there is another misapprehension here. "They [meaning the Shawnees of Ohio] were at that time living in the State of Ohio on lands owned by them, in their own exclusive right." What does the Secretary mean? Does he mean that they held no fee-simple according to the usual sense of the word? I presume he did not. The fact is, that this Ohio band held their lands in Ohio as other Indians hold their land. They were to occupy and enjoy it until they sold to the United States. But the Secretary continues:

"On the 8th August, 1831, the United States executed a treaty with the 'Shawnees of Ohio,' by which they agreed to grant to this tribe 'by patent, in fee-simple, to them and their heirs forever, as long as they shall exist as a nation and remain upon the same, a tract of land to contain 100,000 acres within the tract of land, equal to fifty miles square,' which as above-mentioned had been before granted to the Shawnees of Missouri, for and in consideration of the cession of 'all the lands owned or claimed' by them in the State of Ohio."

I suppose the honorable Secretary must have supposed that the patent in fee-simple issued in 1844 to the Shawnees of Missouri, was without limitation, and that the grantees might hold in severalty and sell to whom they please; but there is no pretext for it, for he repeats the limitation himself: "As long as they shall exist as a nation and remain upon the same." And if he had looked at the third article of the treaty he would have found that they were prohibited from selling but to the United States, and were to continue under their protection as usual. There is not the slightest difference between holding under such a patent as this and holding under the common and general Indian tenure established by the policy of the Government. Let us go a little further. I will not read the whole of the argument of the Secretary, but only those parts where he seems to have misconceived the case entirely:

"The Shawnees of Ohio now claim that this amount should be returned to them, or invested for their use, or else that the United States should fulfill its solemn stipulation to convey to them, in fee-simple, 100,000 acres of land within the fifty miles square already granted to the Shawnees of Missouri. The latter, it is clear, cannot be done. The United States has already issued a patent for that land, and have thereby parted with their title."

It is singular that such premises could be assumed by an examining officer of his distinction, and talent, and responsibility. It can only be accounted for, as I have stated before, on the ground of the immense business to which his attention must be called every day of his official existence.

Here he assumes that the whole fifty miles square has been patented to the Shawnees of Missouri exclusively, leaving out of view the express provision for the Ohio Shawnees in the treaty of 1825; and therefore it follows that you cannot make this grant to the Shawnees of Ohio. But when you come to look into the patent to which he refers, this very claim in favor of the Ohio Shawnees is recited, and the patent was issued, subject to the claim of the Shawnees of Ohio.

Furthermore, the argument is made more absurd when you come to consider that the patent did not give them any other or better title than that enjoyed under the stipulation of the treaty itself, which was, that as long as they continued to exist as a nation, they should be permitted to hold the land, and no longer; and that they should sell to none but to the Government of the United States; not only the patent, but the stipulations of the treaty of 1831, which provided for the patent, provides that it shall extend no further than that. That was the delusion under which the Secretary labored. Here I may notice the argument of the Secretary of the Interior, in which he states that the patent cannot be granted to the Ohio Indians, because the whole of the land was granted to the Shawnees of Missouri. In that patent, as I said before, the claim of the Shawnees of Ohio was reserved, and the patent was granted to the Shawnees of Missouri, subject to the claim of the Shawnees of Ohio.

The Secretary proceeds:

"The United States have not fulfilled their part of the contract."

I have already referred to this. They have not, in terms; they have not granted them a title, by patent, or otherwise, to a separate 100,000 acres within the limits of the fifty miles square; but they have granted to them 800,000 acres instead of 100,000, and by an equally valuable and valid title; and where their brethren of Missouri have received them as a portion of their own tribe, they pretended to set up no exclusive claim to the fifty miles square. I heard the argument urged by a gentleman the other day, either in the Senate or out of it, upon this subject, that the Shawnees of Missouri could drive the Shawnees of Ohio from this land; that the latter had no property—no home there. Sir, the treaties of 1825 and 1831 give them a home. They have a home in pursuance of the provisions of those treaties. The Shawnees of Missouri received the Ohio Indians into their bosoms, and acknowledged them as part of their own people, entitled to live upon the same lands, and hold the same rights in them. These Ohio Indians are a majority; and if majorities are to rule there, as with us, they govern the country—they are the masters, if they choose to act upon any idea of a separate existence as a nation; and instead of being expelled themselves, they have the physical power, as they are superior in numbers, to expel the Shawnees of Missouri. But in fact, the title to this fifty miles square belongs in common to the whole tribe—those who lived in Ohio at the time of the treaty of 1831, and those who lived in Missouri. That is the way I answer the Secretary's assertion that the United States have not fulfilled their part of the compact. They have given to the Ohio Shawnees 800,000 acres instead of 100,000, to hold by a title equally as good as by a patent.

Let any gentleman, if he thinks proper, propose that the Government shall give them a patent for the 100,000 acres upon the relinquishment of their interest in the fifty miles square. We would make 700,000 acres by the exercise of this, literally, and they would lose it. I would not propose such a thing.

The Secretary proceeds:

"The mere fact that the Shawnees of Missouri permit those of Ohio to occupy their lands, cannot, it seems to me, release this Government."

"Permit them!" How does he feel authorized to use such a word? They had as much right as the Shawnees of Missouri by the very terms of the treaty of 1825; and the country fifty miles square was not given to the Shawnees of Missouri alone; for, in the same sentence it is provided, that when the Shawnees of Ohio think proper to emigrate to their brethren in Missouri, the grant shall be to them, as well as to the Missouri Shawnees. Talk of permission! They have as much right under the treaty stipulation—they have as much right in law, by the treaty and justice, to the occupancy and to the enjoyment of the 1,600,000 acres, as the Shawnees of Missouri have. They have just as high a title. It is to be regarded so literally; for the grant was to both branches of the tribe.

The Secretary proceeds:

"The Missouri Shawnees may at any time cede these lands to the Government. To do this, the assent of the Ohio Shawnees would not be asked, and is not required, and they are liable to be driven from their homes without any legal mode of protecting themselves."

On what principle, or upon what authority, can such an assertion be maintained? We have made the grant to the Ohio Shawnees, as well as to the Missouri Shawnees; and now to maintain that the latter hold the power of ceding the whole of that territory, would be a direct violation of the right of the Ohio Shawnees, secured not only under the treaty of 1831, but under that of 1825 also. The Ohio Shawnees have no right to protect themselves! They have no rights there! They can be driven off by the Missouri Shawnees! Let me repeat again, under what title do the Missouri Shawnees claim? Under the second article of the treaty of 1825, which grants the fifty miles square to them and to the Shawnees of Ohio, when they shall settle among them—one having equally as good a right to enjoy it as the other. The Shawnees of Ohio were a part of the original band. It is said they did not accept that. But under the treaty of 1831 they have agreed to accept it, and have acquiesced in it for twenty years.

As far as I remember now, I do not think this claim has ever been set up until this year—at all events not until 1844. I am amazed that such mistakes as these were made by the examining officer; they, I presume, emanated from the Indian office, but the Secretary of the Interior has given the sanction of his name to them, and of his opinion upon them; but as I have shown, I think upon a totally mistaken view of the real facts in the case.

If I am right in the grounds I have taken, there is not the shadow of a foundation of a claim for this appropriation to the Shawnees of Ohio. They have eight times the amount of land they claim under the treaty of 1831. All that gentlemen can hinge the propriety of this appropriation upon, is, that they have a right to the separate enjoyment of 100,000 acres. I am willing to propose it to them. I am willing to negotiate with them, and propose that the Shawnees of Ohio should have the exclusive use of 100,000 acres, and their brethren of Missouri the remainder. It is all a good country—said to be the finest tract of its size to be found west of the Mississippi. Do you suppose they would accept it? Not at all.

I have thought it necessary to go into this examination of the subject, because other honorable Senators have taken an entirely different view of the question from that which I have, and, as I think, some of them not understanding the true state of the facts in the case.

Mr. ATCHISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan was entirely mistaken as to my being restless under his historical sketch, or what he called vindicating the truth of history. Sir, I listened to him with more than ordinary interest; but he made one remark to which I deem it my duty especially to reply. My intercourse, whether social or political, with the Indian tribes has been very limited, although I have spent more than half of my life in their immediate neighborhood. But, sir, I will say that no squaw ever had occasion to laugh at me. Now, can the honorable Senator from Michigan say as much for himself? [Laughter.] There was a point referred to as relating to the truth of history which I do not think touches this case at all. I do not deem it material to inquire when the Shawnees settled in the State of Missouri.

The original grant, as stated by the Senator from Tennessee, from the Baron de Carondelet, was dated in 1793. I have before me a petition which I wish to read:

"To the President of the United States:

"The petition of Louis Laramie, in the name and behalf of the Shawnee and Delaware Indians, settled within the territory of Louisiana, respectfully sheweth:

"That the said Indians, when they first repaired to this side of the river Mississippi, had obtained from the Baron de Carondelet, the Governor of Louisiana, the permission to occupy any part of the vacant domain between the Missouri and the Arkansas rivers, for them to hunt, plant, sow, raise cattle, and make such improvements as might be necessary or useful for the subsistence of their actual or subsequent population, with the assurance of being maintained and protected in the peaceful and undisturbed possession of the same; that, in consequence, and by virtue of that privilege, they had made choice of that tract of country, then uninhabited and unappropriated, which lay between the river Cape St. Come and Cape Girardeau, bounded on the east by the Mississippi, and westwardly by a small river called White river."

The date of the grant was, I believe, January 4th, 1793. Then I have here a petition from the Shawnee chiefs of the Missouri band signed by

"The White Bird," "The Flute," "The Fire," and "The Speaker," in which they say:

"We, the undersigned chiefs and headmen of the Shawnee and Delaware tribes of Indians, residing on the west side of the Mississippi river, after having held consultation in common council, determined to address you on the subject of our concern, and represent the facts on which they are predicated.

"About the year 1788 the Shawnee and Delaware tribes, whom we represent, were invited by the officers of the Spanish Government in the upper part of their colony of Louisiana, to remove and settle on the west side of the Mississippi. This measure was consented to, and we went to reside at, first, near to St. Louis. The protection which we afforded to the Spanish settlements against the frequent incursions of the Osage nation, was, doubtless, the policy of the Spanish Government in soliciting us to settle in their country. We were offered by them a district of country on the Mississippi, wherever we might think proper to select it, between the mouth of the Missouri and Arkansas rivers. No permanent settlements were, however, made by us until about 1797, when two of our principal men, having obtained a recommendation from the Spanish officers in the upper country, went with it to the Governor and Intendant at New Orleans. In the spring following, they returned with a concession from the Spanish Government to the Shawnee and Delaware Indians for all the tract of country within the following boundaries," &c.

This does not show the exact year this band of the Shawnees settled in the State of Missouri, but it shows us that they were invited to settle there in 1788; that in 1793 they obtained the grant; and that in 1797 they were actually upon the land. I was told the other morning, in the presence of the Senator from Tennessee, by Captain Parks, one of the chiefs of the Shawnees, who is now here, that after General Wayne had defeated the Indians in 1794, the great bulk of the Shawnee nation started to leave their homes in the Northwest to go beyond the Mississippi river, to take protection under another Government; but that a portion of the Shawnees—I suppose this Ohio band—returned and settled upon the Auglaize. I do not recollect whether he said what became of them; but my understanding of the matter was, that after the defeat of the Indians by Wayne—

Mr. BELL. The whole tribe went west.

Mr. ATCHISON. After Wayne defeated the Indians, this portion of the Shawnee nation went and settled west of the Mississippi, under an invitation which they had received from the Spanish Government prior to that, in 1788; but I do not see that this has any bearing upon the question at all.

Mr. BELL. I would state to the Senator that I made use of the argument as to the historical fact for the purpose of answering the position that the Ohio Shawnees had nothing to do with the treaty of 1825, and could have no interest in it. My object was to show that they were originally one and the same tribe.

Mr. ATCHISON. I was coming to that point. The Senate will see from the able argument of the Senator from Tennessee, that there is very great doubt and difficulty in the settlement of this question. But the close of his argument was, I think, decidedly against himself. He says that by the terms of the treaty of 1825 with the Missouri Shawnees, the United States stipulated that the Ohio Shawnees should hold this fifty miles square in common with the Missouri Shawnees. Well, if that be the case, then one undivided moiety of fifty miles square belonged to the Shawnees of Ohio. I differ with him as to that construction of the treaty. But admitting that to be the construction, what consideration did the United States give them for their lands ceded by the treaty of 1831? Why, 100,000 acres of their own land, to be located within this fifty miles square, and instead of giving them one undivided moiety, or an equal interest in the fifty miles square, they are cut down to the 100,000 acres of their own lands, according to the argument made by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, if I understood him aright. This being the case, the Ohio Shawnees have never received any consideration, except the five per cent. upon the $39,000 which they have received up to this time.

Mr. BELL. Will the honorable Senator allow me to say that I did not make such an argument as that. I did not say that though it belonged to the Ohio tribe of Indians, it was given for the common benefit. The fifty miles square was laid off under the treaty of 1825, by the Shawnees of Missouri, with the stipulation that the Shawnees of Ohio might occupy the land in common with them, when they should think proper to emigrate. The United States then entered into no stipulations with the Ohio Indians to compel them either to remove or accept or not accept. But the stipulation of the treaty of 1825 was in furtherance of the policy of the Government, that when it did treat with the Ohio Indians for their removal to the western frontier, they might have a home provided for them by the treaty of 1825, to which they might remove.

Mr. ATCHISON. The treaty of 1831 involves this question in further difficulty. The treaty of 1825 is recited in the latter treaty; and the Shawnees then—admitting that they had common sense, and knew what they were about—knew that they were taking their own lands if that was the case. It is not a fair presumption to suppose that they did not understand what they were about. As I stated to the Senate on a former occasion, if this were a transaction between white man and white man I would, without hesitation, say that I should not give them the consideration which they ask. But it was a treaty entered into on behalf of the Government of the United States by men of talent and ability, with a parcel of ignorant Shawnee Indians, for they were so at that time.

Now, a further difficulty presents itself as to who shall have this money; and that is the true difficulty, if we agree to give it. But I think that difficulty is obviated by the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Arkansas. He proposes, that if the Senate should agree with the House of Representatives in retaining this appropriation, it shall be qualified; and that this money shall be paid to the Shawnee nation, now residing on the tract of fifty miles square—the Missouri Shawnees and Ohio Shawnees in common; that the Missouri Shawnees shall agree, together with the Ohio Shawnees, that they will accept this in common; and that the Ohio Shawnees shall release all claim against the Government, under the treaty of 1831, for the 100,000 acres. That is fair, and I presume they would accede to it. If you make this appropriation, as it stands at present in the bill, it would be so much money thrown away; and both these bands of Indians would have a right to come upon the Government and claim additional appropriations—the Missouri Shawnees claiming $33,000, and the Ohio Shawnees claiming $33,000. Suppose you should now give all this money to the Ohio Shawnees, the Missouri Shawnees would turn round and say to them, "You have no right to settle on this land; you have not paid us a cent for our land; it is our land under the treaty of 1825." They would give it that construction beyond all question; and thus a difficulty would arise between these two bands of Shawnees, and this Government would have to settle that difficulty out of the Treasury of the United States. I am for settling it now, once for all. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will do this.

I am perfectly willing to strike out of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, the clause proposing the reference to the Attorney General. I am willing to close the business now, upon the terms and conditions proposed in that amendment; or I am willing to refer the matter to the opinion of the Attorney General, as to the right against this Government. I am willing to accept the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, as a substitute for the section which the Committee on Finance proposed to strike out. I would accept it, provided the Senate would strike out the reference to the Attorney General, and leave the appropriation to be made at once, and absolutely to be disposed of, as provided by his amendment.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. President, as I view this question, it is a very plain one. I concur fully with the honorable Senator from Tennessee, that if this is put upon the score of right, these Indians have no claim whatever. In 1831, the Shawnees of Ohio sold their lands in Ohio. What were they to receive for those lands? I will read from that treaty, and draw some deductions from it. The treaty provides:

"The United States will expose to public sale, to the highest bidder, in the manner of selling the public lands, the tracts of land herein ceded by the said Shawnees. And after deducting from the proceeds of such sales the sum of seventy cents per acre, exclusive of the cost of surveying, the cost of the grist-mill, saw-mill, and blacksmith's shop, and the aforesaid sum of $13,000, to be advanced in lieu of improvements; and it is agreed that any balance which may remain of the avails of the lands, after sale as aforesaid, shall constitute a fund for the future necessities of said tribe, parties to this compact, on which the United States agree to pay to the chiefs, for the use and general benefit of their people, annually, five per centum on the amount of said balances as an annuity. Said fund to be continued during the pleasure of Congress, unless the chiefs of said tribe or band, by and with the consent of their people in general council assembled, should desire that the fund thus to be created should be dissolved and paid over to them; in which case, the President shall cause the same to be so paid, if, in his discretion, he shall believe the happiness and prosperity of said tribe would be promoted thereby."

The Government has kept to itself seventy cents per acre from the sale of these lands, and it is out of the balance remaining that the fund here spoken of is to be held by the United States, and paid over to the Indians whenever they require it; and it is that very fund, according to the papers which have been read, that the chiefs have come on here to settle. The claim for which the appropriation is proposed in the bill as it came from the House, is of an entirely different character. The chiefs came here asking the Government to pay them in gross the fund reserved by the article of the treaty which I have read. This proposition is to appropriate to them the seventy cents an acre which the Government reserved from the sales of their lands.

What was the Government to pay these Indians? It will be perceived that the Government was to expose the lands for sale as other public lands, and therefore they were not to be sold for less than $1 25 an acre. Out of the proceeds of the sales, the Government reserved seventy cents. The balance, fifty-five cents an acre, was to be paid to the Indians in annuities and certain other ways. Now, do they claim that there is one farthing of the fifty-five cents an acre which is unpaid? Not at all. That has all been disposed of. They do not pretend that one farthing of the fifty-five cents has not been paid. What else do they complain of? They were to have 100,000 acres of land in the State of Missouri, which land I was to be embraced within the fifty miles square which was conveyed by the Government under the treaty of 1825 to the Shawnees of Missouri. Do they complain that they have not received those 100,000 acres? The chiefs who are here have not come for any such purpose. They do not make any such complaint. The subject on which they come is of altogether a different character.

What does the tract of fifty miles square granted to the Shawnees amount to? It amounts to 1,600,000 acres. These Ohio Shawnees constitute the majority of the whole tribe of Shawnees, and therefore they get more than half of the 1,600,000 acres of land. They get at least 800,000 acres, if not more, instead of the 100,000 which we agreed to grant them. Now, is it not perfectly clear that they have received the fifty-five cents an acre? They have received not only 100,000 acres west of the Missouri, but 800,000 acres of land.

On what ground, then, is this claim based? Why, sir, it must be upon the score of benevolence and generosity. The fifty-five cents an acre has been paid. There is no complaint on that head. We have given them not only 100,000 acres, but 800,000 acres, and they are in the enjoyment of it. There is nothing left, therefore, which can possibly be complained of, but this one thing: that the fifty-five cents an acre which was reserved in the hands of the Government, is not yet finally settled, for the chiefs have come on to obtain a settlement of that amount. They do not desire that it shall remain a fund in the hands of the Government, for the use of the Indians, but they desire that the fund be paid over to them now in gross. That is the object for which they have come here. But this claim is of an entirely different character.

This claim, if I understand it, is for the amount received from the sale of their lands in Ohio. In other words, it is a proposition to appropriate to these Indians the aggregate of seventy cents an acre, which was reserved by the Government, in lieu of—what? In lieu of the 100,000 acres in Missouri, which, it is said, they never got. Why, this is a most astonishing case! They never got the 100,000 acres! Why, sir, where are they living? They are living on the 1,600,000 acres set apart for the whole tribe, and they, being a majority of the whole tribe, enjoy their full share; and yet complaint is made that we have not given them 100,000 acres! It is said they must have the seventy cents per acre which was reserved by the Government in the treaty. Why, we have paid under this treaty fifty-five cents an acre to the Indians. Have we ever paid so much before? Why, less than eleven and a half cents an acre was paid for the great Menomonee cession, and about the same amount for the Sioux cession, which was not long since ratified; and that was clamored against as being too high.

I can see no foundation whatever for this claim. If it is for the seventy cents an acre in lieu of the 100,000 acres which they were to have west of the Missouri, why do they not ask us to comply with the treaty, and give them 100,000 acres? Ah, sir, they are not such fools as to do that. They know if they cut off 100,000 acres for themselves what will be the result. It will be that the Missouri Shawnees will have 1,500,000 acres to their 100,000. They are not so inensible to their own interests as to give up the half of 1,600,000 acres, and receive instead of it 100,000 acres, leaving to the Missouri Shawnees 1,500,000. I can see no foundation for the claim whatever on any principle of construction which can be applied to the treaty.

The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas proposes that the appropriation shall be made on condition that the Attorney General, on investigation, shall be satisfied that the claim is just. I have a very high regard for the opinion of the Attorney General when I know that he investigates a subject, and I presume that when a subject was referred to his opinion by Congress, he would investigate it. But I do not see any necessity for any reference. Besides, I am opposed to the policy of making appropriations to depend on the opinion of the Attorney General. If his opinion is necessary, let us have it to guide us before we legislate, and not afterwards.

The recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior in favor of this claim carries to me no weight. He really seems never to investigate a subject. He goes at random; and very frequently, when his recommendations are here, the most superficial examination discloses that they are utterly erroneous. It seems that no dependence whatever can be placed on his recommendation. Then, if these Indians have got their fifty-five cents an acre, as the treaty provided they should have, if they have got not only 100,000 acres, but 800,000, I cannot see for my life what further claim they can have.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Wisconsin is entirely wrong on this subject. The matter is exceedingly plain, and lies in a nut-shell. The Cape Girardeau Indians owned a tract of land, and sold it to the United States in 1825. In consideration of it, the United States gave them a tract of fifty miles square, west of the Arkansas. In the treaty of 1825, at the request of the Indians, there was this provision made, that the Ohio Indians from time to time, when they chose to emigrate, might go there. Some years afterwards the United States go into Ohio, where there were small tracts reserved and occupied by the Shawnees, the Delawares, and the Wyandots. In process of time these reservations became valuable. In 1831 the United States wanted the Indians to go west. We made arrangements with these Indians in Ohio to go west; and we provided to give them 100,000 acres out of the tract which had been before granted to their brethren in that country. Out of that tract of fifty miles square they were to receive a patent for 100,000 acres of land. Now, I want to know what right had we to change the terms of the original treaty? If they were to go there at all in a body, (which the treaty never contemplated,) they had an equal right to the whole; whereas we say in the treaty that we will give them 100,000 acres. As I said before, they were entitled to the land without our patent; and yet gentlemen talk about their having a part of these fifty miles square. Gentlemen talk about the value of the land on which the Indians have settled. What good is that value to them? They cannot sell it except to the United States, so that it does not make any difference to them whether the land be worth one dollar or a million of dollars. Whatever may be the price, it makes no difference to them, for they hold it just as other Indians hold land, with the right to occupy and not to sell to any one but to the Government of the United States. As I said before, the United States have furnished one tract of land, and they got a consideration for two. That is just the whole point of the case, and that is all there is about it.

Mr. WALKER. I will take it upon the ground of the Senator from Michigan. He says the treaty was made with the Shawnees of Missouri in 1825; and that, in lieu of the twenty-five miles square near Cape Girardeau, they were given fifty miles square in another place. Does not the Senator bear in mind that that was not given to them absolutely, as Missouri Shawnees? Does he not bear in mind that there was an express reservation made in that treaty that the Ohio Shawnees might settle on that fifty miles square?

The next point of the Senator is, that a patent has been issued to the Shawnees of Missouri. Does he lose sight of the fact that the patent reserves the portion of the Ohio Shawnees in pursuance of the stipulations of the treaty? He cannot forget that. But put it upon his own ground; suppose that the treaty with the Shawnees of Missouri had not been observed, and we had treated with each band separately, the Government, having in view the Ohio Indians, would have deducted what was intended for the Ohio Indians, and would have given to the Missouri Indians so much less of course. The Government saw proper to appropriate a gross aggregate amount for the Missouri Indians, including the Ohio Indians; and I cannot see the difference between giving it jointly to them, or giving it to them separately, if they should demand it. But they did not demand it; and all that they ask is what was reserved in the treaty, that the fund which the Government holds for their benefit should be paid over to them in gross.

Again, sir, what would a separate treaty with these two tribes give them upon the principles deduced from this treaty? It is just what I have before stated. It would leave the Shawnee Indians of Missouri with 1,500,000 acres, and there would be 100,000 acres left for the Shawnees of Ohio. In place of doing that, we have given them 1,600,000 acres jointly, the 100,000 acres being included in the 1,600,000 acres ceded by the treaty of 1825.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the manner in which my friend from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has supposed that I misunderstand this whole matter, has induced me to rise for the purpose of trespassing on the patience of the Senate a very short time. My attention was directed to the subject by the remarks made the other day by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. ARCHISON.] I subsequently had a conversation with him and became enlisted in the subject, and therefore I ventured to make a few remarks; for doing which I have received the castigation of my friend from Tennessee, who supposes that I have totally misunderstood the whole subject. I know, sir, that it is sometimes dangerous to enter into a matter which one has not studied thoroughly, and if I had thought that the conversation which I had with my friend from Missouri would have led me into the collision which has taken place between myself and the gentleman from Tennessee, perhaps I should have used the "better part" of "discretion" and not entered at all into this controversy. But being in it, I wish to maintain the position which I have assumed, and I think correctly assumed, and to show that my friend from Tennessee has brought into this discussion a number of matters which I humbly conceive have nothing in the world to do with it.

He says, for example, that this Ohio band was originally a part of the same tribe that settled upon the Missouri, and that they returned back to Ohio. What of that? Suppose they were originally the same tribe, has not the Government by these treaties made contracts with them, and made bargains with them as a separate tribe and band of Indians? Surely it has.

Here is the treaty with the Missouri band; here is the treaty with the Ohio band. Does it become my friend from Tennessee to say, that because these Indians were once united, the Government could not make these separate treaties with the different bands? That is nothing to the purpose. They must receive the construction which all other treaties and contracts receive, and must have the same force as though they were made entirely with different nations. Surely that cannot be denied. Therefore, granting the position which he assumes, that they originally belonged to the same tribe, I conceive that their separation and their having been treated with by the Government as separate tribes, presents them precisely as though they had never been united.

Again, he says that this land upon the Kansas which they have got is the most valuable land perhaps which any tribe owns—that it is worth $5 or $10 per acre. What has the value of the land which they have received to do with the question? How does the value operate upon the contract?

Mr. BELL. I was speaking on the principle of gratuity, upon which ground some who favor the appropriation place it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman says we ought not to make a donation, I agree with him; but we are treating with contracts now, for a treaty is nothing but a contract between nations, or between quasi nations such as we regard the Indian tribes, and is like a contract between two individuals; and the same principles apply to the one as to the other. The value of the country, therefore, has nothing to do with the case except in this point of view. If the country is worth $5 or $10 an acre, and we, by treaty stipulation with these Indians, have promised to give them in fee-simple, as I will show you directly, 100,000 acres of this valuable territory now worth $500,000, or $1,000,000, we get off remarkably cheap if we pay only $66,000. In the construction of the treaty, the value has nothing to do with it. In the fulfillment of the contract on the damages to which the Indians may be entitled for our violation of it, it might have a great deal to do with it. In that point of view, if the gentleman from Tennessee is right in saying that the country is worth $5 or $10 an acre, we have got off very well, if we can satisfy their claim to 100,000 acres of this valuable land by paying only $66,000.

My friend from Tennessee has commented upon the opinions of the Secretary of the Interior. I shall not attempt to vindicate those opinions; nor shall I go further into these irrelevant matters, which, as I conceive, have been brought into this debate without having anything to do with the real matters involved. The gist of this whole controversy lies, as I think, in a nut-shell; and it does seem to me if Senators would only examine the treaty, they would not hesitate a moment about it. What does the first treaty of 1825 say? It says that the Missouri Indians shall have fifty miles square of land, in consideration of their twenty-five miles upon the Missouri river. My friend comments upon the difference of their having got four acres to one. What has that to do with it? If they get one hundred to one, and it is the bargain, it has nothing to do with it. We have disposed now of the question of value. We have disposed of the question of quantity in the same way. If they got four times as much, and have got it by a fair bargain, they are entitled to it, and the difference in quantity has nothing to do with the question. They got these fifty miles square for the twenty-five miles near Cape Girardeau, and they got it with a stipulation. And what is that stipulation? That if their brethren in Ohio should choose to go and live with them they might do so. When the treaty of 1831 was made, what was the condition of these Indians? They had the fifty miles square. They had besides the whole country in Ohio. Can any one deny that? After they remained in that condition for six or seven years, having fifty miles square and the Ohio lands, we made a treaty with them; and what did we say in that treaty? We said this:

"In consideration of the cessions stipulated in the foregoing article, the United States agree to cause the said tribe or band of Shawnees, consisting of about four hundred souls—"

My friend puts stress upon the number of these Indians, to show that they got a great deal of property for such a small tribe. What has that to do with the question?

Mr. BELL. I did not refer to it with any such view. I hope the gentleman does not mean to be offensive?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. BELL. I referred to their numbers to show that, being four hundred, they were a majority of the whole tribe, and hence enjoyed the right to use over a half of the 1,600,000 acres.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The number of the Indians, it seems to me, has nothing to do with the construction of the treaty. Whether they be few or many, the principle by which the rights of parties are to be settled should be justice. The stipulation of the treaty to which I refer is in these words:

"The United States agree to cause the said tribe or band of Shawnees, consisting of about four hundred souls, to be removed, in a convenient and suitable manner, to the western side of the Mississippi river, and will grant by patent, in fee simple, to them and their heirs forever, as long as they shall exist as a nation, and remain upon the same, a tract of land to contain 100,000 acres, to be located, under the direction of the President of the United States, within the tract of land equal to fifty miles square, which was granted to the Shawnee Indians of the State of Missouri."

Let us look at that. Here is a stipulation in express terms that the United States will grant 100,000 acres, in fee-simple, as long as these people remain as a nation, and live upon it, out of the fifty miles square which had been set apart for the other Indians. What is the meaning of granting to those four hundred souls 100,000 acres in fee-simple? Is it not that they shall have the exclusive use of those 100,000 acres? Are other persons to go in and enjoy a portion of them? Why, sir, the thing is preposterous. It is a direct stipulation that they shall have the exclusive use, and nobody else is to have any use of these 100,000 acres. Now, I ask the Senator, had the United States a right to carve, out of these fifty miles square, 100,000 acres, and say to the Ohio Indians: "You shall have the exclusive use of them, and you shall exclude the Missouri Indians who had acquired a right to that fifty miles square seven years before?" The thing is utterly preposterous. In what condition, then, do you present yourselves? You have, by the first treaty with the Missouri Indians, said: "You shall settle anywhere and everywhere, according to your regulations, upon the whole fifty miles square." You have then said, by the second treaty with the Ohio Indians: "We will give you the exclusive use of 100,000 acres of land within the fifty miles square." I say there is an inconsistency which cannot be possibly reconciled; the two treaties cannot stand together; you cannot give the Ohio Indians the exclusive use, in fee-simple, of 100,000 acres of this land which the other tribe have a right to settle upon, and use in common, if you please, with the Ohio tribe. Sir, language, discussion, argument, cannot make the thing plainer than the two treaties, when you compare the one with the other. It is palpable; no man can gainsay it.

This treaty, then, goes on and states, that if there is not good land enough to set apart these 100,000 acres, in fee-simple, for the exclusive use of the Ohio tribe, within the fifty miles square, then it is to be laid off adjoining those fifty miles. Have they ever got it in the fifty miles square for their exclusive use?—or have they got it adjoining for their exclusive use? Why, sir, the paper presented here as the patent upon the Kansas, given by Mr. Tyler, shows that they did not get it within the fifty miles square for their exclusive use. There is no pretense that they got it adjoining. They have never got it at all, then, for their exclusive use, according to the treaty of 1831. They have never received it. What have they received? Just what the Senators from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] and Tennessee [Mr. BELL] said they had got—the right in common with the Missouri Shawnees to go and settle upon the fifty miles square. That is all they have received. What did they stipulate for in the treaty of 1831? Did they stipulate for the right in common to settle upon the fifty miles square? That they had under the treaty of 1825. That provision had been made for them by the Missouri band. The treaty of 1825 expressly says, that the Ohio Indians may go and settle and enjoy it, in common with them. Did that satisfy the Ohio tribe? No, sir. They said, when they parted with their lands, "We shall have 100,000 acres, in fee-simple, to ourselves." That is the meaning of the treaty. Have they got it? There is no pretense that they have; and here the Senators from Tennessee and Wisconsin are satisfying this stipulation in the treaty of 1831, which guarantees these Indians 100,000 acres to themselves for their own use, in fee-simple, as long as they occupy it by a privilege to occupy in common, according to the stipulation of the treaty of 1825, with the Missouri Indians.

There is the whole case. Any one who will look at the two treaties will see it. Then the question is, what damages are to be paid? Sir, if you stipulate that I shall have a patent for a thousand acres of land for me and my heirs to live upon as long as any of us are in existence, is not that a much more valuable privilege than to say that I shall have a thousand or two thousand, or ten thousand acres, in common with my friends from Tennessee and Wisconsin? Everybody can see the difference, if you make it an individual case; and here is that individual case carried out precisely in these treaties. The treaty of 1831 says that the Ohio band shall have 100,000 acres in fee-simple, for their use, and not in common with the other tribe.

Mr. WALKER. Just at this point, will the Senator allow me to ask him this question: Can he show me when the Ohio Shawnees have ever complained to this Government, or to anybody else, that they have not had 100,000 acres set off to them separately? And if he cannot show that, who is it that has got up this argument, and who is it that is urging it? Not the Indians.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have already stated how I happened to get into this fight. [Laughter.] I got into it by a conversation with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Archison.] I heard him here the other day, belaboring this question. [Laughter.] I paid some attention to it, and happened to ask him a question about the matter, in connection with his speech. He explained it, and I afterwards had a conversation with him. I am now asked by my friend from Wisconsin, who filed the declaration? I have not looked into that matter. The first I heard of it was in the way I tell you.

Mr. WALKER. You are no party to the cause at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose, though, that somebody has been authorized to act; and I suppose, from the letter which my friend from Michigan has had read to-day, that the Indians are making the complaint that they have not received justice under these treaties.

Mr. WALKER. That is not what the Indians are here complaining of. They are here to get the Government to pay over the reserved fund in gross, which is out of the fifty-five cents, and not out of the seventy cents reserved by the Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator ought to ask the Committee on Indian Affairs or the Finance Committee, whichever presented it, why this amendment was proposed.

Mr. WALKER. It came in the bill from the House.

Mr. CASS. The question is whether it is just.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It comes before this body by the action of the appropriate committee, and because I am discussing the treaties upon which the whole right depends, the Senator wants to evade the question of the right growing out of the treaties, by going off into an inquiry as to how the thing came here; like a judge, instead of settling a case according to the right, when called upon to adjudicate it, wanting to know who brought the suit and how the parties come before him. Now I have nothing to do with that, and I come back to what I was at.

Here are the facts. Here are the stipulations, which I have shown the Government has not complied with. Then, if the country be half as valuable as the Senator from Tennessee says it is, if you get off by paying $66,000, when you stipulated to give a fee-simple title for 100,000 acres worth $5 or $10 an acre, you will do very well and make a remarkably good bargain. These treaties present themselves to my mind in the way I have shown you. Nobody can refuse to see it. It is just so. The Government has not complied with its stipulations. Was it an unmeaning stipulation that the Government made with the Ohio Indians in 1831, when it said:

"We will give you in these fifty miles square, or adjoining them, 100,000 acres of land in fee-simple as long as you or any of you live as a nation?"

Did that mean nothing? According to the construction which the Senators from Tennessee and Wisconsin put upon it it is absolutely without meaning, because they make it say they have got that already. "You have got 800,000 acres instead of 100,000;" that is the answer they give. They have got 800,000 acres, whereas they were promised, specifically, 100,000 exclusively for their own use. Why, sir, their construction makes this stipulation in the treaty of 1831 an unmeaning sentence, without effect, having no operation upon the minds of the Ohio Indians. I am disposed, as it has been inserted in this contract, to say that it means something; that it was intended to mean something; that it should have some effect. We see that those Indians have had no benefit from it yet; and I see no way of giving them the benefit, except by the provision in this bill.

Mr. BELL. Why not propose to patent 100,000 acres to them in the fifty miles square?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend says why not propose to patent the 100,000 acres to them out of the fifty miles square? For the most obvious reason in the world. What would these Indians say if you sent Government officers there to tell them "We will lay off 100,000 acres for the exclusive use of the Ohio band?" They would rise up, as one man, and say, by the treaty of 1825, "I have the right to settle anywhere on that land; I have a right to use that land, and you are now going to take it away from me, and give it to the exclusive use of these Ohio Indians, and exclude me from the use of it."

Mr. BELL. Could we not, with the consent of the Shawnees of Missouri, give 100,000 acres to the Ohio Shawnees, out of the fifty miles square, upon condition that the latter should release all claim to the 1,500,000 remaining?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly, these people can make a new contract. Nobody denies that.

Mr. BELL. I want the gentleman to carry out his argument. My argument was, that they have 800,000 acres, holding by the same tenure in common as long as they exist as a nation, instead of the 100,000. But, says the Senator, you stipulated to give the Ohio Indians 100,000 for their separate use and occupation; they do not claim any of the fifty miles square, they claim only the 100,000 acres, and they had a stipulation to enjoy it themselves as long as they continued a separate nation. Now, if the Senator wishes rigidly to carry out our contract, I merely wanted, by asking this question, to show him that he can do it, by proposing in this amendment that the Government be authorized to patent to them, according to the terms of the treaty of 1831, 100,000 acres of these 1,600,000, with the assent of the Shawnees of Missouri, treated with in 1825, the Ohio portion of the tribe agreeing to relinquish all their claim to the 1,500,000 remaining. What objection is there to that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. None in the world, if the Indians would agree to it; but would they do so?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator says certainly.

Mr. BELL. I mean the Missouri Shawnees; the others would not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can say that if I were stipulating I would not agree to any such thing, if it were my case instead of the Indians. Why, the Ohio Indians could say, "We have everything that you propose to give us in the fifty miles square already; we have the right, by the treaty of 1825, to settle and enjoy that anywhere, and, in addition to that, your obligation that we shall have 100,000 acres more to ourselves."

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to ask the gentleman another question at this point, for I would like to have my mind satisfied about it. I am not a stranger to this subject, for I have heard a great deal said about it by my friend from Missouri. I wish to ask whether it would be to the advantage of the Ohio Indians to take exclusively, and in severalty, the 100,000 acres, or to take their share of the 1,600,000 acres as tenants in common? As a question of law, if they had the power to elect, would they take in severalty the 100,000 acres or not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would be to their advantage to take the right to use in common the whole fifty miles square, and then to have separately and exclusively 100,000 acres to themselves.

Mr. BUTLER. But if they were to take one or the other, which would they take?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are entitled by these treaties to both; and the idea that they are to be limited to one or the other is the point upon which my friend from South Carolina is in error.

Mr. BUTLER. It may be so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, to prove that the stipulation of the treaty of 1825 is, that they shall have the right to use in common the fifty miles square, let us look at the treaty. If my friend will look at it, he will find that they have expressly, by that treaty, the right to settle and to use in common the fifty miles square. It is a stipulation on the part of the Missouri Indians that they shall have that right; and the Government conceded it. And then, in addition to that, in the treaty of 1831, seven years afterwards, the Government said to these Ohio Indians, "we will secure to you 100,000 acres."

Mr. WALKER. In the same tract.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the same tract, certainly; but they were to have the exclusive right to 100,000 acres. They were to have the title to it in fee-simple. Does that exclude them from the right under the treaty of 1825?

Upon what principle can you show that they have no right to occupy the fifty miles square in common with the Missouri Indians, and that they have not also a right to the 100,000 acres? If the 100,000 acres were laid off, they had the same right that they had before, and they have, by this additional treaty, a stipulation on the part of the Government that they shall have 100,000 acres to themselves, and yet you are limiting the proper construction of this treaty—you are depriving an ignorant band of Indians of privileges, immunities, and rights which are granted to them by treaty stipulation; and this you have no right to do. That is the very foundation of the claim.

I will not detain the Senate longer. I have got into this matter in the way I have stated. I have looked into the treaties for the purpose of trying to understand them; and that I have stated the true construction of both treaties in all their bearings, it seems to me cannot be doubted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. NORRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CASS. Did I understand the honorable Senator from Arkansas to withdraw that portion of his amendment requiring the reference of the question to the Attorney General?

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I understand it now to be the sentiment of the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs that they are willing to withdraw that reference. I therefore modify the amendment so as to strike out that provision.

Mr. BELL. That makes the grant absolute. It makes the appropriation of $66,000 unconditional.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. It leaves the appropriation absolute for payment of $66,000 on the conditions contained in the proviso.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to have the amendment read as it now stands.

The amendment was accordingly read, as follows:

Strike out all after the words "$66,246 23," and insert: "To be paid to the whole nation of Shawnees residing upon the Kansas per capita, but upon the following conditions: First, that the Shawnees shall, by some valid act of the national authorities, be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, agree to receive said money in common. Second, that they will hold in common, as one nation, the lands assigned by the treaty of 1825. Third, that all claim of the Ohio Shawnees to the exclusive grant of 100,000 acres, under the treaty of 1831, be forever released."

Mr. BORLAND. I understand that the practical effect of this amendment will be to pay to these Indians the whole amount of money for which we have sold the lands which were originally ceded by them in Ohio. We are to pay that amount to them in money, in addition to their right of occupancy and possession of 1,600,000 acres of land west of the State of Missouri. This is a subject with which I am not at all familiar. I do not know the point upon which I am called to vote, and I therefore ask if that is the practical operation of the amendment.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I will say to my colleague that the first question is upon the amendment which I have offered, and then the main question will arise on the motion of the Committee on Finance to strike out the whole clause, and that will raise the subject of the title. The proposition now is only to amend the appropriation as far as the disposition of the land is concerned. But my amendment provides for the appropriation per capita for the whole nation; that they may enjoy the land in common; that the Ohio band of Shawnees shall release their claim to the exclusive right of occupancy of 100,000 acres of land.

Mr. BORLAND. That explains the matter. It answers my question in the affirmative. I wished to understand the effect of the whole provision before I voted upon any amendment to it. It is then, as my colleague has stated, a provision under which we are to pay the whole amount of money for which we have sold the 100,000 acres of land in Ohio. The proposition is to pay the Shawnees in money that amount, in addition to their right of common tenancy of 1,600,000 acres which they have west of the Mississippi.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Seventy cents an acre upon the proceeds of the sale of their lands in Ohio were reserved by the Government as a consideration for giving them 100,000 acres west of the State of Missouri. Seventy cents per acre was not the whole amount for which the lands were sold. The residue was reserved, and has been partly paid to them. The rest has been invested for their benefit. Some of it was paid for saw-mills, some for grist-mills, and some for other purposes, and a portion of it was invested in five per cent. annuities, which have been paid annually by the Government of the United States to them. But there were seventy cents per acre reserved in the treaty, as in several other treaties made with the bands in Ohio, as a consideration for the lands ceded to them west of the Mississippi. They say that that consideration has failed, and they therefore ask to have refunded to them seventy cents per acre on the sales of their lands in Ohio—making the amount of $66,000—that being the consideration for which they agreed to receive the 100,000 acres in the west.

Mr. BORLAND. I must confess, that the more I hear the case explained, the more difficult it is for me to understand it. I understand that we originally obtained from these Indians 100,000 acres of land in Ohio.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not so much as that.

Mr. BELL. It was upwards of 90,000 acres—amounting almost to 100,000.

Mr. BORLAND. In consideration of their removal from those lands in Ohio, how much did we pay them? Will my colleague be kind enough to tell me?

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I have some statistics here which I will present to the Senate. At the date of the treaty of 1831, the Wapaghkonetta band was in possession, in the State of Ohio, of 92,800 acres of land. They ceded those lands to the Government of the United States, and took in exchange 100,000 acres west of the State of Missouri. Their lands were to be put up and sold as other lands of the United States—not by private entry, as the Senator from Wisconsin seemed to suppose, but they were to be exposed to public sale as other lands, of course at the minimum price of $1.25 per acre. We agreed, in the first place, to reserve to ourselves seventy cents an acre as a consideration for the land assigned to them west of the State of Missouri; and then for the overplus, we became the trustee, and were to disburse it for their benefit. Out of this overplus we advanced $6,000 to enable them to remove; we subsisted them for twelve months; we paid the expense of erecting a saw-mill and grist-mill, and blacksmith-shop on their new land, and, then, after deducting the seventy cents an acre, reserved as a consideration for the lands assigned them west, and after deducting the other expenses incurred for their benefits, it was supposed that there would still be a surplus from the sale of their lands. That surplus was invested, in pursuance of the terms of the treaty, in five per cent. annuities, which the Shawnees have been receiving ever since.

To proceed further with this case: The Government proposed to assign them the 100,000 acres west, and proposed by an article of the treaty to give them a patent for it. They went and occupied the lands on the ground assigned by the treaty of 1825, to the Missouri Shawnees. The Government has never complied with its stipulation to assign to the Ohio Shawnees 100,000 acres exclusively for their own use. They were not able to do it; they are not able to do it to-day; and they never can be able to comply with this stipulation unless they purchase 100,000 acres from the Missouri Shawnees. They occupy the land in common—a privilege reserved to them by the Missouri Shawnees, in the treaty of 1825, which contained a stipulation that such of the Shawnees as resided in Ohio as should emigrate to the country assigned them west, should have the privilege of occupying it in common. They possessed this right under the treaty of 1825; they had this privilege at the time the treaty of 1831 was formed. It was a privilege accorded to them and acquired by them under the treaty of 1825. They had it at the date of the treaty of 1831, which gave them, in addition to the right in common, the exclusive right to 100,000 acres.

Now, if my colleague will allow me to transgress the privilege of merely answering his question, I will take this occasion to answer one argument of the Senator from Wisconsin. Under the letter of the treaty of 1831, the Shawnees of Ohio have a right to a grant from the United States, by patent, of the 100,000 acres which they stipulated for themselves in the treaty of 1831. The ground upon which the argument against the whole of this claim is based, is, that by the treaty of 1825 we have actually done better for them and have secured them a more liberal provision than was given by the treaty of 1831. Unfortunately for the other side, this argument proves entirely too much. It proves just what the Senator from Kentucky said would be the result. It places the Indians in the attitude of surrendering to the United States by the treaty of 1831, seventy cents an acre in lieu of a provision which was only one eighth as favorable to them as that which they had under the treaty of 1831. It must be presumed that they acted with common sense and intelligence in making the provisions of this treaty. Would they have surrendered that provision to make one less liberal in its character if they understood it, as has been contended for by the gentleman from Tennessee? They had, under the provisions of the treaty of 1825, the right of common occupancy in the cession made by that treaty, and the right of incorporation with the old Shawnees without surrendering their land in Ohio. Now, I would ask the Senator from Wisconsin, what have the Ohio Shawnees ever received for the seventy cents an acre reserved by the Government of the United States from the sales of the lands ceded by the treaty of 1831? Why he says they have received the right to the occupancy of 1,600,000 acres. I tell the Senator they had that before they ceded their lands in Ohio.

Mr. WALKER. They got fifty-five cents an acre.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The fifty-five cents an acre was from the sale of their own lands, and it was their own money. They had a right to the common occupancy of the 1,600,000 acres, under the treaty of 1825. They had it without the treaty of 1831—by a title independent of that treaty. We must suppose, if the gentleman's argument be true, that they sacrificed that right for which the Missouri Shawnees had paid a consideration, and ceded away, as a mere gratuity, seventy cents an acre on the lands ceded by the treaty of 1831. The lands in Ohio they owned independent of that treaty, and they had this right of incorporating themselves with the western Shawnees independent of the treaty of 1831. They could have gone there and occupied those lands under the treaty of 1825, and occupied and reserved to themselves thereafter the lands ceded by the treaty of 1831.

There is some light thrown upon the treaty of 1831 by the history of other treaties made at the same time; and I wish Senators to bear in mind that the main features of all these treaties were marked out in pursuance of an act of Congress passed in 1830, to authorize the Department to exchange the lands of the Ohio Indians for lands west of the Mississippi.

The whole policy of the law was based upon the idea of "exchange;" and in pursuance of it, a commissioner was sent out who made all these treaties. He found the Shawnees in possession of 92,830 acres, and by treaty he obtained a cession of this quantity, and gave them in exchange 100,000 acres west of the Mississippi. So the Ottawas were found in possession of 28,000 acres, and they received 34,000 acres. The Delawares had 39,800 acres of reservation, and they received in exchange 60,000 acres. The Senecas of Sandusky, another band of the same family of tribes, owned 40,000 acres, and took in exchange 67,000 acres. I need not go through all these Indian treaties. It will be seen, however, from these which I have mentioned, that they went on the idea of "exchange." It was called in the treaties, and called in the law which authorized those treaties to be made, an exchange of lands. The reservation of seventy cents an acre is a feature common to all these treaties; showing that the reservation of that amount to the Treasury of the United States was the consideration which they paid for the lands given to them in the West.

Three of these treaties give lands immediately outside of this grant; and then you come to this treaty which assigned to the Ohio Shawnees lands inside the grant; a grant which it was solemnly provided by treaty should be given exclusively to the Missouri Shawnees, subject, however, to the right of straggling emigrants incorporating themselves with the nation.

Then for what purpose were these 100,000 acres granted? Gentlemen say, in lieu of the right of common occupancy under the treaty of 1825. If so, then they would have been in a better condition if they had not made the treaty of 1831, for independently of the treaty of 1831, they had a right, under the treaty of 1825, to the common occupancy of the fifty miles square, and they were entitled to a consideration for their cession of 92,800 acres in Ohio. That is a plain statement of the case. I am obliged to my colleague for his courtesy in allowing me to trespass on his patience so long, and I surrender the floor to him.

Mr. BORLAND resumed the floor; but without making any remarks gave way at the solicitation of Senators.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 5, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order, is the further consideration of House bill No. 146, to regulate the fees of clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States.

Mr. McLANAHAN. At this late period of the session I will not occupy more of the time of the House than I deem necessary to a brief explanation of the provisions of this bill. To devise a plan for the fair and just taxation of costs in the Federal courts of the United States, is a task of no ordinary difficulty. Nor is it pretended that the present bill fully attains this desirable object; but I feel no hesitation in asserting that its adoption will tend to the amelioration of the condition of our judicial expenses, and cannot fail to meet the approbation of every intelligent man. That there is a necessity which demands the action of Congress on this subject, must be abundantly manifest to any one who has given it the least attention. When we consider that the judicial expenses of this Government have increased within the last fifty years at the rate of about one thousand two hundred and fifty per cent., and that within the last ten years of this period, the expense of the judiciary have nearly doubled in amount, as the guardians of the Treasury of the people, it is our duty to inquire into the causes of this immense accumulation in the expenses of our Federal courts, and, if possible, to apply a remedy. And, sir, when, in addition to this, you calculate the amount that is annually expended by suitors in these courts, the sum swells to millions, which is drawn from the pockets of the people for the establishment of a system, which, while it pretends to administer speedily, also pretends to administer cheap justice. Well, indeed, might one now adopt the quaint language of Lord Bacon, when he said "these pollers and exactors of fees do justify the common resemblance of the courts of justice to the bush, whereunto, while the sheep flies for defense in weather, he is seen to lose part of his fleece, before he escapeth therefrom."

Let me call the attention of the House to two of the judicial districts only. In the northern district of New York, in the year ending December, 1830, the money advanced to the marshal by the Government was $3,500; in the year ending December, 1841, it was $10,000; in 1845, $17,298 32; in 1846, $31,595 36; in 1847, $36,372 49; and so on, until 1851 it reached the enormous sum of $43,975, paid to the marshal of the northern district of New York for the expenses of the United States courts—more than twelve times as great as the judicial expenses of the same district twenty years before.

In the district of Massachusetts the Government advanced to the marshal in 1830, $9,586 13; in 1842, $27,000; in 1851, $92,728. So that the expenses now, in that district, are about ten times as great as they were twenty years ago, and nearly four times as great as ten years ago. Now, notwithstanding the acknowledged increase in the population, the trade, the wealth, and general prosperity of the country, there is no one who will deny that the expenses of our courts of justice are out of all proportion. Rapid as has been our advance in all the elements of national greatness, the increase of judicial expenses has outstripped it. Increase of population is one of the methods by which we are enabled to estimate national prosperity; and yet I tell you that, although in respect to population, reality in this country has far exceeded the wildest estimates of imagination, although our population has increased since the year 1800 at the rate of 333 per cent.; yet in the same period the increase of judicial expenses to be paid by the Government has been at the rate of 1,237 per cent. This is out of all proportion, and demands, at the hands of the representatives of the people, retrenchment and reform.

Mr. Speaker, a fee bill is necessarily a subject of dull and dry detail. It would be idle to attempt to render it more interesting by any efforts of the fancy. As well might one decorate the brow of a skeleton with a diadem as to attempt to grace this subject with tropes or figures of rhetoric. I shall therefore content myself by presenting to the House some of the evils proposed to be remedied, with a brief and explicit statement of the general provisions of the bill now under consideration.

I have alluded to the increase in our judicial expenses, in a very general way. Allow me to turn the attention of the House to a few of the special abuses under the present laws, for the taxation of costs. Fees in the Federal courts are taxed, in most of the States, mainly under the provisions of the act of 28th February, 1799. It regulates to some extent, the fees of marshals—the fees of attorneys in admiralty cases only—with a per diem of $5 for attending court, and an annual salary of $200. It allows clerks a per diem of $5 for attending court, and the same compensation allowed by the statutes of the States respectively to the clerks of their supreme courts, with one third added thereto. And for all services not specially provided for, the attorneys and marshals are allowed the same compensation allowed by the State statutes respectively for such services to attorneys and sheriffs. The compensation of the officers of the United States courts, then, to a great extent, depend upon the fees allowed under the State fee bills. There are no two States in which the fee bills are similar, and it therefore necessarily follows that the compensation for the same services is different in each of the States. And so great is this inequality, that I will have but little difficulty in convincing the House of its palpable injustice. In those States in which no fee bills exist, the only compensation that can be procured, under the decision of the Attorney General of the United States, for services rendered, is the annual salary and the per diem; whilst, as I will presently show, in other States a liberal compensation is allowed by the State fee bills. Whether in civil or criminal proceedings, the compensation of an officer of the court in the State of New York would, under the present system, be more than 200 per cent. above the sum allowed for similar services in most of the Western or Middle States. In Virginia the compensation to an attorney for services in the criminal court under the 5th section of the act of Congress of 1799, is discretionary with the court; whilst in Pennsylvania the only fee is $6; and in some of the States $5. In Virginia the charge is $20 for drawing an indictment, and the trial fee allowed by the court is from $50 to $500. There is not another State in the Union, except New York and Louisiana, where the attorney's fee in criminal cases, is anything like as large as in Virginia. In many of the States it is below $10; and in few, if any, above $25.

In New York, in the year 1849, in the case of the United States vs. Leonard Dyer, under the provisions of the act of Congress of 1841, and the statute of New York of 1840, the district attorney in a prosecution for perjury, so construed the law, that he charged the Government $246 12½, and his account was certified by the judge; whilst under the New York statute, by which alone he was authorized to charge, his fee would not have amounted to the one fortieth part of that sum.

I call attention to the following extract from a letter dated 26th of November, 1851, from the First Comptroller to the Secretary of the Interior, in which he discusses certain malpractices in the State of New York:

"First, as to the State of New York.—At the time of the adoption by Congress of the fee bill of 1799, the State had a fee bill for attorneys in civil causes in the supreme court, one for counsellors, and another for attorneys in criminal business, and other bills for solicitors and counsel in chancery, all allowing item fees. The civil fee bill allowed attorneys and counsel also a retaining fee in each cause, provided counsel was actually employed; but prohibited the same man from receiving fees in two capacities, both as attorney and counsel, in the same cause. The criminal fee bill did not allow any retaining fee, nor any counsel fees. Both bills allowed a folio compensation for drawing all writs, pleadings, and other papers and proceedings in the progress of a cause; also a folio compensation for every copy made, or supposed to have been made, or necessary, and a fee for trial, for each motion, or other service. The civil fee bill, however, gave the highest compensation throughout, in addition to the retaining fee.

"The civil fee bill being the highest, was adopted for criminal as well as civil business, by the district attorneys in the Federal courts. The fee bill of attorneys for both civil and criminal suits remained substantially the same from about the year 1790 until 1840, when a new fee bill was made for civil causes only, the criminal fee bill remaining nearly the same to this day.

"The civil fee bill of 1840 for the first time provides that the same man may take fees in the double capacity of attorney and counsel in the same cause or proceedings; but in civil causes only. It abolished all folio fees for drawing and copies of writs, pleadings, and other papers and proceedings, and substituted a specific fee for each one; for instance, instead of allowing twenty-five cents for one hundred words for drawing pleadings, and twelve and a half cents per folio for each copy, it allowed $2 50 for drawing a declaration, and $1 25 for each copy, &c. The charges and abuses in the State courts under the law of 1840, allowing double fees as attorneys and counsel to the same person, were so great that the whole bill and system of charging fees in small items, for attorneys, solicitors, and counsel, was abolished February 12, 1848, and a few general items substituted in their place.

"Under the act of Congress of 1841, and the State law of 1840, the district attorneys have charged for many years past, and still charge in criminal, as well as in civil suits, both attorneys' and counsel's fees; where the bill of 1840 allows the largest compensation for any service as an attorney, the charge is usually made under that bill; but when the old law allowed the largest compensation for an item of service, the charge is usually made under it. For example, in the bill hereafter referred to, of the United States vs. Leonard Dyer, Mr. Hall charged for drawing the indictment, two hundred and forty-five folios, $61 25 for engrossing, and for copy $61 25, and for fair copy for the grand jury $30 62½; in all, $152 12½, though the State civil bill of 1840 allowed but $2 50 for drawing, and $1 25 for each copy, making, in all, $6 25. And in the prosecution vs. Anthony Faulac, Mr. Shepherd, the late district attorney, charged at February term, 1849, for drawing the indictment, two hundred folios, $50, for engrossing and copy $50, and copy for grand jury $25; making in all $125, for which the law of 1840 allowed but $6 25.

"They have entirely disregarded the act of Congress of 1842, which confines them, in criminal causes, to the criminal fee bill of the State, and allows no retaining fees, and no counsel, and no trial or term fees for attending to try a cause, unless it is actually tried; and both Mr. Shepherd and Mr. Hall have charged a retaining fee as attorney and counsel also, and even a warrant of attorney, at each term of the court. In the case against A. Faulac, the papers sent to this office show that Mr. Shepherd charged a retaining fee as attorney, three dollars; as counsel five dollars, and for warrant of attorney thirty-seven and a half cents, at each of three terms; in all, for each term $8 37½; that Mr. Hall made similar charges for the same amount at each of nine terms; that Mr. Shepherd and Mr. Hall each charged for April term, 1849, making in all charged for retaining fees and warrants of attorney, the sum of $100 50. The fees for brief, attorney's fees, and counsel fees attending, prepared for trial, was also repeated twelve times, at eleven terms, amounting to $108. In many other causes, the retaining fees are charged from two to eight times in a cause. In fact, it seems to be a general practice to charge them, and also the nine dollar trial fee, and for many other mere constructive services, at each term of the court. And in the case of N. C. Marsellis, Mr. Shepherd and Mr. Hall charged retaining fees, though the cause had been tried and the defendant was convicted before either of them came into office, and nothing remained to be done except to sentence the prisoner.

"Though the act of Congress of 1842 is prospective in its operation, and plainly requires them to charge their fees under the State fee bill in force when a service is rendered, yet they have paid no attention to the repeal in 1848 of the old fee bill in civil causes, and the substitution of a much lower one in its place, but have continued to charge as heretofore stated. The system of charging is illustrated by the following abstracts of bills of costs."

Here, then, sir, you have $152 12½ charged against the United States in a cause where the attorney, concerned, under the statute of the State by which he was bound to make out his bill against the United States, was only entitled to $6 25.

In the prosecution against Anthony Faulac for perjury, Mr. Shepherd, the district attorney of New York, in 1849, as will be seen by the statement which follows, charged the gross sum of $237 12½; and Mr. Hall, his successor, charged in the same case for his services $280 50—making in all $517 62½ attorneys' fees in this one case. I call the attention of the House to the following items which constitute these bills:

Mr. Shepherd and Mr. Hall both charged for the April term, 1849—the former $29, and the latter $25 75.

In the case of the United States against Dyer the whole compensation of the attorney, as I have stated before, was $246 12½. In the case of the United States vs. Edward Walford, charged with voluntarily seizing upon a vessel engaged in the slave trade, the fees of the attorney were $267 50, whilst under the State fee bill he would not have been entitled to more than one fourth that sum, if so much as that. In this case there are no less than six retaining fees charged, of $8 37½ each—one for each term of the court—amounting to $50 25. There are no less than five fees charged, one at each term, for a brief and preparation for trial—$9 each—amounting to $45. A motion for trial and a motion to postpone, at each term, from $3 to $6, amounting to $24. The last item in this bill was a motion to enter a "nolle prosequi," and thus terminated the cause. It cost the United States $267 50 attorneys' fees to ascertain that there was no cause of action.

Allow me, sir, to allude to another case in New York—the case of the United States vs. Marsellis, indicted for stealing letters from the New York post office, who was tried and convicted prior to October, 1848. At the October term, in 1848, Mr. District Attorney Butler charged the Government $10 75. After the conviction, Mr. Shepherd charged $20, at the January term; 1849, and Mr. District Attorney Hall also charged $20, at the May term, 1849. Each of them charged retaining fees after the conviction and before sentence. In this case in which a conviction was had before either Mr. Sheperd or Mr. Hall, had anything to do with the prosecution—each of them, I say, charged a retaining fee of $8 37.

I hold in my hand the charges for services in the State court of the district attorney of Schenectady county, in the State of New York. The amount is for the ordinary services of a term. It includes the drawing of three indictments, five trials, and subpoenas and the preparation for trial in thirteen cases, and yet the aggregate amount for the term is $62 06; whereas the district attorney of the United States, in the case against Walford, where he made a motion to enter a nolle prosequi, charged $96 12½ at one term, and in all, $267 50. The clerks are in the habit, in the State of New York, of making searches at each term of the court, and they charge the Government large sums of money, for which no adequate service is rendered. Well, sir, lest this might look like a sectional statement, I will turn the attention of the House, for one moment, to the clerk's fees in the district court for the southern district of Mississippi, and endeavor to show that these evils are rather national in their character. Here you have charges made for the attendance of the clerk on three unfinished cases of bankruptcy, amounting to the sum of $310 10, claimed by the clerk, and certified by the judge of that court, as compensation for his per diem on attending the court. The judge of that district certified to the account as follows:

Accounts of William Burns, clerk, for his per diem from May 19, 1845, to November 18, 1845, for 800 days' sitting in bankruptcy, at $5 per day.....$4,450
Four days on other business.....20

$4,470

The whole number of days within that period was.....1,280

Number of Sabbaths.....182

Number of days charged for attendance.....894

Number of days other than Sabbaths not charged.....204

1,280

On the 7th of February, 1846, the clerk reported to the Secretary of State of the United States that the number of applicants for relief under the bankrupt act was, cases.....872

Number discharged.....861

Mr. Burns charged from February 7, 1846, (the date of that report,) to November 18, 1845, for his attendance on the court in bankruptcy to dispose of those three cases, 863 days, at $5 per day.....$3,310
S. J. Gholson, judge of that district, certified to the account, and that the attendance upon said clerk sitting in bankruptcy, of William Burns, clerk thereof, as specified in the foregoing abstract, was expressly required by me, and said clerk did actually so attend for the performance of the duties of his office."

Given under my hand and seal, &c.

The idea of this Government paying $3,310 to the clerk for attending three unfinished cases of bankruptcy is perfectly preposterous. In the middle district of Tennessee you have the judge of that district certifying to an account of a clerk for ninety-two days more than can possibly be counted in the period embraced. The judge certified in this instance for constructive services against the Government an account of $3,620, after the clerk had stated in no less than six semi-annual emoluments accounts; sworn to by him, that he was "not entitled to any emoluments other than those therein specified," which did not include any portion of the $3,620. Here the clerk was already paid by his own acknowledgment for all his actual services, and yet some years afterwards the judge certifies an account for constructive services amounting to the extraordinary sum of $3,620.

Even in the State of Pennsylvania this disposition to make a "per diem" allowance to clerks for attendance in court, when the court was not in session, seems to have prevailed in the western district. It appears by the report of the First Comptroller, in executive document No. 93 of this session, that the judge of the western district of Pennsylvania certified and allowed a compensation to his son for attendance as clerk, in open court, at five dollars a day for a period of nearly six years, under the provisions of the bankrupt laws, when it is perfectly manifest that the court was not actually in session, but only constructively open for the purpose of filing papers, and to allow the clerk to enter common orders under the existing rules. In the State of Kentucky more petitions were filed in bankruptcy than in the western district of Pennsylvania; and yet it would appear that only one hundred and four days are charged for by the clerk at a compensation of $520. The clerks in the western district of Pennsylvania charged from the year 1842 to 1846 for about eight hundred and twenty-one days, and actually received on their own certificate and the allowance of the judge, some $3,600.

Well, sir, I will refer next to the case of the United States vs. Wilson & Crafts—a celebrated case in Massachusetts. Without going into detail, I will state that in a prosecution of these men for conspiracy to cast away the ship Franklin, the marshal's costs amounted, as taxed by him, to $6,147 55. It is but justice in this connection to say, that that account as presented by the marshal has never been certified by the judge. The judge certified only one of the six bills presented by the marshal, amounting to in and about $1,500. In this case there were six or eight witnesses, who were brought up by a writ of habeas corpus issued each day for each of the witnesses, and each witness was returned to jail each day upon a commitment. The marshal's fees of the six witnesses and the two prisoners amounted to the enormous sum of $6,147 55, more than $100 a day for bringing up and committing the witnesses and defendants. In the courts of England, and in the State courts, and in nine-tenths of our district courts, the practice is to bring up for trial and commit prisoners upon a parole order. There is scarce a court in the wide limits of the United States in which anything else was ever dreamt of. But in the cities of Philadelphia and Boston each witness and each prisoner has to be brought out on a habeas corpus and returned on a commitment. In the State of Virginia there are some slight abuses in the western district. Allow me to call the attention of the House to some of the abuses in the "Old Dominion." An inquiry was made, under a resolution of this House in January last, directed to the Secretary of the Interior, "What is the practice of issuing attachments for non-attendance of witnesses?" In the western district of Virginia you will find this state of things disclosed in the report of the First Comptroller. Proceedings for contempt of court have been unnecessarily multiplied, which is one of the causes of the increase of judicial expense. There were in the district in the year 1849 at one time no less than one hundred and twenty-two prosecutions for contempt of court against seventeen persons for non-attendance as witnesses, being thirteen prosecutions against each of six persons and four prosecutions against each of the others. The whole cost was thrown upon the Treasury of the United States. In the year 1850, the witnesses in Virginia seem to have been contumacious again, and you find eighty-three proceedings against fourteen witnesses in one case, in which the clerk's fees amounted to over $197, all of which was charged to the United States, besides the marshal's fees for serving process in each of these proceedings. I admit that it is sometimes necessary to issue attachments against witnesses for contempt to the process of the courts, but it cannot fail to strike any one as a most singular feature of the administration of the laws in this district that the Government is so frequently called upon to pay the costs of these proceedings on attachment for contempt.

In the State of Louisiana, they have no law for the taxation of attorneys' fees, and the district attorneys of Louisiana have claims against this Government for their services for some years past. Mr. Baillie Peyton received for his services for three years as district attorney of Louisiana, upwards of $25,000. Mr. Downs, his successor for about fourteen months, received upwards of $13,000 for his services. Mr. Durant, who succeeded him, received for two years $16,321 93, and for three years, including the two I have just named, he has received about $21,000, and he still has a claim against this Government which he has urged with singular pertinacity, amounting to over $30,000 more. The balance upon his claim, after receiving some $21,000 for three years services, is now about $30,000 against the Government. For similar services rendered in any State in this Union, except in the States of New York, Virginia, and California, these services would not have amounted to one tenth part of what has been certified and allowed by the court for his services.

I will here allude to the celebrated cases of Wilson and Crafts, tried with signal ability by a gentleman from Massachusetts, who, I am sorry to see, has this day vacated his seat on account of sickness, [Mr. RANTOUL.] These cases occupied him for forty-three days in the examination of ninety-three witnesses, and in making an argument, which reflected upon him great credit as a lawyer. For his services during these forty-three days he received the paltry consideration of $79 50 when the marshal claimed for his services in the same cases six thousand and some odd hundred dollars. With more time, I might go on and enumerate many other evils proposed to be remedied by this bill. I will now very briefly, however, direct the attention of the House to the provisions of the bill. First, in regard to the fees of attorneys, solicitors, and proctors—attorneys in courts of law, solicitors in courts of equity, and proctors in admiralty. After having examined the whole ground—after having carefully examined the statutes of each State—after having had the advice of many judges, and letters from some of the most celebrated jurists of this country—after having consulted with the judges of the Supreme Court, and after having before us several bills which had received the attention of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and report of the Solicitor of the Treasury in 1848, and the reports of the present Comptroller, it was believed by the committee that the fees allowed to attorneys, under this bill, will be a just and fair compensation, and, upon the whole, present about a fair average for what is now allowed in most of the States. A new provision has been adopted, similar to what is in force in some of the States, increasing, in the event of conviction in a criminal case, the compensation of the attorney. Another provision is introduced into this bill to settle the cases of those attorneys, who are pressing their claims for a further compensation from the Government, from the States in which there is no fee bill for the taxation of costs. The bill provides, that those attorneys shall be paid for all the claims which they may have against the Government in the last six years, unless they may have already received compensation for their services. Another provision extends a principle of the common law and the statutory regulations of the different States for the consolidation of actions to criminal causes. The bill leaves the whole matter discretionary with the courts. The multiplication of indictments, and of process for the purpose of increasing fees, has become an evil so enormous that it seems necessary to introduce this principle of the common law and the statutory regulations of the States into the criminal laws of the United States; and whenever several suits are prosecuted, which should be consolidated, it is provided that the district attorney of the United States shall be paid but one bill of costs for all of them. And whenever vexatious suits or proceedings are instituted, the court is authorized to impose the payment of the costs on the attorney who occasions them.

The next provision of the bill contemplates the correction of another great evil. When a criminal is to be removed from one district to another, as will be seen by reference to Conkling's Treatise, pages 405 and 406, in the State of New York, the practice is to give a warrant to the marshal who is to remove the prisoner, a second warrant to the marshal from whom he is to be received, and a third warrant to be delivered to the marshal or jailor who is to receive him. This accumulation of costs is unnecessary and uselessly expensive. The bill is intended to prevent any such abuse.

In regard to clerk fees, the compensation allowed to clerks is regulated by the provisions of the act of Congress, February 28th, 1799, which adopts the fees allowed to the clerks of the supreme courts of the several States, with one third added thereto. In many of the States the compensation is too small, and the effect of the bill will be, in such instances, to raise them, while in other States it will very materially diminish them. One of the principal causes of the great increase in the judicial expenses of the Government, is the itemizing of fees. Whenever a great number of items are found in a fee bill, the ingenuity of officers claiming compensation has been taxed to obtain a double compensation for their services. Having in some cases the right to claim compensation under the acts of Congress, and in others under the statutory regulations of the States, they charge some items under one law, and some under another, and thereby obtain a higher compensation than a fair taxation of costs under either statute would give them. In other instances they charge in accordance with some precedent or usage items of costs which are not authorized by any statute. These different modes for the taxation of costs, create so much uncertainty, that the amount of compensation of the officers depends, to a great extent, on their ingenuity in making out their bills. There are necessarily several items of fees allowed to the clerks of the courts; but it has been the object of the committee to allow, as far as practicable, a general compensation, instead of items. The folio compensation allowed for entries and copies is believed to be larger than is given in most of the States. For making an index and other general services upon the trial where issue is joined and testimony is given, there is a round sum of $3 allowed to the clerk. This covers all the services which the clerk will render in any case except those specified in the items of this bill. For making an index and other general services in cases where issue is joined and no testimony is given, he is allowed $2.

In every case, for making an index and for taxing costs, and other general services, where there is a discontinuance, or judgment by default, he is allowed $1. This compensation is given to the clerks to cover the services performed which are not enumerated in the other items of the bill.

These three items, remunerating for general services, afford a larger compensation for such services than the State fee bills with one third added thereto, whilst they effectually preclude the accumulation of costs by any ingenious construction. In equity and admiralty cases the labor of the clerk is greatly diminished by the manner provided for making up the record, and his services are amply paid by the folio compensation. For issuing a subpoena we have allowed twenty-five cents; and for the insertion of each additional name after the first we have allowed fifteen cents—this is equal to what is given in most of the States.

The marshal's fees remain pretty much as they are under the act of 1799, except where the committee have inserted provisions to prevent known abuses. The mileage of marshals, for serving writs and subpoenas, is increased from five to six cents per mile. There are provisions introduced into this bill to prevent the practice, under existing laws, of issuing a separate subpoena for each witness, whereby costs are greatly increased. The marshal, under the act of 1841, receives $30 as the maximum of all his compensation for summoning all the jurors to any one term of court. It was thought that this was but poor compensation. The bill before the House, however, raises it up to a maximum of $50. In order that the House may see how readily $100 are made by very little service, let me instance a case. The marshal makes the service by sending the writs of venire to his deputies, who execute it, and charge mileage from the place of service to the place of holding the court, and the writs are returned, as they were sent, through the post office. The service and mileage amounts generally to more than $50; but the bill limits the charge to that sum. It is readily perceived that there is but little travel performed, and the mileage made through the United States mail. The circuit and district courts are usually held at the same time, and the jurors for both courts are summoned at the same time, and $50 charged on the venire to each court. The maximum compensation of $50 allowed for summoning the jurors to one court—or $100 for two courts held at the same time—in most instances, the committee deem a full and adequate compensation for the services of any marshal. The other fees of the marshals are substantially the same as have been established since the organization of the judiciary system of this Government. The marshal's fees on executions are regulated by the laws of the States respectively; and this cannot well be otherwise, because the process of execution follows the forms of executions in the several States.

The third section of this act is a copy of the one hundred and sixty-seventh paragraph of the appropriation act of 1842, under which marshals, district attorneys, and clerks, are required to return annually to the Treasury of the United States a statement of the emolument of their offices. The marshal may receive a compensation not exceeding $6,000; the district attorney not exceeding $6,000; and the clerk of the circuit court and the district court, a compensation not exceeding $3,500 each. Where the fees of either of these ministerial officers amount to a sum greater than that I have indicated, any surplus, after the payment of the necessary expenses, goes into the public Treasury.

I come now to the commissioners' fees. There is no law at present regulating the fees of the commissioners. Indeed, in most of the States these items are charged upon whatever law can be found that gives the largest compensation. If the commissioner finds the State statute does not provide a liberal compensation, he charges either $5 or $10 a day as a quantum meruit, for his services.

But in regard to commissioners, there are very few State laws that afford any just or true estimate by which their costs may be charged. We give them a moderate compensation in this bill, and the committee have proposed two amendments, which will be read, which indicate the amount of fees to be received by the commissioners under the treaty with Great Britain and France, in regard to the extradition of fugitives from justice.

Witnesses' fees we have raised from $1 25 to $1 50, and we have done this, because before this very Congress there are several applications of witnesses brought from a distance to the criminal court in this District, who have under oath testified to the Committee on the Judiciary that $1 25 was inadequate to pay their boarding and lodging in this city. We have therefore raised the fees of witnesses to $1 50, and we have given the usual mileage. We have made a provision in the bill by which witnesses subpoenaed to several cases to the same courts shall have but one travel fee, and one per diem compensation allowed for attendance. Why, sir, in the State of New York, and in some other States, a subpoena is issued for each witness, and under the decision of the Attorney General a subpoena was regarded as a writ, and $2 was charged for the service, and a ticket containing the contents of the subpoena was left with the person notified to attend the court, and fifty cents was charged for it. The sum of $2 50 was therefore charged for the service of the writ of subpoena, beside mileage.

The committee have introduced into this bill a clause that we think will effectually prevent this abuse hereafter. They have also introduced a very humane and salutary provision into the bill, which is, when a witness is detained in prison, and requires security for his appearance, he shall be entitled to a compensation of one dollar per diem over and above his subsistence. They have also made provision for the payment of such witnesses as may be sent to this country to testify by our foreign ambassadors, charges, and consuls. As to jurors' fees, the committee have raised their compensation from $1 25 to $2 a day, and regard this sum as little enough for the services of any man who will attend the United States courts generally held in our cities, where his boarding and lodging will amount to the sum he now receives for his services.

In regard to printers' fees, there is no branch of this subject into which there exists greater inequalities in the amount charged for services. The diversity of compensation allowed to printers for services rendered under orders of the courts of justice is almost as great as it is under the fee bill that regulates the compensation of marshals, clerks, and district attorneys. We have introduced into this bill a section, taken from the revised statutes of the State of New York, page 739. This compensation is not quite so large, but is predicated upon the same principle with the compensation paid by the Post Office Department to those that do its printing. The bill further provides that no other or greater fees than those allowed in this bill shall be received by any clerk, attorney, marshal, or their deputies; and the receipt of any such illegal fees is made a misdemeanor, and punishable by fine and imprisonment. In the State of California and Territory of Oregon the officers of the courts, jurors, and witnesses shall be allowed for the term of two years double the fees and compensation allowed by this act; and the same fees allowed by this act, with fifty per cent., shall be added thereto for two years next hereafter.

Another provision of the bill is, that before a bill of costs shall be taxed by a judge or other officer, or allowed by any officer, in favor of clerks, marshals, or district attorneys, the party claiming such bill shall prove upon his oath, or by some other person having knowledge of the fact, that the services charged therein have been actually and necessarily performed.

We have made another provision in the bill. It was the custom of witnesses in many districts when served with a subpoena in a cause, after they had testified, to demand their mileage and daily pay, and then to depart the court. This rendered it necessary to serve a separate subpoena in each case in which his testimony was required. This is a palpable defect in the law.

By this means witnesses got their mileage and daily pay in each case in which they were subpoenaed before the court. A provision is made here to guard the interest of the United States in this behalf. Witnesses shall be subpoenaed to attend to testify generally, and not depart the court without the leave of the judge or district attorney, under which it shall be their duty to appear before the grand jury or petit jury, or both, as they shall be required by the court or district attorney.

The fourth section in the bill provides for the taking of false oaths, and the fifth section avoids intermeddling with the fugitive slave law. Another important provision in this bill is this: that all costs in cases where, by law, costs are recoverable in favor of the prevailing party, shall be taxed by a judge or clerk of the court, and form a portion of the judgment or decree against the losing party. In cases in which the United States is a party the marshal shall, on the order of the court, pay the jurors and witnesses such fees as, under the provisions of the bill, they may be entitled to, to be allowed on the settlement of his accounts at the Treasury. The certificate of the judge is not necessary for the settlement of the accounts of the marshals, clerks, commissioners, or district attorneys, at the Treasury Department. The party claiming compensation from the Government is required to verify, by oath, his charges, and on a fair settlement of his accounts at the Treasury, shall be paid whatever may be due, under the terms of this law. This plan is calculated to relieve the judges of the courts and their ministerial officers, as well as the officers of the Treasury Department, from much unpleasant embarrassment. I have been spoken to by more than one of the judges of the United States Court, to adopt some mode for the settlement of the accounts of the officers of the courts by which they will be relieved from the onerous and disagreeable duty of taxing costs against the Government, a duty in the performance of which they not unfrequently are brought into unpleasant collision with the accounting officers. The clause in the bill to which I have referred, remedies this evil, and furnishes a better and safer method of adjusting and paying the ministerial officers of our courts, whatever claims they may have against the Government.

These, sir, are the main and prominent features of this bill. The bill is intended to operate as a uniform system throughout the United States.

Now, I beg of the House to understand that it is not the object of this bill merely to reduce the fees of the ministerial officers of the Federal courts; but to equalize their compensation for similar services in every district in the Union. It would be derogatory to the dignity of the Government to pay an inadequate price for services rendered; besides it would be false economy and impolitic to adopt a parsimonious system. Our object, therefore, has been to prepare a bill that will establish a uniform system for the taxation of costs; to devise a law that will be explicit, definite, and clear, so as to prevent all abuses growing out of ingenious interpretations, and to cut off all constructive services, and all unnecessary prolixity and useless forms; and thus, while it proposes to diminish the labor of the officers of the courts, it furnishes a just and liberal compensation for all services necessarily performed by them. The passage of the bill, sir, will even do more than all this. It will save some $200,000 annually to the public Treasury, and it will prevent "the pollers and exactors of fees" from fleecing those whose faults or misfortunes have driven them into courts of justice, and subjected them to the tender mercies of the law.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, that the amendments to the bill which are proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary may be now read. They are as follows:

1. Strike out twenty-third and twenty-fourth lines, and insert: For each deposition taken and admitted as evidence in the cause, $2 50.

2. Strike out in the twenty-fifth line the word "like."

3. After the word "district," in the thirty-ninth line, insert: And to the place of any examination before a judge or commissioner, of a person or persons charged with crime.

4. Strike out in line forty six the word "heretofore," and insert: During the last six years.

5. Insert in line seventy-three, after the word "them:" And if any attorney, proctor, or other person admitted to manage or conduct causes in any court of the United States, or of the territories thereof, shall appear to have multiplied the proceedings in any cause before court so as to increase costs unreasonably and vexatiously, such person may be required by order of the court to satisfy any excess of costs so increased.

6. In line one hundred and three, after the word "report," insert: For each folio fifteen (15) cents—and strike out the word "or" and insert in lieu thereof: And for.

7. After line one hundred and twenty-eight insert: For every search for each mortgage, judgment, or other lien, fifteen cents.

8. In line one hundred and fifty-one strike out the word "five," and insert six in lieu thereof.

9. After the word "excess," in line one hundred and eighty-one, add: For serving an attachment in rem, or a libel in admiralty, $2; and the necessary expenses of keeping boats, vessels, or other property, attached or libeled in admiralty, not exceeding $2 50 per day; and in case the debt or claim shall be settled by the parties, without a sale of the property, the marshal shall be entitled to a commission of one per cent. on the first $500 of the claim or decree, and one half of one per cent. on the excess over $500: Provided, That, in case the value of the property shall be less than the claim, then, and in such case, such commission shall be allowed only on the appraised value thereof.

10. Strike out from line two hundred and twenty-one to two hundred and twenty-seven, inclusive, and insert: The respective courts of the United States shall appoint clerks for their courts, to be allowed the sum of $2 per day; and the marshals are hereby authorized to appoint such a number of persons, not exceeding five, as the judges of their respective courts shall determine, to attend upon the grand and other juries, and for other necessary purposes, who shall be allowed for their services the sum of $2 per day, to be paid by and included in the accounts of the marshal, out of any money of the United States in his hands. The compensation to be given only for actual attendance; and when both courts are in session at the same time, to be paid but for attendance on one court.

11. Judiciary Bill, House of Representatives, No. 146, introduced January 29th, 1852:

Amend section third of the bill as follows: Strike out on page twelve the last three words of the first line, and the whole of lines two to ten, inclusive; and also the words "the Interior," to wit: of line eleven strike out the words "Treasury" in each of the lines seventeen, thirty-seven, sixty-three, seventy-four, and eighty, and insert in the place thereof, in each instance, the word "Interior."

Strike out the words following: "A sum exceeding $2,500 per year for any such," in lines fifty-three and fifty-four.

Strike out lines one hundred and three, one hundred and four, and one hundred and five, and the last four words of line one hundred and two, and the first seven words in line one hundred and six.

Strike out the word "said," in line one hundred and twelve, and insert in the same, after the word paragraph, the following words, to wit: One hundred and sixty-seven of the civil and diplomatic appropriation act, approved May 18, 1842.

13. New paragraph after line one hundred and twenty-eight:

For issuing any warrant under the tenth article of the treaty of the 8th August, 1842, between the United States and the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, against any person charged with any of the crimes or offenses set forth in said article, two dollars; and the same sum for any warrant issued under the provisions of the convention for the surrender of criminals, between the United States and the King of the French, concluded at Washington on the 9th of November, 1843; and for hearing and deciding upon the case of any person charged with any offense or crime, and arrested under the provisions of said treaty or convention, five dollars per day for the time necessarily employed.

14. In line two hundred and twenty, after the word "clerk," insert: Or their deputies; and in line two hundred and twenty six, after the word "misdemeanor," insert: And if any officer hereinbefore mentioned, or his deputy, shall by reason or color of his office willfully and corruptly demand and receive any other or greater fee than those allowed in this act, he shall, on conviction thereof in any court of the United States, forfeit and pay a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court before whom the conviction shall lie.

15. In line two hundred and fifty-two, strike out the word "parol."

Mr. PHELPS. I want to offer an amendment to the bill now under consideration, to come in after lines one hundred and six and one hundred and seven.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary must first be disposed of.

Mr. STANTON. I was going to inquire whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] can retain the floor, and yield it to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS.] to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. He cannot, if it is objected to.

Mr. McLANAHAN. In justice to myself I wish to say that it is not my intention to call the previous question upon this bill. This bill will bear discussion. I challenge discussion, and I should like to hear the objections of any gentleman to it. I said before, sir, that it did not profess to be perfect, but any general and uniform system, for the taxation of costs, however bad it may be, will be an improvement upon the present one.

Mr. PHELPS. I now offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk, to come in between lines one hundred and six and one hundred and seven:

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Before that amendment is received we will have it read, and reserve to ourselves the right to object after it is read.

Mr. PHELPS. Let the amendment be read, and I will then briefly explain it. I suppose there will be no objection to it.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it in order now to offer amendments to any portion of the bill? Will not amendments be in order only when the bill is read paragraph by paragraph, with the view to amendment?

The SPEAKER. The amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary must first be acted upon.

Mr. CLARK. Let us first hear this amendment read.

Mr. LETCHER. Are not the amendments proposed to be offered by the Judiciary Committee first in order?

The SPEAKER. They are the first in order. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri cannot be received until the amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary are disposed of.

Mr. LETCHER. I call for the reading of the committee's amendments.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to make a few remarks in relation to the amendment I intend to offer, if it is in order to discuss the bill now; and I ask that it may be read as a portion of my remarks.

The Clerk then read the amendment as follows:

Add between lines one hundred and six and one hundred and seven, on page five:

For recording each and every plat of survey when necessary to make a record complete, or for a copy or transcript thereof, made on request, or when necessary, twenty cents.

For taking the acknowledgment of a deed, and certifying the same, which the clerks are hereby authorized to take, or taking and entering the recognizance of a witness or defendant, fifty cents.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I desire to know if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] has surrendered the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have closed his remarks.

Mr. STANTON. Then, if the gentleman has surrendered the floor, I am satisfied.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania surrendered the floor?

Mr. McLANAHAN. I have.

Mr. PHELPS. This bill provides that no other fees shall be charged by officers named in the bill than those that are specified therein. By the laws of our State (Missouri) surveys are frequently required to be made by order of the court. These are made a part of the records of the cause which may be on trial. I allude now to the land cases, and the clerks are frequently required to copy these surveys, and the plats which have been made for the purpose of facilitating the cause then pending in court. Now, without the adoption of the amendment which I have offered, the clerk will be entitled to no compensation for those services. I am informed by the clerk of the circuit court for the district of Missouri that frequently the expense of copying these plats is very large; and in one instance the expense for copying the plats which were used upon the trial of an important land question, involving the title to a portion of real estate in the city of St. Louis, the expense amounted to upwards of fifty dollars; and those copies having to go to the Supreme Court of the United States, he could not obtain any person to copy them for a less sum. My amendment proposes to allow twenty cents for the copying of the plats made by order of courts. There is another amendment in connection with it, which I propose.

By the laws of Missouri the clerks of the court, not only of the State, but also of the United States court, are authorized to take acknowledgments of deeds, which are valid by the laws of that State. The clerks of those courts have been in the habit for years past of receiving fees for that service, and yet in this bill it is provided that they shall receive no other fees than such as are therein specified. My amendment simply provides that a fee of fifty cents should be allowed for taking each of these acknowledgments. Having thus briefly explained my amendment, I shall offer it whenever it is in order.

Mr. BOWIE. I beg leave to offer an amendment of which I gave notice yesterday. It is as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall extend or apply to the fees, costs, and charges of the district attorneys, clerks, and marshals of the United States, in the circuit and district courts of the United States, in the State of Maryland, or District of Columbia.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe there is a motion pending to recommit this bill.

The SPEAKER. Yes, a motion is pending.

Mr. LETCHER. I think we should hear the amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary read, so that we may know what they are. I ask that they may be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BOWIE] is entitled to the floor unless arrested by a privileged motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. Unless the gentleman yields the floor.

Mr. BOWIE. I suppose I shall have the floor whenever this bill comes up.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 196, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853, and for other purposes.

Mr. PHELPS here temporarily vacated the chair, (calling Mr. CARTER thereto,) and offered the following amendment, to come in after line six hundred and thirty-seven, viz:

For completing the marine hospital at St. Louis, Missouri, $21,251.

Mr. P. said: I was under the necessity of asking the indulgence of the committee to permit me to leave the chair and offer this amendment, as it relates to a matter within my own State, although not within my district, and none of my colleagues were present to propose it. I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that the sum of $21,251 is needed for the purpose of completing the marine hospital located at St. Louis. There is a vast amount of commerce at the city of St. Louis, and a great many sailors are left there sick and destitute. The course of trade necessarily makes it so, for the boats which are engaged in navigating the Ohio river go no further than St. Louis, where a reshipment of goods takes place to go up the Missouri, Mississippi, and Illinois rivers, and the boats engaged in running to New Orleans seldom go above the city of St. Louis on the Mississippi river, and the goods are reshipped. In consequence of this, sailors are frequently left at St. Louis sick, and they cannot be provided for unless they are taken into the hospital. A large amount of money has been expended by the citizens of St. Louis for the relief of these sick and disabled boatmen. Persons engaged in western commerce are all required to pay twenty cents per month towards the hospital fund. I have before me a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating the amount of money collected and disbursed at the various points where marine hospitals are located, and amongst others in Missouri, during the last fiscal year. The amount of hospital money collected in that State was $2,268 77; the total expenditures for the support of the sick was $2,524 42. The object of the Secretary of the Treasury, for which he asks this additional appropriation, is to enlarge that hospital, which will now only accommodate one hundred and forty inmates, so as to provide accommodations for two hundred. There are frequently nearly that number of sailors sick in the city of St. Louis, partly supported at the Government hospital and partly at the hospital in the city.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to inquire whether this hospital is one that is already established, and the erection of which has been already commenced?

Mr. PHELPS. It is.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Then it is not a new work?

Mr. PHELPS. No, sir.

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 6, 1852.

"SIR: Since the preparation of the estimates of appropriations required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853, this Department has received reports from the superintendents of the marine hospitals at St. Louis, Cleveland, and Pittsburg, and each requiring additional appropriations for the completion of the hospitals at those places respectively, viz:

"Marine hospital at St. Louis.

"The estimate of the cost of completing this hospital is thus stated by the superintendent:
For lumber, carpenter's work and hardware.....$9,976 00
"lathing, plastering, painting and glazing.....4,025 00
"plumber's work, cisterns, tanks, baths, kitchen and water pipes.....5,045 00
"iron railing for porticoes, steps, paving and flagging.....1,800 00
Total.....21,251 00

"There has been an alteration in the plan of this building. The original plan was for the accommodation of one hundred and forty inmates; under the present arrangement there are accommodations for two hundred inmates."

Mr. HOUSTON. The amount asked for in the gentleman's amendment is $21,251—the amount of the second estimate from the Department—and I am opposed to it for the reason that the hospital is now in a condition to receive and accommodate sick seamen just as well as it will be after this appropriation is made. The estimate for this appropriation was sent in to the Committee of Ways and Means after the regular estimate had been sent in and acted upon. The same paper contains additional estimates for the marine hospitals at Cleveland and Pittsburg. In my opinion, the proper course for the House to pursue is, to require these estimates to be sent to the committee at the proper time, when the committee and the House will have leisure to consider them. These estimates were sent in after the regular estimates had been examined and acted upon by the Committee of Ways and Means.

By reference to the items making up this amount, it will be seen that it is intended for embellishment. For instance, here is for white-washing fences, planting shade and fruit trees.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman read all the items, so that the committee may see what they are?

Mr. HOUSTON. Here is $887 for brick stable, stone foundation—

Mr. PHELPS. That is not at St. Louis.

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir, that is at Pittsburg. But here are the items for St. Louis: "For lumber, carpenter's work and hardware, lathing, plastering, painting and glazing, plumber's work, cisterns, tanks," and so forth. "For iron railing for porticoes, steps, paving, and flagging." Nearly the whole amount is for items of that character, and which are not essential to the accommodation of sick seamen.

Mr. PHELPS demanded tellers on the amendment; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER, and HARRIS of Tennessee, were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported only thirty-eight in the affirmative.

A further count not being insisted on, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELPS here resumed the chair.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, offered the following amendment:

For the erection of a marine hospital at Portland, in the State of Maine, for the better protection of sick and disabled seamen, in pursuance of existing law, $30,000.

Mr. F. said: Mr. Chairman, a bill has passed the Senate making appropriation of the sum which I now propose for the erection of a marine hospital at Portland. That bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and after examination, they have instructed me to report it to the House. In consideration of the pressing importance of the work, I offer this amendment to the general appropriation bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. Is there not a marine hospital in Boston?

Mr. FULLER. There is a hospital at Boston, and I will inform the gentleman from Georgia that it is full. There is no hospital east of that, a distance of coast of between four and five hundred miles. Now, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the expenditures during the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1851, for the support of sick and disabled seamen, I find that there was about $7,000 expended in the State of Maine, while about the same amount of money was collected. I find, also, that a greater sum was paid out in Maine for medical service for sick and disabled seamen, than in any other State—Massachusetts, New York, or any other. Now, we have thirteen collection districts on our coast, and by the existing law, sick and disabled seamen must be provided for within each of those districts. If a marine hospital was erected at Portland, all our sick and disabled seamen could be relieved there. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not like to attempt to exclude anything from this bill that is really necessary to be passed, but I feel it my duty to submit a point of order in connection with that proposition. Under the 81st rule, I understand that such appropriations as this are not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not advised whether an appropriation had been made for the erection of an hospital at Portland, in Maine, or not. He understood, however, from the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER], that it was in pursuance of an existing law that he now asked an appropriation for the erection of an hospital there.

Mr. FULLER. The point which I make is this: We have a provision by law for providing for sick and disabled seamen. It is therefore competent for Congress to provide for the erection of this hospital as coming legitimately within that provision, as those seamen can be better provided for than in private hospitals.

The CHAIRMAN. When the amendment was offered the Chair understood that it was to provide for the completion of an hospital; but as the point of order is raised by the gentleman from Alabama, and as it is shown by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] himself, that the amendment is not for the completion of an hospital, but for the erection of one, the Chair must decide it to be out of order.

Mr. FULLER. I think that is a rather rigid construction of the rules. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I desire to ask, in connection with this question of order, whether the gentleman did not state that he had reported a bill for the erection of an hospital?

Mr. FULLER. I have not. Such a bill has passed the Senate, and has been referred to the Committee on Commerce. That committee have instructed me to report the bill to the House, but it has not yet been reported.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, now, I desire to know if it is in order to incorporate another bill in the civil and diplomatic bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is not in order. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] submits an amendment appropriating "$30,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at Portland, in the State of Maine, for the better protection of sick and disabled seamen, in pursuance of existing laws." The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] raises the point of order that the amendment is not in order. The Chair decides that the amendment is not in order, as it is not for the purpose of carrying out an appropriation authorized by existing laws. The 81st rule provides that "no appropriation shall be reported 'in such general appropriation bills, or be in order' as an amendment thereto for any expenditure 'not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works' and objects are already in progress, and for contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government." The amendment is for the erection of an hospital at Portland. There is no existing law establishing a marine hospital at that point, and therefore the Chair decides it to be out of order. From this decision the gentleman from Maine appeals. The question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained by the committee.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, submitted the following amendment:

For the purpose of a site, and for the erection of a marine hospital at Memphis, $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must announce to the gentleman from Tennessee that there is no law authorizing the erection of a marine hospital at that point; and the amendment is, therefore, not in order.

Mr. STANTON. I hope the Chair will at least wait until some gentleman raises the point.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Chair has the same right to make a point of order as any gentleman upon the floor, if he chooses. But there is an additional point in the case of the gentleman's amendment. As I understand it, the law of 1842 requires that the Government shall not erect any public building unless upon plans previously submitted, and estimates of the cost for executing such plan. In the case of the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER], this requisition has been complied with by the Committee on Commerce, or at least I am bound to presume that it has, because they have decided in its favor. But in this case I suppose there has been no such plan submitted.

Mr. STANTON. I will obviate that objection by modifying this amendment, so as to provide only for the purchase of a site. I have offered the amendment only for the purpose of submitting a remark or two, to show how necessary it is to have an hospital erected at Memphis.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to rule the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, as modified, out of order. It involves the same point precisely as that upon which the amendment of the gentleman from Maine was ruled out of order.

Mr. LOCKHART offered the following amendment:

For the completion of the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, $20,000.

Mr. L. said: I desire to state, in connection with this amendment, that the sum of $25,000 has heretofore been appropriated by Congress towards the erection of a marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana; $5,000 of that sum has been expended for the purchase of a site. Before proceeding further, I will avail myself of the courtesy of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and ask that the following letter from the Treasury Department may be read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 17, 1852.

SIR: The Department having recently purchased a site for the marine hospital provided for at Evansville, Indiana, is desirous to contract for the erection of the building so as, if possible, to complete it during the present season, and there being now at the disposal of the Department for this object only $30,000 of appropriations, which being inadequate for the erection of a suitable structure, a contract cannot be made except for portions of the work until further appropriations are made, and this course is regarded as injudicious and productive of additional expense.

Two buildings for the same object having been so far completed at points corresponding to that of Evansville, in the matter of cost, the Department is enabled to furnish the committee from these data with a just estimate of the probable expense of the structure, so that an appropriation may be made at the present session of the residue required to complete it.

The localities referred to are Louisville and Paducah, Kentucky; at the former of which $42,000 have been expended, and at the latter $48,625.

The Department is of opinion that a suitable edifice can be erected at Evansville for $50,000, which will require an additional appropriation of $20,000; and I have the honor to recommend that the same be done at the present session, for the reasons already stated.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

WM. L. HODGE,

Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. GEORGE S. HOUSTON,
Chairman Committee Ways and Means, H. R.

From this letter it will be seen that it required about $50,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at Paducah; $42,000 has been expended and it is not yet completed. The one at Louisville cost $48,625, and is not yet entirely finished; so it will be perceived that the sum I ask is less than the amount usually expended in structures of this character. This is owing to the fact that experience has proven that under the contract system some ten or fifteen per cent. is saved in the cost of such a building; knowing this fact, the Secretary of the Treasury declines letting the contract until a sufficient amount is appropriated to complete it. To commence it and then stop for means, the work becomes more or less injured, and mechanics, from the necessities of the case, must ask higher prices than would be charged if they could progress with their work and draw their pay as they progress. I am informed that heavy losses were sustained by the Government in the erection of the hospitals at Louisville and Paducah, for the reason that sufficient means were not placed at the disposal of the Department in the first instance to complete the buildings. In conclusion, (as I see that my five minutes have nearly expired,) I wish to say that there is no point upon the western waters where a marine hospital is more needed. Evansville is one of the most important shipping points between Louisville and Memphis; indeed, it is said by those who are concerned in the carrying trade upon those waters, that more domestic produce is shipped from Evansville than there is at Louisville. The longest canal on the continent terminates there, and most of the six hundred flat-boatmen, who annually descend the Wabash, land there on their return home, many of them sick and without means. I hope the committee will make this additional appropriation, that the hospital can be completed as cheap as possible, and at the earliest day possible.

Mr. HOUSTON. This is a building which has been ordered to be erected by a previous Congress; and I do not know whether this Congress will feel disposed or not to interfere with what has been heretofore ordered. It is competent for us to do so, but I do not know whether the committee will be so disposed. I feel bound, however, to submit a fact or two connected not only with this, but with all of the hospitals upon the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. We have an hospital now in operation at Pittsburg, another at Louisville, and another at Paducah; and we have on the Mississippi river, probably about three more, which are in operation. The one now proposed to be erected is not more than one hundred and fifteen or one hundred and twenty miles distant from two that are on the Ohio river. It is one hundred and fifteen or one hundred and twenty miles from Paducah, and a little more than that from Louisville. Now, the question presents itself to the Committee, whether it is necessary to erect another at Evansville; and in connection with this fact, I wish to submit an additional one for the consideration of the committee. We are now paying annually some two or three hundred thousand dollars beyond the amount collected for sick and disabled seamen. At the passage of a law by which a tax was to be collected from the sailors for the purpose of creating this fund, it was the intention of Congress that this tax should keep up this fund; to sustain and keep in a comfortable condition the sick seamen of the country. That fund would be large enough now, if we were not wasting it in the construction of unnecessary marine hospitals. Now, sir, if a vessel of any sort—take, if you please, a flat-boat—were leaving Louisville, and a sailor should become sick, so as to require that he should be placed in an hospital, a boat running with the mere current of the river would carry him to an hospital in about twelve hours. So it seems to me that we are really constructing hospitals up and down these streams, where there is no necessity for them. Now, if on a steamer leaving Louisville, the hands should become sick, I understand that the vessel could reach the Paducah hospital in less than twelve hours. If it were to leave Paducah, in going down the river, I understand it would reach Napoleon in about the same time. If a sailor were to be taken sick immediately on leaving one of these hospitals, I understand he would reach another always in the course of a day or two. We have appropriated within the last few years, out of the Treasury for the support of this institution; more than a million dollars—largely over the amount collected from the sailors. I think we are bound to protect these sailors and take care of them when they are sick; but we are wasting the public money by building marine hospitals, at points where hospitals are not needed—as I believe they are not on some points on the western rivers, where they are being built. But if we waste this money, no matter whether legally or otherwise, it is necessary that we should make it up from the Treasury, that we may protect and make comfortable these seamen when they become sick. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he states that comfortable quarters can be afforded to sick seamen in private institutions for from one third to one half what it costs to keep them in the marine hospitals. So, if you build an hospital at Evansville, the Secretary of the Treasury tells you that he can take the sick seamen who might go there, and provide for them in private institutions for one half what it will cost there, after you have expended all the money necessary to put it into operation. The expense of keeping one of these hospitals, comprehending the expense of keeping a nurse and physician, and all the incidental expenses for such an establishment, would be more than double what it would cost to board the invalids at a private institution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I am informed by my friend from Indiana [Mr. LOCKHART] that I conveyed the impression that the Secretary of the Treasury had singled out the Evansville hospital. He did not allude to any particular hospital at all, but to the general subject.

Mr. LANE moved to amend the amendment by increasing the sum $1,000.

Mr. L. If the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means possessed, as I happen to do, a practical knowledge of the present condition and wants of that portion of the country about which he has been speaking, I am quite sure that he could not be induced to oppose the appropriation thus asked for by the gentleman from Indiana. He is in error when he supposes that invalids may be conveyed from Louisville to Evansville within the space of twelve hours with the mere float of the current. At this, the "low water season," and when sickness and disease rage there with greater violence than at any other period of the year, flat-boats, by which the produce of the country in immense quantities is conveyed to our southern markets, often consume fifteen or twenty days in going from Louisville to Evansville, the point at which it is proposed to establish an hospital. The distance between these two points is about two hundred miles, and at a low stage of water, even small class boats, propelled by steam, owing to bars and other obstructions in the channel of the river, sometimes occupy scarcely less time in running to and from these points. The officers and men employed upon these boats are frequently compelled, in order to pass over these obstructions, to expose themselves to the inclemencies of the weather, and indeed to the worst hardships of the life of a boatman, and it is rare that a number of every crew so detained and subject to hardships and exposure do not seriously suffer from sickness before reaching Evansville; and if they were compelled to continue on their voyage to Paducah, a distance of about one hundred and fifty miles further, before they could receive proper medical attention, who could estimate the amount of suffering and mortality which would occur to this useful class of our people? Many such are poor, and without the means of securing to themselves in sickness, and from their homes, proper medical attention, and they are therefore compelled to depend upon charity for their relief, or linger on for many days until they reach the hospital at Paducah. In the mean time disease is at work, and relief, when it does come, not unfrequently comes too late; and thus numbers every year perish—are sacrificed for the want of an institution for which this appropriation is asked at Evansville.

The estimate upon which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means relies for his statement of distances is incorrect. The distance from Louisville to Evansville is, as I before remarked, about two hundred miles, that from Evansville to Paducah about one hundred and fifty, and that from the last-named point to Napoleon, about four hundred and forty-eight miles. I am quite sure these are the accurate distances between these points, since I speak from actual knowledge and observation.

Evansville is the principal landing point for the whole Wabash country. A very large portion of the produce of the Wabash valley is exported to

New Orleans in flat-boats, the crews of which, upon their return, almost invariably land there, often late in the season, sick and in ill health, and in painful want of that relief and medical care and attention an hospital would afford them, and without which many of them suffer and die. Besides this, I hazard nothing in saying that a greater number of people land at that place than at any other point on the Ohio river below Louisville. It is a point, therefore, at which, for these and many other reasons I might enumerate, an hospital ought to be erected. I know it to be necessary, and if the majority of this House had witnessed the inconveniences, distress, and death, arising from the absence of that care which ought to be extended to this unfortunate class of our people by the establishment of an hospital there, I have no hesitation in saying that they would readily make the appropriation asked for by the amendment proposed by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. LOCKHART.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not intend to consume any more of the time of the committee than is necessary to enable me to refer to a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury upon this subject—not in reference to this particular item merely, but to the general subject of marine hospitals, about which, I think, we have committed many egregious errors. I called upon the Secretary of the Treasury by letter, to give me the exact distances between the hospitals situated between Pittsburg and New Orleans. There is a difference between my friend from Oregon, and the Secretary, as to these distances. The letter of the Secretary shows that Evansville is one hundred and fifty miles below Louisville, and one hundred and fifteen miles above Paducah. If I have committed an error, it is upon the authority of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, who himself has committed the error, if it be such. The letter says:

"There are two hospitals in operation on the Mississippi—one at Natchez, and the other at New Orleans, two hundred and seventy-five miles from each other—and one at Napoleon, Arkansas, and another at St. Louis, in course of erection. These are five hundred and forty miles apart, and Napoleon is two hundred and fifteen miles above Natchez, and three hundred and fifty miles below Paducah."

These things I obtained from the most authentic source I could resort to, and I based my remarks upon this document.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Does that letter say it is three hundred and fifty miles from Napoleon to Paducah?

Mr. HOUSTON. The letter says:

"There are two hospitals in operation on the Mississippi—one at Natchez, and the other at New Orleans, two hundred and seventy-five miles from each other—and one at Napoleon, Arkansas, and another at St. Louis, Missouri, in course of erection. These are five hundred and forty miles apart, and Napoleon is two hundred and fifteen miles above Natchez, and three hundred and fifty miles below Paducah. Authority has been given to erect a marine hospital at Vicksburg, Mississippi, also."

Mr. STANTON. That is very different from the understanding in my section of the country. It is two hundred miles from Memphis to Napoleon, and two hundred miles from Memphis to the mouth of the Ohio. So the Secretary is wrong in that particular.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is quite as probable that the Secretary of the Treasury, who has the data in his office, and who was called upon by a committee of this House for correct information in relation thereto, should furnish the correct distances, as that the gentleman from Memphis [Mr. STANTON] should do so, who only takes the hearsay of persons who travel up and down the river.

And it is very natural that my friend from Oregon [Mr. LANE] should make a mistake, for a man who wades down a river is apt to suppose it is really longer than it is, and a man who wades up makes it longer still, because he becomes more tired.

Mr. LANE, (interrupting.) I insist that no man shall charge me with mistaking the distance of places between Louisville and New Orleans.

Mr. HOUSTON. I give the distances which I obtained from authentic sources.

Mr. LANE. The information is not reliable.

Mr. HOUSTON. It may not be reliable, but it is authentic. I said I received the information from authentic sources, and I stated that I gave the distances as I obtained them from the Secretary of the Treasury. It may be incorrect, but I rely upon it.

The question then recurred upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LANE, there being no objection, withdrew his amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. LOCKHART, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS M. HOWE offered the following amendment, to come in at the end of the six hundred and forty-third line, as one of the clauses in relation to marine hospitals:

For completing the marine hospital at Pittsburg, heating and ventilating same, &c., as per estimate submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, $6,667.

Mr. H. said: I have before me the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, containing estimates of six or eight items, for completing the hospital at Pittsburg, purporting to be the estimates of the surveyor of that port, which have been examined by the Secretary of the Treasury, and recommended by him to the favorable consideration of this House.

The first item is for building a brick stable, $887. In reference to that item, I would say that the marine hospital at Pittsburg is located upon a lot of ground, comprising, I believe, ten acres. A portion of this ground is devoted to gardens, cultivated by persons at the hospital, and it is necessary to keep horses, carts, and other implements proper for carrying on that kind of business. There are no stables at present upon the grounds, and for that reason this appropriation has been recommended by the surveyor of the port of Pittsburg.

The second item is "for inside stairway opening to garret, lathing, and plastering, $393," which was doubtless made upon the estimate of a carpenter. The necessity for that item arises from the fact that there is no stairway adequate to approach the garret, and it is very necessary there should be one, as the water tanks used for supplying water for the establishment are placed either in the garret or on the roof, I do not know which, and it is necessary that they should be approachable.

The next item is "for forty feet of water pipe, and placing the same in the river, $40." This pipe is necessary for supplying the fountain with water.

The next item of $100 is for whitewashing fences.

The next "for planting shade and fruit trees, $600."

The next "for heating and ventilating building on modern plan, including cooking range, $4,540." The necessity for this item I do not propose to enlarge upon. They are thought to be necessary by the surveyor of the port and the superintendent of the hospital. They have been examined by the Treasury Department, the estimate approved of, and an appropriation recommended, and I hope it may receive a favorable consideration by the committee.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. LANE offered the following amendment, to come in at the end of the six hundred and forty-sixth line, among the appropriations for custom-houses:

For the construction of the custom-house at Astoria, Oregon, in addition to the $10,000 heretofore appropriated, $30,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. This custom-house was provided for by law at the last session of Congress, when there was an appropriation of $10,000, and this is an additional estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury to complete it.

Mr. LANE. The appropriation asked for by that amendment is based upon a recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. As yet there has been no custom-house erected in the Territory of Oregon. The sum of $30,000, in addition to the $10,000 already appropriated, the Secretary says will be sufficient to complete a fire-proof building suitable for a custom-house, and other purposes. I will read, with the permission of the committee, the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no necessity for the reading. The amendment is proper.

Mr. LANE. Very well, then.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to submit the following amendment, to come in after the one that has just been adopted:

For continuing the construction of the custom-house at Charleston, South Carolina, $200,000.

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania. I move the following amendment, to come in after the six hundred and forty-sixth line:

*Provided, That hereafter, in the assessment of duties, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the aid of the appraisers now provided for by law, to ascertain and establish the actual average values, or wholesale prices in the principal markets of the United States, during each fiscal year, commencing with the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852, of pig iron, wrought iron, manufactured by rolling, hammering, or drawing, of wire, rivets, spikes, chain cables, and glass, and upon such ascertained and established values, to levy, or cause to be levied, the ad valorem duties now established by law; any provision, by law or otherwise, to the contrary notwithstanding: *Provided further, That such other goods, wares, and merchandise, now or hereafter, subject to any ad valorem duty, as the Secretary of the Treasury may, from time to time, specify by public circular, to be published at least six months before it shall go into effect, shall be subject to the same mode of annual average valuations as the aforesaid.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. That amendment has nothing to do with the bill, and it has been so decided for three or four Congresses.

Mr. JONES. I will, then, merely refer to the matter as a question of order. With the Chair's permission, I will refer to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, passed July, 1846. A clause of that bill, the very basis of the act of 1846, was ruled to be in order, and that decision was sustained by the House. That clause is as follows:

"Sec. 2. *And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the assistant appraisers authorized by law at the port of New York, there may be appointed, in the mode now prescribed by law, one additional assistant appraiser at said port, at a salary, as heretofore established, of fifteen hundred dollars per annum, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: *Provided, Said salary shall not commence, or appointment take effect, prior to the 30th of November next, and in appraising all goods, at any port of the United States, heretofore subjected to specific duties, but upon which ad valorem duties are imposed by the act of the 30th of July last, entitled 'An act reducing the duty on imports, and for other purposes,' reference shall be had to values and invoices of similar goods imported during the last fiscal year, under such general and uniform regulations for the prevention of fraud or undervaluation as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

I raise the point that this is not a proposition to increase or diminish the revenue, but only to guard the Treasury against frauds. In 1846, when the law was passed I have alluded to, this very clause was ruled to be in order; and if the Chair now decides that it is not in order, I am—

Mr. BAYLY. Is discussion in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has indulged the gentleman from Pennsylvania in reference to any precedent he desired, for the purpose of sustaining his position, but discussion upon the question is not in order.

Mr. JONES. I understood that discussion was not in order. It is not my wish to occupy the time of the committee now, although I have not done so heretofore. I wish, however, to have this matter distinctly understood. I ask the indulgence of the committee to state that this is not a question of increasing or diminishing the revenue.

Mr. BAYLY. I hope the gentleman may be permitted to state his point fully.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg to say before I consent to the gentleman proceeding, that I want some gentleman—either myself or any other gentleman—to have the privilege of replying to the argument of the gentleman. I do not object to his discussing it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I object to all discussion upon the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is not in order. The question submitted for the decision of the Chair is, whether the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania be in order? In the opinion of the Chair, it is not in order. An amendment somewhat similar to this was submitted to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill of the last session of Congress, upon which a question of order was raised. The then chairman decided that the amendment was not in order. From that decision an appeal was taken, and sustained by the committee. Afterwards, upon three or four different occasions, that decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. JONES. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. I beg merely to state—

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal is not debatable except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. JONES. I then inquire of the Chair whether I have the right to state the grounds of my appeal?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir.

Mr. JONES. I will remark in one word, that the appeal was taken that the House might sustain its own precedents.

Mr. BAYLY. I desire to ask a question of the Chair. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that he desires the House to sustain its own precedents. I beg to know whether the provision of law, which the gentleman has read, was not put in the bill by the Senate, and not by this House, when the rules of order there and here were different?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I object to all further debate on this question.

The Clerk, at the request of several members, again read the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL of Illinois, and FOWLER, were appointed.

The question was then put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" and it was agreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 67, noes 64.

And the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. DUNHAM. I submit the following amendment, to come in after line six hundred and forty-six:

For purchasing a site and the construction of a suitable building at Wilmington, Delaware, for custom-house, post office, court rooms, and other offices of the United States, and furnishing the same, $25,000: Provided, That the said lot and building shall be exempted from city and all other taxes whatever by the act of the Legislature of Delaware: And provided further, That before the Secretary of the Treasury shall erect the said building it shall first be his duty to procure a proper site or lot of ground, and to make a contract or contracts for the erection of said building, and furnishing the same, at a sum or sums which shall not in the whole exceed the sum of $25,000 inclusive of said lot; while said contract or contracts shall be secured by good and sufficient sureties to the said Secretary of the Treasury and President of the United States.

Mr. SMART. I rise to a question of order. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana whether there is any law authorizing such an appropriation? If there is not, I object to the amendment.

Mr. DUNHAM. It is based upon a recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. Plans have been submitted, and estimates made.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Indiana, the gentleman from Maine raises a question of order.

Mr. DUNHAM. The amendment comes from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not alter the parliamentary law. The Chair rules the amendment out of order under the 81st rule, which provides that no appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, and be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

Mr. RIDDLE. From that decision I take an appeal. I do not rise to debate it. I hold the law of 1845 in my hand, which supersedes this one. It authorizes the President to submit plans and estimates before Congress shall make appropriations for the construction of custom-houses, or other public buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is out of order. The Chair rules that the amendment is not in order, and from that decision the gentleman from Delaware takes an appeal. The question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in under the head of custom-houses; which I fear, by the recent decision of the Chair, will not be in order. At all events, I will present it, and let it share its fate with the others:

For the erection of a building in the city of Philadelphia adapted for public store-houses, and the safe-keeping of goods deposited therein under the custom-house laws; the construction of the said building to be of such a character as to afford facilities for holding therein the courts of the United States, and which can also be adapted for the purpose of facilitating the business of the Philadelphia post office, $500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to decide that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I feared it. May I ask a question, if I cannot offer such an amendment, whether I can present a resolution that will be in order making such a provision?

The CHAIRMAN. A bill reported by any committee of this House making such a provision would be in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. It struck me that in the civil and diplomatic bill a provision might be made for erecting such a building.

The following section was then read:

Intercourse with foreign nations.

For salaries of ministers of the United States to Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, Spain, Brazil, Mexico, and Chili, $72,000.

For salaries of the secretaries of legation to the same places, $16,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I offer, under the instruction of the Committee of Ways and Means, the following amendment, to come in at the end of that section:

For outfits of the ministers of the United States to Great Britain, Prussia, and Mexico, $27,000.

I will send up to the Clerk a letter from the Secretary of State, which I ask may be read.

The following letter was then read:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, }
WASHINGTON, 22d July, 1852.

Sir: By direction of the President, I have the honor to inform you, and, through you, the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, that the Ministers of the United States at London, Berlin, and Mexico, have asked permission to return to this country, and are expected soon to do so.

It is, therefore, desirable that proper provision should be made for outfits for their successors.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. HUNTER, Acting Secretary.

Hon. GEORGE S. HOUSTON,
Chairman Committee of Ways and Means, H. R.

The question was then taken on Mr. HOUSTON's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. GOODENOW. I move to amend the following clause: "For salary of the Commissioner to the Sandwich Islands, $3,000;" by striking out "three" and inserting "five."

The amendment which I propose is to increase the salary of the Commissioner at the Sandwich Islands from $3,000 to $5,000. In April last, the attention of the Secretary of State was called to the necessity of such an increase. On the 29th of April he addressed a letter to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations on that subject. The honorable chairman informed me—owing to the multiplicity of business, I presume—that he did not bring that subject definitely before that committee. In his letter, the Secretary of State recommends the increase proposed by the amendment which I have offered. The necessity of an increase of the salary of the Commissioner at the Sandwich Islands, I think will be obvious to any gentleman who will examine the facts contained in the letters and papers which I hold in my hand, and the extracts from letters submitted by the honorable Secretary of State to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Since the discovery of gold in California, the expenses of living at Honolulu have increased very much, and they are now, as I am informed, nearly as great as at San Francisco. The salary now given to the Commissioner is not sufficient for the support of his wife and family of four children. The present Commissioner is known to be an economical man, but his hospitality is taxed greatly by the increased number of citizens of this country who call there. It is true that he never fails to afford that hospitality. I may here be permitted to refer to some of the items of expense. Butter is fifty cents a pound, eggs fifty cents a dozen, fire-wood eight dollars a cord. The actual expenses of living at Honolulu are now greater than the expense of living at any city in the United States, with the exception, perhaps, of cities upon the Pacific. They are greater than the expenses of living in London or Paris. There is no outfit or anything allowed to the Commissioner. Out of his salary of $3,000 he is to pay the expenses of his voyage and that of his family. I am well convinced, if I could have directed the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means to the consideration of this subject, through the Committee on Foreign Relations, that they would have recommended this appropriation. I endeavored to do so, but, unfortunately, for the reason I have before stated, I have been unsuccessful. I hope the committee will adopt the amendment. I think it is the least which the justice of the case requires. I would be glad if they would go further, and allow the same compensation to be given from the commencement of the commission of the present Commissioner. I have not asked it. I have asked what I deem to be just and right. I believe that the Committee of Ways and Means will sustain me in the statements which I have made.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I desire to understand from the gentleman from Maine [Mr. GOODENOW] whether this is meant to be retrospective or prospective?

Mr. GOODENOW. Prospective.

Mr. BAYLY. I have no doubt whatever that the salary of a great many of our foreign agents ought to be increased; and this, among others, might be increased with advantage. There have been recommendations in respect to almost all the foreign ministers. With but one single exception, however, and that will be explained when I move in the matter, the committee did not think it expedient to recommend an increase of these salaries. I doubt whether this case stands upon a stronger footing than the other cases with one single exception.

Mr. BROOKS. I propose to amend by adding one dollar. I think this a peculiar case. At the time when this salary of $3,000 was fixed, everything was lower in the Pacific than in other parts of the world. The prices of provisions were low, transportation was low. Since that time, from the discovery of gold in California, everything has been doubled or trebled in price; but the salary of the Commissioner stands exactly as it was. It is impossible for a gentleman to live adequately upon a salary of $3,000 at Honolulu. On account of the increase of Americans visiting there, the increase of population going to those islands, and the general importance of the Pacific to us, it is important that we should raise the salary of this Commissioner. I have further to say upon that point—I ask the attention of Democrats upon the other side of the House to the fact, that last year—and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who was then the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, will bear me out in the fact—the then Committee of Ways and Means increased nearly double the salary of Mr. Eames, now one of the editors of the Union, of which I hold the proof in my hand, upon the ground that it was impossible for him to be adequately supported in that place for double the amount of pay. The Whigs in the Committee of Ways and Means, and the Whigs in the House, agreed in that proposition, and voted for it without any serious opposition, from the evidence of the fact that it was necessary to be done. In the case of some gentleman before him—Mr. Ten Eyck, of Michigan, I believe—a like additional appropriation was made, and the House agreed in voting this additional sum. It seems to me as a matter of political and pecuniary justice that it is our duty to do the like thing in the case of the present Commissioner, not only because we have done it heretofore, but because under the existing circumstances it would be impossible for a gentleman properly to discharge his duties to his country upon that salary alone.

Mr. CLARK. What is the condition of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment to the amendment pending. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. GOODENOW] proposes to strike out the word "three," and insert "five."

Mr. BROOKS, there being no objection, withdrew his amendment.

The question was then taken upon Mr. GOODENOW's amendment, and it was agreed to.

The following clause of the bill was then read by the Clerk, viz:

"For salary of a Commissioner to reside in China, including the additional compensation under the act to carry into effect certain provisions in the treaties between the United States and China and the Ottoman Porte, $6,000."

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I am instructed by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to move to amend the clause which has just been read, by inserting the words "outfit and" before the word "salary," and by striking out "six" and inserting "eighteen" in lieu thereof. In proposing this amendment, we have responded to the recommendation of the President in his last annual message, where he says:

"The office of Commissioner to China remains unfilled; several persons have been appointed, and the place has been offered to others, all of whom have declined its acceptance, on the ground of the inadequacy of the compensation. The annual allowance by law is $6,000, and there is no provision for any outfit. I earnestly recommend the consideration of this subject to Congress. Our commerce with China is highly important, and is becoming more and more so, in consequence of the increasing intercourse between our ports on the Pacific coast and Eastern Asia. China is understood to be a country in which living is very expensive, and I know of no reason why the American Commissioners sent there should not be placed, in regard to compensation, on an equal footing with ministers who represent this country at the courts of Europe."

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion—and I do not state my opinion hastily or lightly—there is no mission that we have abroad that is more important than our mission to China. With our possessions on the Pacific, and the new career of commerce that is opening in that direction, I know of no place where it is more important to have an enlightened and able man than in China. It seems, from the President's message, that there has been great difficulty in getting such a man to go there, and I am not surprised at it. It is four or five months' sea-voyage to get there, and as many to get back. It is amongst a people where there is nothing interesting to carry a man. It is not like the mission to Rome, or Naples, or England, or France; but it is a pure duty of patriotism for any man to consent to go upon a mission of this sort. I therefore entirely concur in the recommendation of the President, and I am instructed, by the unanimous voice of the committee over which I preside, to offer this amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe myself that the compensation of the Commissioner to China ought to be increased. I am satisfied, as I presume every member of this committee is satisfied, that it is too small. But I had hoped that the Committee on Foreign Affairs would have presented some other plan for compensating our foreign ministers than the present one. I had hoped they would have brought forward some system or other, by which we could have given them an ample compensation without holding out the inducement of an outfit for gentlemen to come home and go out half a dozen times during an Administration. I do not speak of this in reference to the present Administration, but as an evil that exists in this country, and that ought to be remedied by Congress in some way or other. We have just agreed to an amendment appropriating $27,000 for outfits for the three ministers to succeed gentlemen who are coming home. One of them proposes, I think, to come home in October, but a few months before the Administration must change in some way or other. Gentlemen on the other side of the House smile. I think it will change to Democratic; but then whether it does or not, the Presidency will pass from its present incumbent, and as a matter of course, there will be a change of Administration but a few months at the outside, after these ministers come home. It seems to me to be a great waste of money, and that there is a defect in the system by which they are paid. I think they ought to have salaries, and I was in hopes that the Committee on Foreign Relations would have proposed to have given an ample salary in this case. I think these ministers ought to be well paid. I propose to pay them well, but I do not want them to start out a month or two before the Administration must pass into the hands of another party, or of another President and get $9,000 outfit and salary for staying away less than a twelvemonth.

I do not say that this evil has commenced under the present Administration. On the contrary, I know that it existed before, and I know, from evidence upon which I can rely, that the present President of the United States has had some difficulty on this point, in keeping foreign ministers from returning home, and that upon more than one occasion he has refused the necessary permission to come home. For that I give him credit. But then it seems to me that there is some defect in the system, and I was in hopes that the Committee on Foreign Affairs would have remedied it.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order. I submit that this amendment is not in order, for the reason that this House is bound to know who are the foreign ministers, and that the Constitution prohibits any member of Congress from taking an office, the compensation of which is fixed during the term for which he was elected.

The second clause of the sixth section of the Constitution is as follows:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is not for the Chair to determine whether a law is constitutional or not; it is for the Judiciary, or for the Executive, or for each member when he is called upon to vote. The Chair, therefore, rules the amendment in order.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. HEBARD. I wish to submit an amendment to a clause which has been passed, to come in after line six hundred and fifty-five.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment cannot be received except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HAMILTON. I object.

Mr. HEBARD. I am sure no gentleman would object, if he knew the object for which the amendment is intended, and the circumstances under which it is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. HAMILTON. No, sir, it is not.

Mr. HEBARD. May I be permitted to state the nature of the amendment which I desire to offer?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order, and could only be allowed by unanimous consent.

[Cries of "Object!"]

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to offer the following amendment:

To Colin M. Ingersoll, late Secretary of Legation, at Russia, the sum of $1,041 67, the same being for his services as acting Chargé d'Affaires from the 15th of August, 1848, to the 15th of January, 1849.

I desire to say, in respect to this amendment, that it is pretty much the voluntary action of the committee, and that it is in accordance with the universal practice of the Government. I know nearly a hundred cases of the sort. Where a Secretary of Legation has discharged the duties of Chargé d'Affaires, it has been the invariable custom, I believe, to give him, in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, the salary of the office the duties of which he has actually discharged. That is Mr. Ingersoll's case; and, with the exception of one vote, there was no difference of opinion in the Committee on Foreign Affairs in regard to this amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like the gentleman from Virginia to change the phraseology of this amendment in some way. We have thus far in this appropriation bill, kept out any appropriation to individuals for private claims. If the gentleman will so modify the amendment as to read: "For compensation of the acting Chargé d'Affaires at Russia from the 15th of August, 1848, to the 15th of January, 1849," &c., I have no objection to it.

Mr. BAYLY. I accept that modification.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, as modified, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, under instructions of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, offered the following amendment:

To compensate Dabney S. Carr, for expenses incurred while in the diplomatic service of the country, to be allowed in the settlement of his accounts with the Government, $7,144.

Mr. B. said: Mr. Chairman, in the settlement of the accounts of Mr. Carr at the State Department, he was disallowed some items to which the Committee on Foreign Affairs thought he was equitably entitled.

In the first place, it seems by the records in this case, that it is regarded as a matter of diplomatic etiquette at the court of the Sublime Porte, that presents should be given to his dragoman. He gave a watch, for which he paid $150. Such a present is a usual and customary one; indeed, it is an incidental expense to his mission. It was, however, disallowed at the State Department. But the most important item is this: Mr. Carr, on his arrival there, found a second dragoman in the regular employment of the Legation, under the instructions of the Secretary of State. It was a

Mr. Porter—I believe a son of Commodore Porter. He had been employed, under the instructions of the Secretary of State, at the rate of $92 per month. Mr. Carr continued to pay him as such, taking it for granted that he ought not to change the statutes in the case. Well, sir, when he came to settle his accounts the whole of the item was disallowed him by the proper department, amounting to $4,600.

Besides that, there were great irregularities in the conduct of our consul at Syria, and he was instructed to go there and investigate the matter. While on that mission he incurred, as his vouchers show, an actual expense of $1,128. His expenses at the same time were going on at Constantinople. All this was an extra duty, and there is no appropriation to cover the expenditure; hence the item was disallowed. By a law of Congress, which made no appropriation, the Minister at Turkey was allowed an extra salary of $1,000 for judicial services, defined by the act of the 11th of August, 1848. But there being no appropriation that item was also disallowed. In the adjustment, for these causes, they brought Mr. Carr in debt upon his settlement, to the amount of $3,883, and that balance stands against him upon the books of the Treasury to this day. This was in consequence of these disallowances; and the Committee on Foreign Affairs recommend that he be allowed these four items: $150 for a watch and snuff-box; the money that he paid to the second dragoman whom he found there in the employment of the legation, under the instructions of the Secretary of State—and if there was any violation of law in it, it was the Secretary's violation and not his; his expenses to Syria to investigate the conduct of our consul there; and the additional salary for judicial services. If gentlemen will examine this amendment, they will find that it is guarded properly. It provides that the sum shall be paid in settlement of his accounts. There is a balance against him of $3,882; so that but little money will have to be paid out of the Treasury.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall be compelled to present to the Chair a point of order connected with this amendment. This is evidently, in all aspects, a private claim, and cannot be otherwise. I should have presented the same point with reference to other amendments. It is important, as it seems to me, that the general appropriation bills should be kept free from such amendments as pertain to private legislation. I regard this as much a private claim as if one of the workmen in the employment of the Government should fail to receive a part of his salary. All private claims rest upon the same foundation.

The CHAIRMAN. Although this appropriation may appear in the nature of a private claim, yet the Chair is not prepared to say that it is not an expenditure of money authorized under existing laws; and if there are existing laws authorizing this expenditure, this may be one of the methods to which he may resort to obtain an appropriation for that purpose. The Chair is, however, somewhat in doubt upon this point.

Mr. GENTRY. It seems to me that this is eminently a public claim, and by no means a private one. It is a claim arising out of our diplomatic relations with foreign nations. It is eminently a public claim, and there is no better place to provide for it than in a general appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a fact stated by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] himself. He states that the law does not allow for the settlement of this account. I think the gentleman's statement itself shows that the amount is not in order to a general appropriation bill.

Mr. BAYLY. I beg my friend's pardon. There is a large item in the amount for which there is an express law; but the difficulty is that there is no appropriation to execute it. Another item is incidental to our diplomatic intercourse, and we have the same right to put it in the civil and diplomatic bill as we have an item of custom-house expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in doubt in relation to this matter; but will entertain the amendment, believing that at least a portion of the items in it are authorized by existing laws.

The question was then put upon the adoption of the amendment, and upon a division, 30 rose in the affirmative.

Mr. BAYLY demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. LANDRY, and STANTON of Tennessee, were appointed.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 56.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. HEBARD submitted the following amendment:

For salary of the Minister Resident at Turkey, in addition to the salary already allowed, $3,000.

Mr. H. said: Mr. Chairman, I think there can be no objection to the amendment if it is understood; and I think there will be no difficulty in understanding it.

Mr. HOUSTON. We have passed the section of the bill making appropriation for the salary of the Minister at Turkey. We cannot now recur to it for the purpose of amendment.

Mr. BAYLY. I ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HEBARD] to indulge me a single moment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to the amendment, unless the Chair rules it to be in order. We have passed the section of the bill to which it refers, and I object to returning to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks an additional sum may be appropriated.

Mr. BAYLY. I now ask the gentleman from Vermont to yield to me for a moment. I find that in the amendment which has just been adopted upon my motion, there is one item to which there is great objection—that for the purchase of the watch and snuff-box. I think the item is a perfectly proper one; but as gentlemen around me seem to regard it as rather irregular, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to strike that item out of the amendment to reduce it $150.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the reduction cannot be made.

Mr. HEBARD. I have submitted an amendment to which I think there can be no objection upon the part of a single member of the House. I should have offered this as an amendment to the clause to which it properly pertains when that clause was under consideration, if I had not seen a disinclination to adopt amendments to this bill generally; but when the committee came to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] in relation to the Minister to China, increasing his compensation virtually from $6,000 to $18,000, I think there can be no objection to increasing the salary of our Minister at Turkey from $6,000 to $9,000. He is a person who has been selected for his known and eminent literary and political qualifications. He has discharged his duties there with credit to himself, and a vast deal of importance to the country.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask whether the gentleman from Vermont is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he is proceeding in order.

Mr. HAMILTON. Does the Chair entertain his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does entertain his proposition.

Mr. HOUSTON. I submit to the Chair that we have passed the only clause of the bill to which that can be offered as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it will be in order to offer at the end of the bill amendments providing for the increase of salary of every officer of the Government, if any gentleman shall think proper to do so.

Mr. HEBARD. I am much surprised the chairman of Ways and Means should raise an objection to this amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CLARK. I rise to a question of order. I submit that it is too late to appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Alabama could not have exactly understood his ruling upon this amendment. He will allow the appeal to be made.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HEBARD] submitted an amendment making an appropriation for the salary of the Minister Resident at Turkey, in addition to the salary already allowed, $3,000.

Mr. LETCHER. I wish to inquire if the Chair did not decide the day before yesterday, when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAR-SHALL] desired to offer an amendment in relation to the salaries of the judges, that the section to which it would apply had been passed, and that we could not return to it, nor could it be offered as an amendment to any other section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did so decide. The gentleman will also recollect that the Chair made a like decision yesterday, which the committee reversed. The decision of the Chair is now in accordance with the decision of the committee upon the other point of order.

The gentleman from Alabama raises the question of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont is not in order. The Chair decides that it is in order. From that decision the gentleman from Alabama takes an appeal. The question therefore is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to consume the time of the committee. I will withdraw my appeal.

Mr. HEBARD. I was much surprised that there should be an objection raised to an amendment so reasonable in its character as this. As a matter of form it appears not to be objectionable.

I had proceeded to remark that he had discharged the duties of his office thus far with great credit and benefit to the country; and it has been well ascertained that he is now supporting himself at his own expense; that his salary is altogether inadequate to his support, in the style that we should expect and require of one of our servants in the capacity in which he is acting. I hope, sir, that this country will not expect or require that their foreign ministers—at least when put upon a salary that is far below that of others of the same importance—shall be obliged to sustain themselves out of their own private means. The amount contained in my amendment is the same as that to which the salary of the Minister to China has been just now raised, and which has put him upon an equality with the most favored ministers.

I have left out, entirely, an appropriation for an outfit, and have merely asked that he shall have the usual salary, leaving the outfit of $9,000 out. I trust that the same kind of justice that has been meted out to the Minister to China, will be here measured out to the Minister to Turkey.

Mr. HOUSTON. This proposition comes from the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HEBARD] himself without any examination by a committee of this House; and the Committee on Foreign Affairs, if they examined it at all, are opposed to it, because they have not offered any amendment to attain that end. It is proposed to raise the salary of the Resident Minister at Constantinople, without any knowledge upon the part of this House, except what the gentleman [Mr. HEBARD] has stated; and I suppose he has stated what he has upon such information as he has been able to obtain, aside from any official knowledge in the possession of a committee. It is a proposition to increase the salary of a minister without any examination by a committee, and without a recommendation from any of the departments of the Government; and it seems to me that such a mode of doing business is wrong; and I hope it will not be adopted, because we ought to have some more reliable, some official information to guide our judgment.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. HEBARD, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. APPLETON, of Maine. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to offer an amendment, to come in at the end of the six hundred and eighty-eighth line, amongst the appropriations for foreign ministers:

The amendment was read as follows:

To the Secretary of Legation at the Court of St. James, for services as Chargé d'Affaires at said Court, from the 31st of August, 1849, to the 11th of October, 1849, $301 32.

Mr. A. said: That amendment sufficiently explains itself. It is an amendment resting upon precisely the same principles that we adopted a few moments ago, in relation to the salary of the legation at Russia.

The facts stated in the amendment have been verified at the Departments, and the principle has been sanctioned heretofore by many preceding Congresses, and has again been just sanctioned by this committee. I suppose the amendment recommends itself, and that I need not take up the time of the committee by further remarks.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. APPLETON] whether the salary of charge for the time covered by his amendment has been drawn by anybody else, and I desire him to state where the Minister himself was during that time?

Mr. APPLETON. This is one of those cases when there was an interim between the departure of the preceding Minister and the arrival of the succeeding one.

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment—

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. HART and CHANDLER were appointed.

Mr. HOUSTON. Rather than consume the time of the committee, I would be willing to give it up as carried.

Mr. BAYLY. The amendment is right, and let us have a count.

The CHAIRMAN. A count must be had, unless by the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. KING, of New York. I do not give it up, and demand a count.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 41.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. APPLETON offered the following amendment, to come in at the same place as the preceding one:

And that the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized to allow to Lieutenant D. D. Porter, of the United States Navy, the sum of $699, being the amount of certain items suspended in his account, which were incurred while he was on duty, by direction of the Navy Department, in ascertaining the political condition of St. Domingo in the year 1846.

Mr. A. said: This subject has been investigated by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and they have directed me to submit this amendment. The circumstances of the case are these: In 1846, as will be remembered by some gentlemen in this House, there was a division existing among the population of the Island of St. Domingo. The Dominicans, as they were called, had then assumed an important character; and it was believed by the Government that it was advisable to ascertain, more definitely than we could through the public prints—

Mr. LETCHER, (interrupting.) I rise to a question of order. Is that amendment in order? Is it not strictly a private claim?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. APPLETON. The duties performed were of a diplomatic character, and they were performed in the public service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know of any law which authorized that service to be performed. I believe the gentleman from Maine [Mr. APPLETON] has not stated whether this service was performed in pursuance of any existing law or not.

Mr. APPLETON. They were so performed by virtue of existing laws, although it was in the power of that man, it was worth his commission to disobey the order which carried him there.

Mr. BAYLY. It does not stand at all upon the footing of a private claim. It is the case of a public officer, not asking compensation for private services, but the payment of public expense. The appropriation is to carry on one of the Departments of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. APPLETON] proposes to compensate a lieutenant in the Navy of the United States for the performance of some duties of a quasi diplomatic character. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment is not in order.

Mr. APPLETON. I appeal from that decision.

The question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. GENTRY. I desire to offer an amendment, if it is in order.

Mr. BAYLY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GENTRY. I will.

Mr. BAYLY. I desire to offer the following amendment. It is the same as the one offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. APPLETON,] with the exception that it reduces the amount one dollar:

And that the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized to allow to Lieutenant D. D. Porter, of the United States Navy, the sum of $698, being the amount of certain items suspended in his account, which were incurred while he was on duty by direction of the Navy Department, in ascertaining the political condition of St. Domingo, in the year 1846.

Mr. B. said: My object in offering this amendment is to renew the appeal, because the decision of the Chair is against the uniform practice of this House.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair makes the same decision that he did when the amendment was offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. APPLETON,] that the amendment is out of order, on the ground that it is a private claim; and that it is not, in his opinion, to compensate an officer for services required to be performed by an existing law.

Mr. BAYLY. I appeal from the decision, and I desire the rule in relation to the kind of amendments which are in order upon civil and diplomatic bills, to be read. The amendment is to carry out an existing law—

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order for the gentleman to debate the appeal.

Mr. BAYLY. But I have a right to state my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman must confine himself strictly to the statement of the point.

Mr. BAYLY. I think we labor under a misunderstanding—

Mr. LETCHER. I call the gentleman to order. Mr. BAYLY. I ask the gentleman to reduce his point of order to writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. BAYLY. No, sir. That is not the question. I want the point of order raised by my colleague [Mr. LETCHER] reduced to writing.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a question of order already pending.

Mr. BAYLY. Then I am entitled to the floor to state my point of order. My point of order is—

Mr. LETCHER. I have reduced the point of order to writing. It is for reflections upon the conduct of the Chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYLY. I rise, sir, to a question of fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia will suspend. He is not in order.

Mr. BAYLY. If the fact is as my colleague has stated, I am out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot now entertain the point of order submitted by the gentleman upon the left of the Chair, [Mr. LETCHER,] because the committee is already acting upon a question of order presented for the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BAYLY. If the Chair will allow me, I will state that under the 81st rule of the House, which I claim may be read, any amendment is in order to a civil and diplomatic bill which is to carry out an existing law, or to carry on one of the Departments of the Government. Now I say, that under the head to carry on one of the Departments, the amendment is in order.

Mr. HOUSTON, (in his seat.) The gentleman is arguing again.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to his point.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a point of order. No gentleman can object unless he rises in his place. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] submitted the amendment which has been reported by the Clerk. The Chair rules that the amendment is out of order; that it is not in accordance with the 81st rule, which the gentleman desires shall be read. It is this: "No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law," &c. The Chair decides that the expenditure proposed in the amendment is not authorized by law.

Mr. BAYLY. The whole of the rule has not been read. I ask that it be read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule.

Mr. AVERETT. I rise, Mr. Chairman, also for the purpose of submitting a point of order. I object to the reading of the rule, and to all debate upon a question which the Chair has decided, and which decision the committee have sustained on an appeal taken therefrom. The question is dead by the action of the committee, and the appeal of my colleague [Mr. BAYLY] is another appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Two questions of order cannot be pending at the same time. The remainder of the 81st rule is as follows:

"Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government."

The question was then put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"—and it was agreed to.

Mr. GENTRY. I am not sure whether it is in order or not, but I offer the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That all clerks, messengers, and laborers, employed in the legislative and executive departments of the Government in the city of Washington, whose compensation is less than $3,000 per annum, shall, in addition thereto, be allowed the following annual increase of compensation, commencing from the first day of the last fiscal year, viz: All whose annual compensation does not exceed $1,200, twenty per cent.; all whose annual compensation exceeds $1,200, and does not exceed $1,600, an addition of fifteen per cent.; and all whose annual compensation exceeds $1,600, and does not exceed $2,000, an addition of ten per cent.—the amount of the increased compensation provided for in this section to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. This will come in as an additional section, and the Chair would suggest to the gentleman, that it would be more appropriately submitted after we get through with the first section of the bill.

Mr. GENTRY. I will comply with the suggestion of the Chair. I wish merely the attention of the committee directed to the amendment. I withdraw it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to strike from the bill the following:

Provided, That the proviso to the item of appropriation for a like purpose, contained in the act of March 3d, 1851, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending June 30th, 1852, and for other purposes,' in the following words, viz: 'That no land bounty for military services granted by the act of 28th of September, 1850, entitled 'An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States,' or by virtue of any other act of Congress heretofore passed, granting land bounties for military services, shall be satisfied out of any public land not heretofore brought into market, and now subject to entry at private sale, under existing laws,' be and the same is hereby repealed.

Mr. AVERETT. Do I understand the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means as moving to strike out the provision of this bill which repeals the proviso to the civil and diplomatic bill of the last session in regard to land warrants?

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose to strike it out, for the reason that the proviso in the bill of the last was repealed by the bounty land act of this session, and there is, therefore, no necessity for this provision.

The question was put, and the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line seven hundred and fifty-three:

For the payment of the balance due for surveying done in the State of Mississippi in the year 1841, $701 42.

Mr. Chairman, the surveyor general of Mississippi in 1841 employed some deputies to execute the balance of the surveying in that State. The fund was exhausted without their being compensated. From that day to this, they have petitioned the Department for payment. In March last I sent the papers in this case to the Committee of Ways and Means. They were intrusted to the inspection of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. HIBBARD,] a member of the committee. He is now, unfortunately, absent from the Hall, confined to his room by indisposition. If he had been here, he would have offered this amendment, and made the explanation I make. These parties executed the work, and I have the following official letter, to which I invite the attention of the committee:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, March 13, 1852.

Sir: I have the honor to return herewith the petition of J. Monet and Elihu Carver, left by you at this office for examination on the 4th instant, together with Mr. Monet's letter of the 20th ultimo.

The petitioners claim that the Government owes them a balance of $987 64, for surveying in Mississippi in 1841, which the surveyor general refused to pay, and which they now ask from Congress, the office of the surveyor general of Mississippi having been closed under the operation of the act of 12th of June, 1840. The grounds on which payment was refused are fully set forth in the accompanying statement, to which your attention is respectfully invited. These grounds are not deemed sufficient by this office, after a careful examination of all the facts at hand.

In 1848, the surveyor general approved and certified the plats of the surveys for which they claim payment, and those plats are now of official record for the government of the action of this office and that of the local office in Mississippi, in the sale of the lands surveyed by them.

The real balance due to Carver and Monet is deemed, however, to be less than the amount claimed, by $286 23, for reasons set forth in the accompanying statement, the amount regarded as due being $701 42, but which can, under existing circumstances, only be paid through legislative interference, there being no appropriation applicable to the service.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. BUTTERFIELD, Commissioner.
Hon. A. G. Brown, House of Representatives.

I suppose, sir, with this explanation there can be no difficulty about the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] for the simple reason that it is not our policy to pay what we owe at all. [Laughter.] It is not the policy of this Government to pay such small debts of this character, because we know that these poor devils of surveyors cannot get the money. Under the circumstances I unite with the Ways and Means and say, that we cannot be compelled to pay it. [Laughter.] I am against the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will state a fact in this connection. The Committee of Ways and Means did not act upon this case.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not said it did.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to submit a fact, with the permission of the gentleman, as his time has not expired.

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. These estimates were referred to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. HIBBARD,] a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, but were not returned to the committee at all. His health became bad. As I understand the facts of the case, the surveys were originally declared to be defective by the Land Office, and that it resisted payment for them for several years. Not long since—I do not remember the exact time—the Land Office adopted those surveys and they are now using them. Under such circumstances, that office would pay for these surveys, had the money been appropriated.

The question was then taken and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. FITCH. I propose after the following: "For compensation to the door-keeper of the President's House, $500," to add:

And assistant door-keeper, the sum of $365.

I have been requested to offer that amendment. It is a small matter, but as I understand, just and proper. The paragraph in the bill compensates a door-keeper. There are two door-keepers—a principal and an assistant. Without providing for the pay of the assistant, we do a very great wrong either to these individuals, or to the President. Two door-keepers at the President's are absolutely required. We compel these two to divide the $500, or the President to pay one out of his own pocket. I do not think any gentleman will, under the circumstances, say the salary was too high.

Mr. HOUSTON. There was an estimate for the assistant door-keeper. The matter was referred to my friend from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] the friend of the President. He reported, that it was not usual to make the appropriation, and that the President did not ask it. In that view of the case, the committee did not make an appropriation for the assistant.

Mr. GENTRY. The President might feel a delicacy in asking for this small appropriation.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from Alabama is substantially correct. The President felt a delicacy in asking for any such appropriation on the part of Congress.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no objection to it. It was not usual, and for that reason the gentleman reported against it.

The question was taken, and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I submit the following amendment:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to purchase a suitable number of iron settees to be placed in the public grounds at the Capitol and the President's House, the sum of $840.

The question was taken, and the amendment adopted.

The following section was then read:

"For compensation of four draw-keepers, and for fuel and oil for the lamps of the Potomac bridge, $1,753."

Mr. FITCH. I move to strike out this clause. It is notorious that that bridge is no longer in existence, and hence, where is the necessity of paying this money?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am willing to strike it out if the committee so decide. There is one draw on this side of the river, and it is important that that should be kept up. The channel in which vessels pass up and down, is on this side of the river. One draw has been washed away.

Mr. BOWIE. I offer an appropriation of $20,000 for the repair of that bridge. It is necessary to keep up the connection between the two shores.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Bowie] is not in order.

The question was then taken on Mr. FITCH's motion to strike out, and it was agreed to.

The following section was then read:

"For compensation of two draw-keepers, and for fuel and oil for lamps of the two bridges across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac river, $900."

Mr. BOWIE. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of that section:

For the repairs of the two bridges over the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, $5,000.

We are informed by the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, that the bridges across the Eastern Branch are in a precarious and dangerous condition, and that they require the sum of $5,000 to put them in repair. These bridges, like the Potomac bridge, are public highways, and have become the property of the United States; and it is obviously proper that they should be sustained and kept in order; otherwise human life would be exposed to peril. I hope that this House, inasmuch as the Government has incurred the expense of constructing these bridges, will not permit them to rot down. We are informed by the local superintendent, that they are in a dangerous condition, and will require this sum in order to keep them up.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish merely to say, in opposition to that amendment, that it is but two or three years since we paid $30,000 for those bridges, and we have made appropriations since for their repair.

Mr. BOWIE demanded tellers upon his amendment; which were not ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There was an appropriation at the last Congress of $4,000 for those bridges.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I submit a similar amendment, with $500 additional. I do so because the Commissioner of Public Buildings, who has charge of these bridges, and the Secretary of the Interior, who reported to this House the estimates for their repair, both presented to the Committee on Public Buildings an estimate of the expense, amounting to some $8,000. The same estimates were presented to the Committee of Ways and Means. The Committee of Ways and Means thought proper to repudiate nearly all the recommendations of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, as well as the Secretary of the Interior, for the improvement of the public grounds and the public buildings of the Government, accepting and reporting to the House only a very inconsiderable portion of them, and such only as they could not possibly reject. The Commissioner of Public Buildings reports that those two bridges which have been bought by the Government of the United States for the accommodation of citizens of Maryland and the District interested, are in such a condition that it is absolutely dangerous to the lives of the market-men and others who come to this city and pass over it with their wagons.

Mr. HEBARD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman, if he knows whether the appropriation made by the last Congress has been expended?

Mr. STANTON. I have no doubt that it has been expended, and the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings will show that it has been expended, economically and judiciously.

Mr. HEBARD. I wish to inquire further, what are the particular repairs required?

Mr. STANTON. I suppose that the timbers have rotted, and it has become necessary to supply new ones.

Mr. HEBARD. It wants building over.

Mr. STANTON. It wants a thorough repairing. I will make this further remark, that before the late disasters to the Potomac bridge, the Commissioner of Public Buildings sent to the Committee on Public Buildings of the House a statement showing the condition of that bridge. If the Government of the United States, who erected that bridge for the accommodation of the public, had taken the proper means to keep it in good repair, the disaster which resulted in its destruction would not have occurred. I have no doubt that, unless this appropriation be made to keep up these bridges, in a short time they will share the same fate of the one across the Potomac. These bridges originally belonged to private corporations, who were taxing the citizens of this city and those upon the opposite side of the river a large amount for the passage over. They had been in existence a great many years, and were in a bad condition when the Government bought them. Four thousand dollars has since been appropriated for the purpose of repairing them. That sum has not proved sufficient, and the Commissioner of Public Buildings, who visits them daily, says that, unless they are repaired, danger must ensue to those who travel over them. I hope that the House will adopt the amendment, as it is reasonable and just.

Mr. FICKLIN. I trust that this amendment will not be adopted. It is, as was stated by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] but two or three years ago since these bridges were purchased; probably by an appropriation at the long session of the last Congress. They were purchased upon the special application and importunity of the owners of these bridges, who wished to dispose of them. At the last session of Congress there was an appropriation of some $4,000, as I understand it, for the repair of these bridges. How has that money been expended? is a question that has been well asked by the honorable gentleman from Vermont over the way. What has been done with that money?

Mr. BOWIE. I will answer the question by reading a paragraph from the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, which shows that the bridge across the Potomac is unsafe for the passage of any wagon.

[Mr. B. here read an extract from the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, showing the necessity before the bridge was carried away of making an appropriation for its repair.]

Mr. FICKLIN. The paragraph read is in relation to the Potomac bridge, and not the Eastern Branch.

The point I wish to arrive at is this: that we are asked blindly to appropriate money here, without knowing how this money is to be expended. What good is to be effected by it? What is to be accomplished by the use of that money? If we are to appropriate money here, let us first know what we are to do.

The question was then taken on Mr. STANTON'S amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I propose the following:

For the repair of the two bridges over the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, $4,500; and that the Secretary of the Interior be required, in the expenditure of the same, to make a regular report to the next succeeding Congress, or the next session, if in time.

At this very time there is an increase of from ten to thirty-three and a third per cent. in the expenses of living in this city, mainly in consequence of the loss of one bridge; and they would be largely increased in the loss of another bridge, so that the country would be deprived of all facilities for furnishing you supplies. Any man who has kept house in this District must be aware of the extraordinary prices at which everything is sold. The constant complaint of boarding-house keepers pierce our ears with the constant declarations that they are making nothing by boarding; while, at the same time, we are throwing it back upon them, that they are taking every thing we get here.

A VOICE. There is always a ground for grumbling.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir, there is always a ground to those who want justice done; but there is never a ground for those who never want to do it.

Mr. SMART. The landlords are always complaining.

Mr. JOHNSON. No man would be more ready to do it than my honorable friend who comes, I believe, from somewhere very far off, but I cannot exactly say where.

Mr. SMART. Look in the geography.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not mean any unkindness to the gentleman. I know him well. He is a very good Free-Soiler. Sir, these bridges are necessary to the citizens of the District, and we shall be compelled to raise the salaries of those who are in the employment of the Government here, to enable them to live, unless we will discharge the duty which we have heretofore undertaken, which will enable them to be connected with the balance of humanity.

Mr. SKELTON. I am opposed to the adoption of this amendment for two reasons. The gentleman from Arkansas says these bridges are falling down, and that the people of the District are suffering in consequence. I would ask the gentleman, and other gentlemen who advocate such a proposition as this, what interest the people of the United States have in it?

Mr. JOHNSON. I will answer the gentleman, if he will allow me.

Mr. SKELTON. No, sir; I cannot yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. The people of the United States would have no interest in it, I acknowledge, if they were to starve three fourths of the members here. [Laughter, and cries of "Order!" ]

Mr. SKELTON. I beg the gentleman not to interrupt me. I say that I am entirely opposed to this principle. The people of this District have been filching money from the United States for the purpose of paving and lighting their streets.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the gentleman to state when and how? He cannot do it.

Mr. SKELTON. What interest have the people of the United States in these bridges? What right have you to put your fingers into the pockets of the people of every district in the country for the special and particular benefit of the people of the District of Columbia? I say that the principle is wrong—entirely wrong. If the people of this District are suffering for want of bridges, let them build their own bridges, as the people of other districts do.

Mr. JOHNSON. What State does the gentleman come from?

Mr. SKELTON. I cannot give the gentleman any part of my five minutes. If they complain of the want of bridges, let them do as we do in New Jersey, and as the people of other States do—build their own bridges. What interest have the people of all the States of this Union in the bridges here? And what right have we to tax the people of this whole country for the particular benefit of the people of this District?

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. SKELTON. No, sir, I will not yield the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. The States are all concerned. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!" ]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is not in order.

Mr. SKELTON. Again, sir, the people of this District are complaining that we do not pay enough for our board. Will any member of this House say that we do not pay enough? The gentleman says himself that we pay all we get for our board, and still they are complaining. Why, sir, we are doing a gross wrong to the people of this District, by feeding them and making them paupers on the public Treasury, and thereby paralyzing their energies. Throw them on their own resources—tell them they must keep their own streets and bridges in repair, and supply their markets by their own industry and energy, and they will rise superior to the condition of paupers.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] by striking out the sum of $4,500, and inserting $6,000. I do this because, in my judgment, the sum proposed is not sufficient for the purpose. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Public Buildings, have both recommended $8,000.

It is said that $4,000 was appropriated last year to repair these two bridges, and doubts are stated as to the proper expenditure of this money, as well as to the necessities of the appropriation. Now, I have before me the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, and I will read a short paragraph from it to show the disposition made of the appropriation. The Commissioner says:

"The bridges across the Eastern Branch have been repaired so far as the sum appropriated would justify, reserving only enough to pay the keepers to July next. These structures are also very old, and require more than the usual amount for repairs. I have estimated the sum necessary for repairs and pay of keepers at $8,000. The utmost economy has been used in making repairs, the drawkeepers being required to assist in that work."

Now, sir, this officer, who is intrusted by law with the expenditure of money for such purposes, informs us that the bridges have been repaired as far as the expenditure would justify—that the bridges were old and much out of repair—and the expenditure has been made with the utmost economy. This report was in the hands of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the facts contained in it ought to have been known by the members of that committee.

The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SKELTON,] with some warmth, says the people of this District should make their own bridges, and not call upon Congress for aid. I can tell the gentleman, if he does not know it, that the people of the District did make their own bridges. Certain gentlemen, with their own funds, built both these bridges, and under their corporate authority levied toll upon all who passed over them. Citizens of Maryland and of the District of Columbia petitioned Congress to establish a free bridge or buy out the stockholders. Congress interposed at their request, and passed a law providing for the purchase of the bridges, not at the value of the stock, but at about half price, thus forcing them for an inconsiderable sum, to relinquish corporate rights which they held in perpetuity. This was a serious interference with their rights, and drove them to the alternative of sacrificing half the value of their property, or lose the whole by having a free bridge running parallel to those belonging to them. The stockholders have at this moment pending before the committees of this House, a memorial demanding indemnity for the injury done them by the Government. This is a true history of the matter.

The gentleman from New Jersey talks of the people of the District as a set of paupers, constantly seeking to filch money from the Government. It is a common thing in this House to hear such denunciations, and I am constrained to say they are without reason or justice. This District was laid off, and this city built for the convenience of Government. General Washington, for reasons which he deemed wise, located it at a point where its citizens would be deprived of commercial facilities. His object, no doubt, was to separate the action of Congress as much as possible from the influence of commercial interests, and keep the seat of Government free from the evils of a dense and turbulent population. If, therefore, the people of the District are to some extent dependent upon Congress, it arises from the very necessity of their position, and they ought not to be reproached for what they cannot avoid. They have no local Legislature to appeal to for favors or a redress of wrongs, but are compelled to rely upon the fickle and grudging disposition of Congress. The resident population of this city will compare favorably in every patriotic and moral quality, with the citizens of any other large city in the Union. They do not merit the harsh and uncalculated reproaches which are so frequently heaped upon them.

I said the city was located and built for the convenience of Government. Here are located the public buildings, and we own within the District from fifteen millions to twenty millions of public property. The archives of Government contained in the public buildings, cannot be estimated in value by any calculation of dollars and cents. Now, upon the value of this public property, you do not pay one single cent of taxes to the city, or the authorities of the District. Tax the public property at the same rate, which the corporation taxes the property of private individuals, and it will amount to a sum fully equal, and perhaps much more, than you appropriate for improvements in the District, not absolutely necessary for the dispatch of the Government business. The citizens of Washington, with a public spirit creditable to them in the highest degree, aid in the protection of your property and public archives. They form themselves into fire companies, are prompt to appear when danger is present, and have at all times done efficient service in case of fire in any of the public buildings. This Capitol itself was saved from destruction by their exertions. You have the benefit of the improvements made by the corporation, the advantage of its police force when emergencies arise to call it into service to protect the public property, and many other advantages which you owe to the city corporation. But, for all this you pay not one cent in the shape of taxes. Now, I will guarantee that if Congress will agree to pay annually upon its property, the same rate of taxes paid by individuals, that you will not be troubled by the citizens asking for appropriations for these improvements. Here then is a reasonable mode of getting rid of this species of legislation; and if gentlemen are disposed to do even simple justice to the District of Columbia, let them adopt it.

I beg the House will give some heed to the statements of the Commissioner. He tells you the bridges were old and out of repair—that the money expended was used economically, but was not sufficient for their thorough repair. They need the repairs proposed, because it is dangerous to pass over them with loaded wagons. When the Government bought them, it certainly incurred an obligation to keep them in good condition. The object was to accommodate the public by providing a free passage across the river, from one part of the District to another. The object will be defeated if the bridges remain in a condition so as to render it dangerous to all who may wish to travel on them.

Mr. SMART. I am opposed to the amendment to the amendment, in the first place, because I do not think it is necessary, and in the next place, because I am opposed to expending any more money in the District of Columbia than is already provided for in the bill. The gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON], seemed anxious to know how and when this money had been expended upon the people of the District of Columbia. I will state, for the information of the gentleman, that upwards of ten millions of dollars have been expended in the District of Columbia in the erection of public buildings and the improvement of the public grounds. I think the gentleman will find that that accounts for a very considerable item of expense.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, that is nothing.

Mr. SMART. The gentleman may think that a small amount, but in my judgment it is a pretty large sum; and I trust that this House will not make any additional expenditure except that contained in this bill.

Now, the gentleman, in his allusion to where I reside, seemed not to understand the geography of my section of the country; still, I think he knows me well enough, and knows my position, not only on the question upon which I am now speaking, but upon other questions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I did not mean to intimate any such thing as that the gentleman was not of as much importance in the House as anybody else. I could not upon the instant call to mind the name of the State from which he comes.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question recurred on the amendment submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, and being put, it was decided in the negative. So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON. I now offer that same amendment, only putting the amount at $4,750.

In regard to the remark made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART], a moment since—

The CHAIRMAN, (interrupting.) Before the gentleman proceeds further, the Chair will state that he cannot permit any unparliamentary remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is not my intention so to do; but the gentleman from Maine entirely misconstrued me. That is what I want to say. I know the gentleman well, and have always treated him with uniform courtesy, but I did not at the time recollect what State he came from. But, sir, I pass from that.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SKELTON] jumps up and makes an attack upon the District. These bridges and other things which form the connection between this city and the balance of the United States are owned mainly by the Government of the United States, and it is for the interest of the Government that they should be safe and easy. And yet the people of the whole District are attacked whenever we come to consider any of these propositions, which will be for the benefit of the Government itself.

It is well known that during the sessions of the American Congress, the population of this city is almost doubled, and that when this Congress is not in session the city is a desert, that it would almost make the heart of any man sad to look upon. The gentleman talks about the amount of money expended in this District for the erection of public buildings for the use of the Government itself. Is that a blessing to this people? Is that the ground for this charge against them? It is too preposterous! Other men of brighter intellects than mine could elucidate how preposterous it is by a single simile, but I will not attempt it.

But, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SKELTON] speaks of the people of this District, and says, that Congress should have more respect for them than to treat them as paupers—that they look to the Government and pension themselves upon it, and cannot live without it. That is a generous accusation indeed, coming from his State. I imagine there is not another member from the State of New Jersey, who would make such an accusation, knowing the keen reply that could be thrown back upon him. How do they support their government?

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am speaking of the manner in which the State of New Jersey supports her government.

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will come to order.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is not personal to the gentleman from New Jersey, and the Chair cannot say it is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not say the gentleman's remarks were personal, but he said they were out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well. I will not proceed out of order. I say that State levies taxes upon strangers passing through it, for the purpose of supporting its government, as I am informed by a gentleman who sits by me.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" all over the Hall.]

Mr. SKELTON. I will only add one word in reply to the gentleman from Arkansas, and then I will confine my remarks to the subject under consideration. The gentleman asks how we support ourselves in New Jersey. We do it by our own hands, sir.

[Shouts of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must proceed in order and confine himself to the subject under consideration.

Mr. SKELTON. I will only make this one remark, and then I will confine myself to the subject under consideration. I say, we in New Jersey support ourselves by honest labor, with our own hands.

It has been remarked here that these bridges were sustained by the people of this District until the Government took possession of them, and took them under its own control for repair. Now, if the Government of the United States has done wrong; if Congress has done wrong to the people of this District, by assuming the control and repair of these bridges, I want that they should restore them again, as soon as possible, to the possession of the people of the District.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman to allow me to say one word?

Mr. SKELTON. I cannot.

Mr. STANTON. I want to produce the facts.

Mr. SKELTON. I want no facts. [Laughter.] I say that, having done this wrong and outrage to the people of this District, according to the gentleman's own statement, I am opposed to committing any further wrongs and outrages upon them by the repair of these bridges. I am for surrendering them into the hands of the people of this District, with the view that they may keep them in repair—rebuild and sustain them. We may have done them wrong by giving them money. We have done wrong, as I assume, by inducing them to depend upon us instead of their own resources.

Again, sir, the gentleman from Arkansas says, one reason why we ought to keep these bridges in repair, is because the public treasure of the Government is to pass over them to the various sections of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON. I made use of no such argument whatever; none such occurred to me.

Mr. SKELTON. Now, I have no fear that the public treasure of the Government will not find its way out of the District fast enough without building these bridges for that purpose. So much for the argument that it is necessary to build these bridges for the use of the Government to enable it to dispose of the public treasure of the country. I say it is fallacious. There is no ground for argument upon it. It is not necessary for any such purpose. Then, sir, where is the necessity and where is the right to appropriate this money? Where is the right and where the claim that these people have upon us to build their bridges? But aside from the amount of money to be expended upon them, a great objection to my mind against this Government keeping in repair and sustaining them is, that it costs the Government a hundred-fold more than it would cost the people themselves; besides that, it is a constant source of trouble. How much have we spent upon these bridges? Four thousand dollars a year.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. We cannot get through with the bill this evening.

Several MEMBERS. "No!" "No!"

Mr. STEPHENS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman [Mr. PHELPS] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 196, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1853, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw that motion, to enable me to report back to the House, and have referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, a bill to provide compensation for those designated as the depositaries for the public money. It is a Senate bill which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; and I now desire the consent of the House to report it back, with amendment, in order to have it referred and printed.

Mr. CABLE. I will withdraw the motion.

There was no objection, and

Mr. JONES, from the Committee of Ways and Means reported back a bill to provide compensation to such persons as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to receive and keep the public moneys, under the sixteenth section of the "Act of the 6th of August, 1846, and for additional services required under that act," with an amendment; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the bill and amendment ordered to be printed.

Mr. CABLE. I now renew my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House adjourned till to-morrow at eleven o'clock, a. m.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. GORMAN: The petition of officers of the second regiment of artillery, asking Congress to appropriate a sum of money for the band, &c., &c.

By Mr. AVERETT: The petition of William Murray, of Halifax county, Virginia, praying for a pension.

By Mr. BRIGGS: The memorial of David T. Valentine and others, of the city of New York, for the passage of a law for the better protection of passengers on board of steamboats.

By Mr. SCHERMERHORN: The memorial of Hubbell & Patten and others, of the city of New York, for the passage of an act for the better protection of the lives of passengers on board of steamboats.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 6, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

On motion by Mr. ADAMS, the execution of the order assigning Friday for the consideration of private bills, was postponed till one o'clock.

HOOR OF MEETING.

On motion by Mr. ADAMS, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday, and in conformity therewith, it was Ordered, That the daily hour of meeting of the Senate be eleven o'clock, a. m.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, presented the petition of John H. Scruggs, praying a pension in consideration of his services in the Florida war in the year 1818; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRATT presented the memorial of Thomas Crown, praying to be allowed damages occasioned by the breach of a contract on the part of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the memorial of David Butler, military storekeeper, praying to be allowed extra compensation for services in the Army of the United States, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of George H. Derby, praying to have refunded to him a sum of money belonging to the United States, which was stolen while under his charge, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the memorial of C. B. McKnight and others, praying a modification of the bounty land law; and the petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for the sale of the unsold lands purchased of the tribe of Wyandot Indians, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to provide for the sale of certain portions of the public lands to the States within which they lie, for the purpose of constructing railroads and canals, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following petitions, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to:

Petition of George Andrews;

Petition of Charles Burris and others;

Petition of the Legislature of Alabama relative to the gradation of the price of the public lands in that State; and Petition of citizens of Bangor, Maine, in relation to the bill granting lands to the States for railroads, and from all memorials and petitions on the subject of the homestead bill, and granting lands to actual settlers, referred to that committee.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, making grants of land to aid in the construction of railroads and for other purposes, reported adversely thereto.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, submitted informally an amendment which he intends to propose to the bill from the House of Representatives, making grants of land to aid in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed.

THE HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. FELCH. The Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives "to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period therein specified," commonly known as the homestead bill, have instructed me to report it back, with an expression of the views of the majority adverse to the propriety of passing the bill.

I am also instructed to make the same report upon the Senate bill "to cede the public lands of the United States to the States respectively in which they are situated, on condition that the said States shall severally grant and convey the said lands to actual occupants only, in limited quantities, for cost of survey, and title monuments merely."

Mr. BORLAND. I desire to say, with the permission of the Senate, that two of the members of the committee, composing the minority—I being one of them—differ with the majority in their report as to what is called the homestead bill. The minority are in favor of that bill in substance. The minority agree with the majority of the committee with regard to what is known as Bennett's land distribution bill, and will, in the course of a day or two, offer to the Senate a substitute for it.

GALLERY OF THE ARTS.

Mr. BADGER, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the President to grant to J. Vanderlyn the use of a site on the public lands in the city of Washington, for a gallery of the arts; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented the petition of J. Vanderlyn, praying that an institution dedicated to the liberal arts, similar to those he has seen and frequented while a student at some of the celebrated capitals of Europe, may be established at the seat of Government. The petitioner states that the institution he proposes will serve as a school and means of instruction to the students of art, such as are now drawn to France and Italy, and at the same time for a new source of attraction and instruction to the public and visitors to the capital. He also states that he is in possession of some paintings of large dimensions, of a high order of merit, and is also the painter of several others, with which he proposes to open an attractive public exhibition, which could be accomplished by the beginning of the next session, supposing a building could be completed by that time. The petitioner suggests as an appropriate location for such an institution, the corner of Pennsylvania avenue and Third street. He solicits an appropriation of about $10,000 for the construction of the building; but if the appropriation be objected to, he asks at least the favor of being permitted, for a term of years, the use of the location designated for the purposes above specified.

The petition was also referred to the Committee on the Library.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the clerk to the Committee on Claims be continued, at the usual rate of compensation, to be employed during the recess of the Senate, in completing and keeping up the Index and Digest of the reports of the committee, authorized by the resolution of March, 1851, and in discharging such other duties as the committee may require.

DRY-DOCK IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CLARKE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish the Senate with copies of all contracts entered into by him for the use of the dry dock in California.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

Mr. SEWARD. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, whether any propositions have been made by the King of the Sandwich Islands to transfer the sovereignty of those Islands to the United States, and to communicate to the Senate all official information on that subject in his possession.

Mr. WELLER. Is the resolution under consideration?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir.

Mr. WELLER. I hope the resolution will be considered immediately. I would like very much to get that information.

Mr. SEWARD. I should be glad to have the resolution considered now.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

INDIAN COMMISSIONERS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. WELLER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate whether any reports have been received from the Indian Commissioners in California upon the subject of the debts contracted by them, and if so, that he transmit copies thereof to the Senate.

I hope the Senate will consider the resolution at this time. I received a letter, a short time since, from one of the Indian commissioners, desiring me to call for the report which he had submitted to the Department in relation to the large debts that have been contracted by commissioners in the State of California. As I am exceedingly anxious myself to see what these commissioners have to say in regard to that matter, I trust the Senate will now pass the resolution, in order that we may be put in possession of the information.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

CUSTOMS REVENUE IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. WELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the total amount of revenue from customs, collected by Collector Collier, for the district of San Francisco, California; also, the amount paid over to his successor, Thomas Butler King, at what time, and by whose order any such amount was so paid over; also, the amount due by the last settled account of said Collector Collier to the United States, and what steps, if any, have been taken to secure the same.

Resolved further, That the said Secretary report whether any, and what portion, of the aforesaid amount received by Collector King has been placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, in his account with said Treasurer as a designated depository, and at what time.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. MERIWETHER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be requested to inquire into the propriety of making an appropriation sufficient to purchase the remainder of the stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal owned by individuals, and thereafter reducing the tolls on said canal to a sum sufficient to cover all necessary repairs and the work thereof.

ABUSES IN THE PROSECUTION OF CLAIMS.

Mr. HOUSTON. I offer the following resolution, and ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have it considered at this time:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the President of the Senate to inquire into abuses, bribery, or fraud, in the prosecution of claims before Congress, commissions, or the Departments, or in passing through Congress bills embracing private, individual, or corporate interests, or in obtaining or granting contracts; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and examine witnesses on oath.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the resolution be so amended as to provide that the committee shall be appointed by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator can accomplish his object by striking out the words "by the President of the Senate." If these words be stricken out, it will not be necessary to insert any others, because, according to the rule, the Senate elects its own committees, unless it is unanimously ordered otherwise.

Mr. MALLORY. That is my amendment. The question being taken, the Chair announced that the amendment was not agreed to. Mr. WELLER demanded a division. The PRESIDENT. The Chair would much prefer that the Senate should appoint its own committees.

Mr. WELLER. I have no doubt of that; but it is proper that the question should be decided correctly. Certainly there were only two or three voting in the affirmative, while a great many voted in the negative; and the rule requires that the Chair shall announce the true vote.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will again take occasion to say to the Senate that it is always imposing upon him a very unpleasant duty to have to appoint very important committees. The rule is positive, that all committees shall be elected by a vote of the Senate, unless by unanimous consent the rule is changed or suspended. The Chair cannot appoint the committees but by unanimous consent.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the Chair state the question?

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida, to strike out the words, "by the President of the Senate," so as to leave the committee, under the rule, to be chosen by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. WELLER. If the Chair desires to be relieved from the responsibility of appointing the committee, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BRIGHT. I think that the Chair is correct, so far as regards the appointment of standing committees; but I do not understand the rule to apply to select committees ordered by the Senate. I think it is proper that the Chair should appoint the committee. It would save the time of the Senate, which would otherwise be occupied in going through a ballot.

Mr. BADGER. The Senator who moved the resolution had better accept the modification.

Mr. HOUSTON. I accept it.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will, in consequence of the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana, read the rule, so that it may be seen that the Chair is correct in the statement that all committees shall be appointed by ballot, unless by general consent. Rule 35 is as follows:

"In the appointment of the standing committees, the Senate will proceed by ballot, severally to appoint the chairman of each committee, and then by one ballot the other members necessary to complete the same, and a majority of the whole number of votes given shall be necessary to the choice of a chairman of a standing committee. All other committees shall be appointed by ballot, and a plurality of votes shall make a choice."

The resolution as modified was adopted.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution just adopted requires the committee to be appointed by ballot by the Senate, and the Chair will have that order complied with before the Senate proceeds with any other business. Senators will have the goodness to prepare their ballots for the committee of five ordered by the resolution which has been adopted.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to postpone the balloting for members of the committee until Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. I believe we vote first for chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDENT. That is not necessary. According to the rule, Senators can vote for the whole number composing the committee, and a plurality makes the choice. The highest on the list is generally chairman; or the committee have the power to elect their own chairman.

The ballot being taken, resulted as follows:

For Mr. Houston.....33	For Mr. Geyer.....4
For Mr. Borland.....20	For Mr. Seward.....4
For Mr. Underwood.....13	For Mr. Smith.....4
For Mr. Meriwether.....10	For Mr. Charlton.....3
For Mr. Bayard.....8	For Mr. Clarke.....3
For Mr. Brooke.....8	For Mr. Davis.....3
For Mr. Badger.....7	For Mr. Wade.....3
For Mr. Bright.....7	For Mr. Weller.....3
For Mr. Pratt.....7	For Mr. Butler.....2
For Mr. Toucey.....7	For Mr. Cass.....2
For Mr. Walker.....7	For Mr. Fish.....2
For Mr. Adams.....6	For Mr. Mason.....2
For Mr. Bell.....5	For Mr. Spruance.....2
For Mr. Brodhead.....5	For Mr. Atchison.....1

For Mr. Chase.....1	For Mr. Hunter.....1
For Mr. De Saussure.....1	For Mr. Mallory.....1
For Mr. Dodge of Ia.....1	For Mr. Norris.....1
For Mr. Douglas.....1	For Mr. Soule.....1
For Mr. Felch.....1	For Mr. Sumner.....1

The PRESIDENT. Messrs. HOUSTON, BORLAND, UNDERWOOD, and MERIWETHER, being the highest on the list, will constitute four members of the committee. The Chair will state to the Senate that on looking at the list he finds that Mr. BAYARD and Mr. BROOKE have precisely the same number of votes. If Mr. BROOKE should be considered as the member, the committee would consist of three of one party and two of the other, which is the usual number of the respective parties on the committees of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. I should prefer not to serve on the committee, and I hope the Senator from Mississippi will be selected.

The PRESIDENT. Messrs. HOUSTON, BORLAND, UNDERWOOD, MERIWETHER, and BROOKE, will be considered as the members of the committee, if such is the pleasure of the Senate.

"Agreed!" "Agreed!"

No objection was made, and the committee was so constituted.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, it was Ordered, That the select committee appointed to inquire into abuses in the prosecution of claims, be authorized to employ a clerk.

JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Mr. MALLORY, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to the State of Florida the money actually paid and expended in quelling Indian hostilities, under the act of 27th of February, 1851; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the order assigning to-day for the consideration of private bills must be executed.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to suspend the execution of the order requiring private bills to be taken up to the exclusion of all other business on this day, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. PRATT. I hope the motion will not prevail. It seems to be a settled practice on every Friday, no matter what business may be before the Senate, to make a motion to postpone the consideration of private bills. The day before yesterday the Senate was occupied the whole session in debating the question whether a certain officer should receive $3,000 or $2,500 salary; yesterday we had an able speech from the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] on the subject of the fisheries, and the balance of the day was consumed with this Indian appropriation bill, and nothing was done with it, but it passed over. To-day being Friday, and private bills being the special order of the day under a resolution of the Senate, as a matter of course, a motion must be made to postpone their consideration. I hope the motion will not prevail. At any rate, I ask the yeas and nays, so that my constituents may see that I am attending to the interests of the claimants on the Government.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have no disposition to waste time in discussing the motion which I have made; but the honorable Senator from Maryland is a little mistaken as to one fact. The Indian appropriation bill was before the Senate yesterday, and engaged the attention of the Senate almost the entire day.

Mr. PRATT. No vote was had upon it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have made this motion for the reason that I believe the public interests will be promoted, if the Senate will agree to it. The Indian appropriation bill is an important bill; and following it is the civil and diplomatic bill, which will be sent to us from the House, I understand, either to-day or to-morrow, and I think it important that the Senate should dispose of this bill, that we may take that up as soon as it comes to us. I feel that I am doing my duty in presenting the motion. The Senate can vote it down, if they please.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted—yeas 25, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Bright,

Brodhead, Brooke, Butler, Charlton, Davis, De Saussure, Felch, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, King, Mason, Norris, Sebastian, Smith, Spruance, Toucey, and Underwood—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Borland, Chase, Clarke, Clemens, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Fish, Hamlin, Houston, Mallory, Meriwether, Miller, Pratt, Seward, Soule, Stockton, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Weller—22.

So the motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion by Mr. BRIGHT, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives "making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30th, 1853." The pending amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out the following clause:

"For the payment to the Shawnees of moneys due them under and by virtue of the treaties of the 7th of November, 1825, and 8th of August, 1831, between the United States and the two divisions of said tribe of Indians, the same being the net balance received into the Treasury for the sale of their lands in Ohio, $66,246 22: Provided, however, That said tribe of Indians shall first express their assent that the payment of the above sum shall be made equally to the whole tribe, rather than to either division thereof."

Mr. SEBASTIAN moved to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out by striking out the proviso, beginning with the words "Provided, however," and inserting in lieu of it the following:

To be paid to the whole nation of Shawnees residing upon the Kansas, per capita, but upon the following conditions: First, that the Shawnees shall, by some valid act of the national authorities, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, agree to receive said money in common. Second, that they will hold in common, as one nation, the lands assigned by the treaty of 1835. Third, that all claim of the Ohio Shawnees to the exclusive grant of 100,000 acres, under the treaty of 1831, be forever released.

The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. SEBASTIAN.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise for the purpose of stating to the Senate that I have just received a letter written by George W. Ewing, for Captain Joseph Parks, of the Shawnee delegation. He states some facts, and refers to some documents growing out of the debate of yesterday; and I will request the Secretary to read the letter, so that the statement of the Indian chiefs, in regard to this matter, may be laid before the Senate.

The Secretary accordingly read the letter, as follows:

WASHINGTON, August 6th, 1852.

DEAR SIR: Captain Joseph Parks, of the Shawnee delegation, now here, desires to state, that the Shawnee nation first made application for their 100,000 acres of land (under the treaty of 1831) in the year 1835, by communication made through their agent, Major R. W. Cummins, to the War Department, and that they continued to urge this claim in this way, through their agent, up to the year 1842. That then a delegation of their people came on to this city to urge this claim, and in the year 1844 they were again here urging it. That in November, 1849, they again sent a delegation here, fully authorized by the nation, and with letters from their agent, Major Luke Lea, to the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and that from that time to this they have been prosecuting this claim, for their money in the Treasury of the United States, say $66,246; that their authority from their nation, and their letters from their agent, of November, 1849, on file in the Indian Department, will fully show this; that their authority and letters, which they brought on this last time, dated in March last, do not renew their authority about the 100,000 acres land claim, because they had already full authority on file for that, but it authorizes them more particularly to look after their moneys funded by the United States. The foregoing statement will show that it is not a new thing, nor a recent application on the part of the Shawnee nation, but that in truth and fact they have been asking for the land, or for their money, ever since 1835, now seventeen years past.

Captain Parks was in the Senate yesterday, and heard the debates on their claim, and he thinks it is but right that the truth should be known as to this.

It is no new or after thought with the Shawnee nation, for they ever believed that they were entitled, under the treaty of 1831, to 100,000 acres of land from the United States, and not from themselves nor from their Missouri friends, out of lands which belonged to them six years before they made their treaty in Ohio, and sold the United States their valuable lands in that State. Much of their Ohio lands they sold, would doubtless now sell for $20 or $30 per acre.

I remain, with great respect, your most obedient servant,
GEO. W. EWING.

HON. J. R. UNDERWOOD, United States Senator.

Mr. BRIGHT. That letter, I presume, is intended as a reply to a part of what was said yesterday by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] I understood that Senator to state this was the first session of Congress at which a claim had been set up for the money proposed to be appropriated in the clause which the Finance Committee moved to strike out of the bill. I understand that this is the first session of Congress at which the claim was ever set up for this appropriation in money. The result of the inquiries made by the Committee on Finance at the Department go to corroborate the statement made by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, that this is the first time a claim has ever been set up to the amount in money asked for by the clause proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, at the adjournment yesterday I had possession of the floor, more for the purpose of making inquiries and getting information than of presenting any views of my own. I made an inquiry of my colleague, which he answered. I not only listened to his reply attentively at the time, but I have read it with some care this morning, as published in the reports, with a desire to be satisfied in regard to this claim. I am sorry to say that it has failed to satisfy me that the claim is well-founded. I have always found it difficult, when I have undertaken to examine the Indian claims, to arrive at the facts; for they are always so mixed up with opinions expressed by those who advocate them, that it is exceedingly difficult, and sometimes almost impracticable, to separate what are the facts proved from the opinions expressed by Senators as to their value. It has been more so in this case, perhaps, than in any other which it has ever fallen to my lot to examine. Without undertaking to go into a thorough examination now; without undertaking to controvert any of the positions assumed, or any of the opinions expressed by Senators who have advocated the claim, I wish simply to state to the Senate what appear to me, on the best examination I have been able to give the subject, the facts, and state my opinion of those facts, as controlling the vote I shall give.

It seems to me, sir, from this examination, that the facts are these: By treaty stipulation with a portion of the Shawnee tribe of Indians holding land in the State of Ohio—owning between 90,000 and 100,000 acres—we agreed to give them, as a condition of removal, fifty-five cents per acre, to be paid, as I understand it, in the form of annuities, or a certain per centum per annum. If I am wrong in this, I will thank my colleague to correct me. Upon this condition, this branch of the Shawnee tribe of Indians removed from their lands in Ohio; and they have, since that time, been receiving annually the amount of money agreed to be paid to them by treaty stipulation; and so far as the treaty is concerned, they have been paid all which it provided they should be paid.

I understand a further fact to be, that, by another treaty, they were permitted to settle west of the State of Missouri, upon a tract of land of fifty miles square, making 1,600,000 acres, jointly with the other portion of the Indian tribe. They settled there; and they have since that time occupied in common tenancy that tract of land with the other branch of the tribe, and they have now all become amalgamated and united, and are one tribe—holding the land in common, and enjoying the rights of occupancy, use, and possession of the whole 1,600,000 acres. I understand further, that their original claim, when they came here and made application on this subject, was to receive—instead of the annual payment of five per cent. interest on the fifty-five cents per acre—the whole amount in gross, to be used as the tribe might think proper.

I understand that the proposition now is, not only to pay them, in gross, these fifty-five cents per acre, upon which we have heretofore been paying them an annual interest, but to pay them also the seventy cents per acre which were, at the time of the treaty by which they ceded this land in Ohio, reserved by the United States for the purpose of paying the expenses of removal, and the selection of new homes. If I am wrong in this statement, I hope Senators who are better acquainted with the matter will correct me. These I understand to be the facts, and to constitute the state of the case, as it is now before the Senate.

I have no objection, in fact I am willing at any time to comply with their request to be paid in gross the fifty-five cents per acre, so that it may not be held by the Government as a trust fund upon which we are to pay an annual dividend; but let the Indians take the amount in gross, and appropriate it to what purpose they choose. And I understand that these Indians are among the most intelligent and civilized tribes of Indians, and that they are capable, when put in possession of any amount of money, of managing it as judiciously as any other tribe. I am willing, therefore, to comply with that part of their request, and pay over to them that amount. But as to the further demand, which, as I understand, is now made for the seventy cents per acre, I have been unable to perceive any foundation for it in equity or justice. It has been said that it is proper to give it to them, because we undertook, by a subsequent treaty, to provide them 100,000 acres of land west of the Mississippi river; and that, instead of doing that, we have simply given them the undivided right to occupy and possess these fifty miles square, or 1,600,000 acres, in common with the other portion of the tribe.

I must confess, that when the claim is rested upon that ground, it strikes me as a most extraordinary one. Admit that we did agree to lay off to them, in addition to this annual dividend upon the fifty-five cents per acre, 100,000 acres west of the State of Missouri, as a separate, well-defined tract, which they were to own for themselves, independently of the other portion of the tribe: when we gave them the right to go and unite with the other portion of the tribe, and occupy as tenants in common the 1,600,000 acres, and they elected to do so, it seems to me that, instead of denying them what was due, and restricting them in the amount they were to be allowed, we have been liberal in the extreme, and have conceded to them a grant with which they ought to be more than satisfied. Will any one say that the right to occupy equally with the other portion of the tribe the 1,600,000 acres of land, was not more than an equivalent for the exclusive possession of 100,000 acres? Is it giving them an equivalent of eight for one—the land being equally good. And not only that, but it gives them what is indispensable to Indians—a wide range over which to hunt and pursue their usual avocations, rather than cribbing and confining them down to a little space of 100,000 acres.

I shall not go into any further examination of the subject, or into any argument to controvert what has been said in favor of the claim. I have simply stated what I understand to be the facts, and expressed, as briefly as I could, my opinion as to the value of those facts. The conclusion to which I have come is, that I am compelled to vote against this appropriation.

Mr. BELL. I want to say one word in reply to the letter which was read this morning at the request of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] in which allusion was made directly to some statements made by me yesterday in the course of debate. That is rather an unusual way to meet arguments or statements made on this floor, but I do not object to it. I stated, yesterday, that I had understood that this claim had never been before presented, though I did not state it as a fact. At any rate, I had never heard of it. I had heard, out of the Senate, that it was presented in 1844, but I had no knowledge of that fact, or, if I had, it had escaped my recollection. I had a letter of the agent, Mr. Moseley, read yesterday, in order to show to the Senate what I suspected, but what I did not know. If the letter had turned out differently, I should have been satisfied; but I suspected that if it were read, it would show that the claim was revived since this delegation arrived in the city. I believe I said, yesterday, that I presumed it had originated since they arrived in the city; but I do not mean to impugn Captain Parks, nor Mr. Ewing, nor the delegation; for if it be a well-founded claim, it is no objection to it that this is, for the first time, discovered and brought forward. If justice has been sleeping, and these people are now advised of it for the first time, it is no objection to the claim itself. The question is as to the validity and as to the justice and propriety of it.

Now, what does Captain Parks say in that letter? I know he is an intelligent and honorable man, and is quite a shrewd man, too. He was present at the making of the treaty of 1831, though not as a chief or commissioner on the part of the Indians, so far as I know. And not only is Captain Parks an intelligent man, but the Shawnees here are more intelligent than their nation in proportion to their number, and are nearly as intelligent and as shrewd as Parks. I wish to read to the Senate the second section of the treaty of 1831, and then refer to a positive statement made in the letter of Captain Parks, that the Indians, neither at the treaty nor since, had agreed that they were to have this 100,000 acres at the West, already belonging to them in Missouri; that they were to be paid in their own lands to that amount; but that they had prosecuted it as a distinct claim ever since the treaty, until 1849, and have now revived it. When they came here from the council, they did not think it necessary to ratify it, because, as they thought, they had the authority of former councils. I use my own language, and not the exact language of the letter, though I believe I have given the substance of it. I will now read this section of the treaty of 1831, to show how this claim stands, though they had a claim for a separate hundred thousand acres, which the Government promised, as he says, in 1831. I also wish gentlemen to bear in mind the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] and the arguments of others yesterday, in which it was said that these Indians have had this view of it and given this construction to the second article, to bear them out in the assertion that justice has not been done, and that the treaty has not been complied with. The second article of the treaty is in these words:

"In consideration of the cession stipulated in the foregoing article, the United States agree to cause the said tribe or band of Shawnees, consisting of about four hundred souls, to be removed, in a convenient and suitable manner, to the western side of the Mississippi river, and will grant by patent in fee simple to them and their heirs forever, as long as they shall exist as a nation, and remain upon the same, a tract of land to contain 100,000 acres, to be located, under the direction of the President of the United States, within the tract of land equal to fifty miles square, which was granted to the Shawnee Indians of the State of Missouri, by the second article of a treaty made at the city of St. Louis, in said State, with the said Shawnees of Missouri, by William Clark, superintendent of Indian affairs, on the 7th day of November, in the year 1825."

So far, that article shows they were to take it out of the fifty miles square, in which these Shawnees seem to have known at the time that they had an interest. But it does not stop there. It goes on, alluding to the treaty of 1825:

"And in which it is provided that the grant aforesaid shall be for the Shawnee tribe of Indians within the State of Missouri, and for those of the same nation now residing in Ohio, who may hereafter emigrate to the west of the Mississippi."

That is a part of the article under which they claim this 100,000 acres; and it is recited in the body of it, so that the intelligent portion of that tribe, the chiefs as well as Captain Parks, could perfectly comprehend it. Others of the tribe, too, were quite as capable of comprehending it as we are. They had all the ability to understand it fully. We have here, then, the recital that it was to come out of these very lands. That is the statement in the treaty. But they protest against taking it now, because they say it was their own before. How can it possibly be said that they had no idea of taking it out of the 100,000 which belonged to them already? If it did belong to them, they knew it, for that clause of the treaty of 1825 was recited in the article which I have just read. I rose simply for the purpose of showing that the Shawnee tribe could not possibly have so understood it.

Mr. WALKER. There was a letter read this morning, which was reported to have come from Captain Parks, of this tribe of Indians, which letter was signed by Mr. Ewing. That letter says, that this claim of these Shawnee Indians has been and is now a claim in addition to that of 100,000 acres of land, which was stipulated for by the treaty of 1831, or for money in lieu of it. That the Government of the United States is bound to set off 100,000 acres of land for this portion of the Shawnee tribe, is not denied; that the Government has reserved the right to do so under the treaty of 1825, as well as under the treaty of 1831, must be admitted. That it has equally reserved the right to locate the Ohio Shawnees under the patent granted to the Missouri Shawnees, is beyond question. I trust, therefore, that this money will not be appropriated until we have the whole facts more clearly understood, or some better reasons assigned for its payment than we have yet had. If the proposition to pay this claim should not succeed, as I hope it will not, then I will offer an amendment, authorizing the President of the United States to set apart for them 100,000 acres of land. I think that with such a provision they would be better off; at all events, we should then see whether we should be better off. I suppose they would be confined to that 100,000 acres; and, if not, then they would have a joint occupancy with the Missouri Shawnee Indians of the 1,600,000 acres.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If you set apart a hundred thousand acres out of the fifty miles square to the Ohio Indians, can you prevent the Missouri Shawnees from locating upon that hundred thousand acres under the treaty of 1825?

Mr. WALKER. I think you can prevent that under both of the treaties. The treaty of 1825 reserves the right to locate both these tribes there; and the treaty of 1831 locates the Ohio tribe there, if they have any disposition to go. The patent given to the Missouri Shawnees reserves the right of the Ohio Shawnees to locate there; and it is only a question of division or partition. It is unquestionably the right of the United States to make a partition of 100,000 acres. But, sir, that is not the object which is here sought to be effected. It is not the interest of the Indian which is the motive power in this case. We all know well enough that when we fail to perform, or when it is alleged that we fail to perform, any treaty stipulations with the Indians, the Indians themselves never come forward and ask the Government to enter into a specific performance of the stipulations. Who is it that does so? Why, sir, it is those cormorant agents who surround this Capitol. They know very well that unless these matters are fished up and pressed upon the attention of the Government, they would get nothing. When land or money is asked on behalf of the Indian in such cases, it is those agents who broach the matter; for the recovering of which they are usually to receive a large compensation—sometimes one third, according to the instance we heard of the other day. Now, sir, are we to sit quietly by and see the Government and the poor Indian swindled in such a manner? I hope not. I trust that we will not permit—if there be any means to prevent it—the Indians to be swindled either out of their money or their land. If we do not prevent this swindling, I trust the day will come when the people will speak here, trumpet-tongued, and demand that justice be done.

Mr. BADGER. I ask if the yeas and nays have been ordered on the pending amendment?

The PRESIDENT. They have not been ordered.

Mr. BADGER. I am exceedingly happy to hear it, for in that case I shall not be compelled to assign any reasons for the vote I shall give. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. Then I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not understand that the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. SEBASTIAN] is offered with any other view except that of perfecting the clause which it is proposed by the Committee on Finance to strike out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee on Finance have offered an amendment to the bill, which is to strike out a certain clause, and the Senator from Arkansas proposes to amend that clause before the question is taken on the motion to strike it out.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I believe my colleague misunderstands the issue proposed by my amendment. He, I believe, is opposed to the whole claim; and so, indeed, are other Senators. I did not suppose, however, that any one would object to my amendment, because I merely proposed to perfect the clause before the question was taken on the recommendation of the committee to strike it out.

Mr. BORLAND. I will say to my colleague, that I am not particularly opposed to his amendment. I am opposed to the whole appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will first be upon the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. Whether that is adopted or rejected, the question will then recur on concurring in the amendment of the committee, which is to strike out the clause.

Mr. BORLAND. Then I withdraw my call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRIGHT. The bill came to the Committee on Finance with a proposition to appropriate the sum of $66,246 23 for the payment to the Shawnees for moneys due them, as is alleged, under and by virtue of the treaty of 1825, and the treaty of 1831, between the United States and the two divisions of the said tribe of Indians. The committee propose to strike out that appropriation. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. SEBASTIAN] proposes to amend that clause before the question is taken on the proposition of the committee to strike it out. He has a right, of course, to propose to amend the clause before it is stricken out. It is upon that amendment we are now to vote.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and a division being called for, there were—aye 15, noes 17.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the proposition of the committee to strike out the clause.

Mr. BORLAND. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROOKE. I wish to vote understandingly on this amendment, and I do not know that I have now a correct appreciation of the facts, as the subject has been obscured by much speaking.

The facts, as I understand them, are these: In 1825, the United States granted to the Missouri Shawnees, in common with the Ohio Shawnees, fifty miles square of land, to be enjoyed in present by the Missouri band, and in futuro by the Ohio band. The land, however, belongs equally to the one band as to the other, and the Ohio Shawnees, according to their numbers, have as much interest in it as the others. In 1831, the United States, for the purpose of inducing the Ohio Shawnees to remove west of the Mississippi, agreed to give them in fee-simple 100,000 acres, to be taken out of the tract of fifty miles square.

That I believe is a correct statement of the facts; if not, I would like some Senator to correct me.

That being a correct statement of facts, it follows that this Ohio band of Shawnees had the choice of two modes of action: one arising under the treaty of 1825, by which they were permitted to enjoy this territory in joint tenancy with the Missouri Shawnees; and the other, under the treaty of 1831, which authorized them to hold 100,000 acres in severalty. They made their election by joining and mingling with the rest of the tribe, and have continued ever since to occupy the territory of fifty miles square in common. I conceive that it is now too late to change that election, and therefore that they have no claim to a separate tract of 100,000 acres; but even if they had such a right, and if they were entitled to call for a partition of the territory, that would be very different from asking money from the Government in consequence of their not having made that selection before. If they are entitled, notwithstanding that they made their election, to have this territory set off separately, it does not follow, by any means, that they can come back on the Government for the payment of a sum of money in consequence of their having made that election; and I presume that the Government has power, under the treaty of 1825, if they choose to change their election, to require from the Missouri Shawnees a partition or division of the territory, at least so far as the 100,000 acres are concerned. I go further; I believe that the Government has the right, under the treaty of 1825, to demand a partition of the territory according to numbers, because they all occupy it as tenants in common, and because, under the same treaty, they have also a right to a separate joint tenancy.

I see no foundation for a moneyed claim against this Government. The Ohio Shawnees made their election, and they are bound by it; and have continued so for the last twenty-one years. As they neglected during that time to take any other step, they can only claim now the partition of the territory.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish my friend from Arkansas would withdraw his call for the yeas and nays. I suppose that no Senator will vote for the clause, as the amendment proposed by the other Senator from Arkansas [Mr. SEBASTIAN] has been rejected. All of us require that there should be a full relinquishment on the part of the Indians of all claim to lands before we make such an appropriation, and that relinquishment we have not yet got. I think therefore it is useless to consume time in taking the yeas and nays on a question on which it is almost evident there will be a unanimous vote.

Mr. BADGER. Since the yeas and nays have been ordered, I must insist on their being taken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator from North Carolina assign a reason?

Mr. BADGER. I desire to record my vote. I suppose that reason will be sufficient.

The question was taken on the motion of the committee to strike out the appropriation, and resulted—yeas 41, nays 1; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Borland, Bright, Brodhead, Brooke, Butler, Cass, Charlton, Chase, Clarke, Dawson, De Saussure, Douglas, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Houston, Jones of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Meriwether, Miller, Norris, Pearce, Pratt, Sebastian, Seward, Soule, Spruance, Sumner, Toucey, Underwood, Wade, Walker, and Weller—41.

NAY—Mr. Clemens.

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The fifth amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert, after the words "per annum" in the following clause, the words in italics:

"For payment to the heirs of Cyrus Choise the balance due for services rendered by him as acting Indian agent in New Mexico, from the 9th of December, 1849, to the 14th of September, 1850, at the rate of $1,550 per annum," after deducting the sum of fifty dollars heretofore paid to said Cyrus Choise, "$1,137 76."

The amendment was agreed to.

The sixth amendment of the Committee on Finance was to add at the end of the bill the following clause:

"For compensation to three special agents and four interpreters for the Indian tribes of Texas, and for the purchase of presents, $15,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The seventh amendment of the Committee on Finance was to add the following clause:

"To enable the Secretary of the Interior to cause an investigation to be made into certain claims preferred against the United States, for provisions alleged to have been furnished to the Indians in California, $10,000."

Mr. WALKER. I would like to hear some explanation of that amendment.

Mr. BRIGHT. Numerous treaties have been made with the Indians of California, and, in consequence, various appropriations have been rendered necessary, as contracts have been made by the agents of the Government, and no appropriations were in existence for the purpose of meeting them. This appropriation was recommended by the Secretary of the Interior; and, on learning the facts of the case, the Committee on Finance resolved on bringing it under the consideration of the Senate, for the purpose of employing an agent to ascertain the extent and the justice of the claims growing out of these treaties.

Mr. WALKER. Then it appears that this appropriation is not for the purpose of paying these claims, but merely to ascertain what they are?

Mr. BRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALKER. It seems to me, that if we were to introduce a resolution requesting the Secretary of the Interior to furnish this information, it would be the more appropriate course, if the Department discharged its duty. It is a most singular thing that an appropriation should be asked for to ascertain what is the amount of these claims.

Mr. WELLER. They arose under eighteen different treaties.

Mr. WALKER. Eighteen treaties with the Indians of California were sent to the Senate, containing certain stipulations which the Senate refused to ratify. Besides, there was no authority for making these treaties at all, as I understand. Some persons took it upon themselves to make these treaties, and sent them here in hopes that the Government would adopt them. I do not question their motives; they might have been good; but the Government refused to recognize these treaties, and I look on this appropriation of $10,000, for the purpose of ascertaining what claims arise out of them, as most extraordinary. Those who have claims against the Government will, no doubt, send them here soon enough, without our sending an agent to look them up; and I hope that we shall be able to ascertain their amount without incurring this expenditure.

Mr. WELLER. The Senator from Wisconsin is entirely mistaken as to the character of the Indian agents. They were responsible persons, sent out by the Government with full authority to negotiate treaties with the Indians. They negotiated eighteen treaties, which were regularly transmitted to the Executive branch of the Government, and by the Government to the Senate, and by the Senate they were rejected. Nearly all these treaties stipulated that the Government should supply the Indians with provisions for two years; and the agents proceeded, under these informal treaties, to supply the Indians with beef to the amount of nearly a million of dollars. The Senator is mistaken in supposing that none of these claims have been presented to the Government. Claims to the amount of nearly half a million have been presented to the Department, and protested for want of funds.

A general impression has gone abroad, here as well as in California, that there was something improper in the mode of making the contracts for the supply of provisions. Many persons think that there was fraud; and in order to investigate the matter it is necessary to make this appropriation. We propose to send out an agent, who shall be specially charged with the investigation of the manner in which these contracts were made. If they were made in good faith, and if the contractors supposed that they had the authority of Government for supplying the beef, the Government will, ultimately, be bound to pay; but before we can make any drafts on the Treasury for this purpose, we desire to obtain information. That is all we ask. We shall be called on at the next session of Congress to appropriate $1,000,000 in satisfaction of this debt, and unless we make this appropriation we shall not possess the information necessary for our guidance.

Mr. ATCHISON. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that there is no earthly necessity for making this appropriation. We have a Superintendent of Indian Affairs. An office of this kind has lately been created, and a competent man has been appointed to fill it—one who is well qualified to investigate these claims and report upon them. I therefore can see no necessity for a special agent. The Superintendent of Indian Affairs can do it under instructions from the Department of the Interior.

Mr. WALKER. If the Senator from California had not been one of those who have shown a good deal of zeal and a great deal of ability in exposing the conduct of some persons connected with the present Administration—if he was one of those who are friendly to it, and had tried to conceal certain facts, and had inadvertently favored this proposition—I should have pronounced it one of the most astounding things in the world. What is the proposition? Why, our Indian agents make treaties with the Indians in California, and while they are yet inchoate, before they are submitted to the Government here for ratification, the Indian agents go on and purchase beef for these Indians, as it is alleged, to the value of $1,000,000, and claims for the payment of $500,000 have already come in. There are then claims to the amount of $500,000 to come in. Was ever such a thing heard of before? I venture to say, that if such a thing had occurred during the excitement that existed in the Democratic administration of Van Buren, or that of General Jackson, there would have been an effort to impeach the Executive. But now the matter is spoken of by the Senator from California as being the result of a mere inadvertence. It is a most astounding development, that an expense of a million of dollars has been incurred under treaties with the Indians, which had not been submitted to the Senate of the United States. And what is more extraordinary, and the force of which I think the Senator from California must feel, is, that Government must issue a search-warrant to cause debts to be hunted up. I do not see the necessity of expending money to search for them. I do not believe but that they will be here soon enough if you do not appropriate a cent. Claims to the amount of $500,000 were here before the treaties were acted upon. It is the most extraordinary thing I ever heard of in my life. I am sure the Senator from California cannot be in earnest in making this proposition to issue a search-warrant to hunt up claims against the Government. We all know they will find their way here soon enough without our sending out agents to look them up. We can get any amount of Government debts, not half as good as these, without paying anything for hunting them up. They come here every day. Therefore I am opposed to this proposition.

Mr. WELLER. I assure the Senator from Wisconsin that I am serious. I did not propose to issue a search-warrant for the purpose of ascertaining where these claims are. I know where many of them are. I know that many of them are held by honest men in California, who have given to the country a good and sufficient consideration for them. I know that there are many persons there who furnished cattle at a fair price, while I am quite willing to admit that there are others who furnished cattle for which they charged a most exorbitant price—prices which I think can be proved to be both unfair and unjust. And now when I am asked indiscriminately to pay claims out of the Treasury, some of which I know are in the hands of honest men, while others are admitted to be unjust and exorbitant, I desire to know all that can be known about the original matter. All that is proposed under the appropriation is simply that some disinterested person shall be authorized and empowered to make that investigation in order that we may be enabled to see when these debts may be presented here, whether the property alleged to have been furnished was actually furnished or not. I agree with the Senator from Missouri that the Superintendent of Indian Affairs is in every way qualified for the discharge of this duty. But he has asked to be relieved from the examination of a portion of these claims, particularly many that arise in the southern part of California.

The contracts made for beef by Colonel Fremont amounted to $180,000. That amount of beef was furnished at the rate of fifteen cents per pound, at which rate it would make cattle worth from sixty to seventy dollars per head, while I know that they were not worth more than twenty dollars per head. The Superintendent of Indian Affairs recently appointed a particular friend of his. He is well known to him, and has been associated with him in many of his explorations in the Rocky Mountains. He may have been associated with him at the time these cattle were delivered; and he has very properly asked the Department to be relieved from the investigation of that portion of the contracts. It seems to me that some proper and disinterested person should go out and make the investigations.

I think there is no reason why the Senator from Wisconsin should have expressed so much surprise at this proposition. If he had been familiar with the proceedings of the Senate he would have known that the Secretary of the Interior had been applied to for information in regard to this matter, and had informed the Senate that there were claims to the amount of $800,000 on these contracts. This information was communicated to the Senate long ago. Every Senator, if he had attended to the proceedings of this body, might have known, without the authority of any Department, that these commissioners had contracted debts to the amount of $800,000. He might have known, also, that drafts, given by these commissioners, for very large amounts, have been protested; and he might have known that only $25,000 were appropriated to meet the demand. According to the treaty it was provided that the beef should be delivered in 1851 and 1852. All the cattle which had been contracted for to be delivered in 1851 had been delivered before you acted on the treaty at all, and a large portion of those which were to have been delivered in 1852. The debts, then, have been already contracted, and I suppose we are in the predicament in which the Irishman found himself when he declared that when he enlisted he was forced to volunteer. The debts are already in the hands of officers; it will, therefore, prevent a great deal of difficulty hereafter, if an investigation in regard to these claims is made at the present time, if a disinterested person who has had no connection with any of these transactions should be sent to that country in order that he may examine the manner in which these contracts were made, and report to the Government, so that we may be able to act understandingly when the claims shall come in.

I have nothing to say as to the manner in which these debts were contracted; it is not the only transaction in which the agents of the present Administration have been concerned which bears on its face some evidence of dishonesty; not that I would imply any want of moral integrity of those now in power; but it will be necessary to have some information, and the only question is, how that information is to be obtained. My friend from Missouri [Mr. Atchison] says that we can get it from the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and I have laid before the Senate some reasons why he should be relieved from that responsibility.

Mr. ATCHISON. I think the Senator from California admits that, but for the special reasons which he assigns, I am right, and that if this Superintendent of Indian Affairs was entirely disinterested, and not connected in intimate personal relations with some of the parties who make these claims, or if he could waive his feelings of delicacy in regard to them, he would be the proper person. Let us look at the state of the case.

Three or four Indian agents were sent to California to make treaties with the California Indians, and to discharge other duties connected with the office of the Indian agencies. When there, they made eighteen treaties, as it is said, with those Indians; and upon the supposition that those treaties were ratified by the Executive Department of this Government, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, it is said they contracted debts in the execution of those treaties to the amount of from $800,000 to $1,000,000.

Now, were these officers so ignorant, or was this done because they were so corrupt? One or the other must have been true. They well knew that they had no power to make and execute a treaty. Then what was the obvious and proper course of the Administration? It was to remove them either for their ignorance, or for their corruption, and to appoint men with sufficient capacity and integrity to discharge those duties. I do not believe that this has been done. One of these agents has resigned his office, and another, or perhaps two others, are still in California, in the discharge of their duties, perhaps contracting new debts, and perhaps at this very hour carrying out those treaties. The fault is with the Administration, that these men have not been removed, and men of integrity and capacity appointed in their places, who could and who would investigate this matter, and report upon it. I think that the Superintendent of Indian Affairs has shown a proper delicacy upon this subject, and I agree with the Senator from California, that he should be relieved from the discharge of those duties, so far as the particular contracts mentioned by him are concerned.

I might say also with regard to some other officers there, that the Administration should remove all who, contrary to all reason and common sense, have had any connection with these illegal acts, and should appoint in their places men of capacity and integrity, who can examine into these contracts and report to this Government. If I am right in this, there is no necessity for an appropriation of $10,000 to pay a special agent to go to California and examine these claims. We have district judges and district attorneys, and other officers in California who might be employed for that purpose.

Mr. PEARCE. This whole matter was discussed in the Senate some months since, and some facts in connection with it, which appear to have escaped the attention of the Senate, were then stated. There were three Indian agents and one sub-agent in California. One of these agents denies that he ever participated in these illegal contracts; one has resigned; the other, who participated in the contracts is now in office, and the sub-agent was removed.

Mr. WELLER. Will the Senator allow me to say that there are two agents there still?

Mr. PEARCE. There are two, but only one of them participated in the contracts. The names of the agents were Barbour, McKee, and Wozencraft; Johnston was the name of the sub-agent. Barbour resigned; McKee denies his participation, and Johnston was removed. These facts are contained in the papers on file in the Department of the Interior, and were read by me some months ago, in my place here. Wozencraft did participate largely in the contracts, but he was suffered to remain in office for the reasons that I then assigned—because it was supposed that he would be able to communicate to the Government that information which it was supposed he would not be so willing or so ready to give if he were removed.

There is no question that the authority of these agents did not extend so far as they went, and that they grossly violated their duty in making these contracts; and, as I stated formerly, they were sternly rebuked for it. But as the Senator from California [Mr. Weller] has very correctly stated, however improper or illegal the contracts may have been, this much is certain: they have got into the hands of honest persons in many cases. There is a great difference in the character of the contracts themselves. Some have been taken at exorbitant rates—rates nearly double what were given in other cases; and this alone creates suspicion. The Senator from California [Mr. WELLER] states, I believe, that fifteen cents per pound for beef was paid, when it might have been obtained for eight cents. The prices of brood-cows varied from $60 to $75; and, if I understand the Senator right, they should not have exceeded thirty.

Mr. WELLER. Twenty.

Mr. PEARCE. What we desire now is not to ascertain the amount. There is no difficulty about that. The Senator from Wisconsin is perfectly right in saying that we shall be made acquainted with that soon enough. What we want is, to ascertain the manner in which the contracts were made—not that they can be wholly excused—but to know whether there is anything connected with them which may go to palliate their being made, so that, if it be so, some sort of compensation may be made for the beef which has been furnished to the Indians. This information cannot be obtained without some trouble. I am told that the Indian agents would have to abandon their proper duties to investigate this matter.

The circumstance which the Senator from California has stated in regard to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, makes it entirely proper that the duty should not be charged upon him. He has had some connection with the parties there, and has some knowledge of their contracts, and he feels that it would be indelicate for him to sit in judgment upon them. He has given his opinion in one case already, which makes it improper for the Government to impose such a duty upon him.

Whether $10,000 is too large a sum to be appropriated for the purpose, or not, I am not prepared to say; but I presume that no more of the sum which is appropriated will be expended than is necessary to accomplish the object. It will be necessary to have an agent appointed who is a man of sound discretion, and of intelligence, and of firmness, so that he may impartially and fairly examine all the contracts out of which these claims have arisen. Possibly, when we have the whole information, we may not feel compelled to pay all the claims. If we were called upon to act with no more information than we have at present, I should be opposed to paying any of them. I desire to have proper persons appointed to make the investigation.

Mr. WALKER. The Senator from Maryland says that the object of this appropriation is not to ascertain the amount of those claims which may be due, but to ascertain the circumstances under which these debts were contracted. He admits that these claims will be presented to the Government quite as soon as the Government is ready to discharge them, and that when they are presented, it is for us to judge of the propriety of paying them.

I have listened with great attention to the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, and also those of the Senator from California, in regard to the propriety of excusing the Superintendent of Indian Affairs from investigating one class of these claims. They say that the Superintendent is so intimately connected with one of the parties that it would be improper and indelicate to devote that duty upon him. Sir, I remember an old couplet which appears to me to have a striking applicability to this case:

"While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return."

[Laughter.] I am glad to see that, in the last expiring hours of this Administration, it is about to return to a due sense of propriety in view of its acts. There was a time, sir, when not only a connection—an intimate connection, if you will—with the persons having claims against the Government, was not regarded as improper, but even a connection with the debt itself was not regarded as any impediment in the way of the officers of the Administration. There was once one Crawford, who was not only connected with the parties in such a case, but was connected with the debt itself, by which he contrived to put $100,000 into his pocket. There is another, who now holds office, and who labors under the suspicion of having obtained a large amount of a claim while acting as Secretary of the Treasury; and, sir, it is truly gratifying to humbler mortals to hear and to see this Administration returning to a proper sense of duty and propriety in view of their relations to persons who have claims against the Government. I am pleased to think that the Superintendent of Indian Affairs is to be relieved from the investigation of this matter. In all probability these claims will be made out and brought here with great promptness and facility; but it appears that, to save the delicate feelings of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, he is to be relieved from the duty of this investigation, at an expense of $10,000; that a special agent is to be sent to California in order that he may ascertain our indebtedness, and the circumstances under which that indebtedness was contracted, while, at the same time, it is acknowledged that the agents of the Government, who contracted these debts, had no authority to contract them; while one has resigned, another been removed, and a third retained, in order that he may obligingly furnish information in regard to claims which smell very strongly of fraud, in which he is suspected of being a participant!

Sir, to ask Congress to make an appropriation of $10,000, under such circumstances, and for such purposes, is the most extraordinary thing that ever was heard of. We have a Superintendent of Indian Affairs here, and we have agents in California where these debts are said to have been contracted, and yet we are to appropriate $10,000 to send out a special agent to find out and hunt up claims against the Government! I hope, sir, that we shall wait until these claims are brought in by the claimants themselves, when we shall be able to investigate them, and judge of the purity of them, so far as they can be proved to be pure, and when we can pay what it is proper should be paid, and reject what it is proper should be rejected. According to this proposition, however, it is proposed that the Government shall take the initiative, and expend $10,000 to ascertain whether there are any claims against the Government, and if so, whether they are just. Sir, when these claims are brought forward—as they will be one day or other, and that, too, no doubt, all in good time—we can determine their justice and the propriety of paying them. That seems to me to be the most economical way, and it occurs to me, also, that it is the most just and honest way of transacting this business.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, I do not propose to reply to the insinuations of the Senator from Wisconsin against the purity and honesty of this Administration. When that Senator makes a specific charge, it will be time enough to answer him. I believe that the personal integrity of the members of the Administration has never been questioned by anybody. In regard to this particular matter, I presume they do not care a straw what the Senate may do, or what Congress may do. They will not pay the claims.

Mr. WALKER. That is right.

Mr. PEARCE. They never authorized the contracts; they rebuked the making of them; but they think it proper to submit the matter to Congress. They supposed that the people of California had rather a deep interest in this question; that some of them were not liable to the charge of being concerned in these improper and fraudulent proceedings—if they should turn out to be fraudulent. They suppose, therefore, that it would be perfectly proper that Congress should possess itself of information not ex parte. If we rely upon the claimants, we shall get nothing but ex parte information, and probably if they are like claimants in other parts of the country, they will prove up their case with the most perfect ability. It has been supposed that it might be judicious, perhaps, to have an investigation on our side—one not intended to facilitate the passage of the claims of these parties, but to guard the Government against any injury. If Congress does not think proper to make this appropriation, be it so. The Administration have not the slightest interest in the business, except so far as they desire to see everything done justly, and to furnish Congress with the information which will enable them to act justly.

Mr. GWIN. The subject of these contracts was discussed very fully in the Senate some time ago, and I then said all about them that I care to say. I wish now, however, to say a few words in regard to this appropriation, which I favored, in committee, as an amendment to this bill.

The Senator from Wisconsin has commented on the desire of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs to be relieved from this investigation. When that gentleman received his appointment, he did not anticipate that any such duty would be imposed upon him. The subject had not come up at that particular time; and long before he anticipated any connection with the Government, directly or indirectly, he had been called upon by a friend of one of the contractors to make a statement, first, in regard to the necessity that existed at that time, considering the situation of the country and the state of Indian affairs, for making the contracts; and, in the second place, in regard to the amount that was to be paid for the beef. My colleague has stated the price of beef in the southern portion of the State. It is very true that an ounce a head was the price there generally; but the cattle had to be driven hundreds of miles, and the expense of driving them was much greater than that of purchasing them. One of my colleagues in the other House has also given a statement to the same purport as that of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, with regard to the price.

I have been told that this beef could have been furnished at a much less cost. I was told so by an officer of the army in California. But from a subsequent examination I have great doubts whether it could have been furnished at that time in that section of the State at a much less price. The main point now, however, is to know whether it was furnished, and whether it was issued to the Indians. It is an investigation of that matter which we wish.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that this case, as the Senator from Maryland says, will come up. I have no doubt that there have been very serious charges made against the officers who made those treaties; but the Senator from Maryland is entirely mistaken in one respect. Although McKee denies that he had anything to do with the contracts, he is altogether mistaken, for the very documents before us acknowledge that he has overdrawn the appropriation $32,000 in contracts. He is one of the officers who made the contracts. Although he did not go into the hundred thousands, he went into the thousands. So every one of these officers is implicated.

Mr. BRODHEAD. What amount did Congress appropriate?

Mr. GWIN. The whole appropriation made by Congress was $50,000; and the expenditures were about $1,000,000. All these commissioners are implicated. I think it is due to the country, and it is due to those gentlemen, who were men of character when they received their appointments, but against whom the most serious charges are now raised—they are charged with having fraudulently and corruptly made these contracts—that the charges should be investigated. The Superintendent of Indian Affairs has other and important duties to perform, that he should be required to perform at once, looking to the future intercourse of this Government with the Indians. These treaties have greatly embarrassed the Indian affairs in that country. If the Superintendent discharges his duty, he will have enough to do, without turning back to go into the mass of testimony which will necessarily be brought forward in relation to these claims. I want him to go forward.

I hope, for one, that what the Senator from Missouri said should take place, will take place. It ought to have taken place long ago. In justice to the Government, new agents should have been appointed there. I do not pretend that the charges made against these men are true, but they ought to be investigated, and they should be relieved from them if they are not true. The charges are of a most serious character. The commissioners are charged with being parties to the contracts, and with having received benefits from them to a large amount. It is due to the character of the gentlemen themselves, as well as to the Government, that the subject should be investigated. The whole object of the proposed amendment is to get an individual entirely disconnected with the contracts to obtain this information; and I should like very much that one should be obtained who was never in California—one who should have no other connection with the country than his mission to make the investigation. There is a great deal of character as well as money involved in this matter. Many of the drafts are in the hands of parties who received them for their face, and paid money for them, and very large amounts are suspended, to the ruin of the holders of the drafts, who anticipate that this Government will pay them. I hope the matter will be investigated. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I see nothing wrong in the proper Department submitting this question to Congress. I think that is all right. But this is the most flagrant case which has taken place in my day, connected with our Indian affairs. Here was one Indian commission directed to make a treaty or treaties with the Indians in California, and an appropriation, I understand, of $50,000 was put at their disposal to defray their expenses. I have not a doubt that in the instructions of the Department they were expressly directed not to exceed that amount. I have no doubt of that. They had probably a standing instruction on that subject. The commissioners have gone on and made contracts to the amount of almost $1,000,000. They have not only undertaken to make expenditures connected with the collection of the Indians, but they have anticipated the ratification of their own treaty, and carried it into effect.

Now, sir, I hold that upon no correct principle is this Government under the slightest moral obligation to pay a dollar of it. I do not say I would not, under some circumstances, pay some of it; but I say, that there is not the slightest obligation to pay a dollar. I do not agree with gentlemen who say that because these bills are in the hands of innocent purchasers, there arises an obligation to pay them. I hold that no Government is bound by the act of any of its officers, when those officers have no authority to act. If I contract with an officer of the Government for $100,000, I am bound to look at his papers and see that he has authority to make the contract. And no Government in the world is bound otherwise. Assume the contrary doctrine, and what Government could stand for a year? You appoint an agent for any purpose whatever; you send him to a distance, and he may bind you in a debt to the amount of millions, according to this doctrine.

Is that the right doctrine? No, sir; the correct doctrine is, certainly, that no Government is bound by the acts of its officer, with relation to its fiscal concerns, unless that officer is authorized to act. I repeat, it is the duty of the men making contracts with these officers, to know that they have the proper authority; and these men have no right to come here and insist on any legal or moral obligation on our part to pay these debts, unless they can show that the officers were authorized to make the contracts. Especially when gentlemen of intelligence come forward and claim that they made contracts to the amount of $180,000 or $200,000. There is no excuse for such conduct.

For one, Mr. President, I will give no vote in this matter that will, in the slightest degree, compromise the subsequent action of Congress. I will not vote a dollar to appoint a commissioner or an agent. I will not vote a dollar to take any step in the matter until the case is fairly made out by some of the parties, and brought before us. I will not, I repeat, do any act that may seem to give any sanction, in the remotest degree, to such flagrant and outrageous conduct.

Mr. BRIGHT. I did not vote for this amendment in the Committee on Finance; nor shall I vote for it here. The reasons that governed my mind, were, to some extent, those which have been suggested by the Senator from Michigan. I am unwilling to delegate to any agent who may be appointed by a Department, the power to prejudice this case for us. This involves the expenditure of an immense amount of money. If the agent or agents appointed for the purpose of investigating these claims should be operated upon by the influences which seem to have operated upon our agents there in making the contracts, they may report to us in favor of the claims, and virtually commit the Government to the payment of an immense amount of money. I am anxious to see these claimants come here as other claimants come. Let them present their claims to Congress. Let them undergo the changes and mutations that attend Congressional legislation; and if their claims have merit they will be passed. But I am unwilling to see the Government precommitted to the payment of the claims by the finding of any agent or agents who may be selected by the same Administration which selected the very agents who have imposed upon us to the extent that the facts in this case warrant us in saying they have done. These considerations, in part, governed my vote against the amendment in the committee, and shall also induce me to vote against it now.

Mr. BELL. I desire to make an inquiry of the honorable Senator from Indiana, as he probably can answer it. I have heard it suggested that the law, under the authority of which the Superintendent of Indian affairs for California was appointed, clothes him with the power to examine these claims; and that there is some necessity for making a provision of this kind upon this occasion, in order to get an examining agent free from all suspicion of prepossession or prejudice in the case. If that is so, it might be a reason why we should make the appropriation. There must be an investigation, as I understand the law that exists now.

Mr. WELLER. If the Senator will yield me the floor, I will state that I understand the Executive branch of the Government have decided that it has no discretion under that law; but that it is the imperative duty of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs to make the whole of this investigation; and that, unless the legislative department of the Government shall relieve him, he will be compelled to make that investigation. I understand that the Executive has decided that under the law he has no discretion.

Mr. BELL. Who has no discretion? Must the Superintendent make the investigation?

Mr. WELLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELL. That was what I was suggesting and desiring to have understood by the Senate. On that ground I think we ought to make the appointment.

I desire now to say a word in regard to the Superintendent; because, when the proposition was made to establish an Indian Superintendency in California, with such large powers, I was very determined to oppose the passage of any such act, on the ground that I knew, unless the Superintendent was a man of extraordinary firmness and integrity of character, he would have it in his power to involve this Government in millions annually, from which it would be difficult to extricate ourselves without paying the claims. I have inquired with regard to the character of the gentleman who has been appointed Superintendent; and, according to all the information that I could get, from frequent conversations with him, from the experience he has had among the Indians in that country, from his intrepidity and firmness in all his past character, I thought him a very fit and proper man to be appointed. If any reliance can be placed in human testimony, with regard to the character of an individual—any reliance in the personal intercourse which we can have with other persons, he was a suitable man. I find that his former character, among his brother officers of the Navy, was very high. Since he has been appointed, however, I have heard of his friendship and intimacy with some of the claimants, and his association in the discharge of duties, heretofore, with one of the parties deeply interested in this matter; and it occurred to me that, however high he might stand above suspicion in his past character, any prepossession of that kind—any intimate relation of friendship with one of the parties—would necessarily subject him to public suspicion. Hence, I have thought that some mode ought to be adopted to prevent such an examination from being intrusted to him, in justice to himself, and to the public and to the Government, if he had any prepossession upon the subject. Although I had not looked into the provision made by this amendment, I had supposed that it was very proper to throw this investigation into some other hands—into the hands of a man above suspicion arising from any past association or friendship with the individuals concerned.

I have merely thrown out these suggestions to show that, as the law now stands, unless we make some other provision, the Superintendent must investigate these claims and report upon them.

I will remark, in addition, that I agree perfectly with the honorable Senator from Michigan, as I have expressed it heretofore, that the Government is under no obligation whatever to pay claims originating in the contracts of agents who manifestly exceeded their powers, and must have exceeded their instructions. I take that for granted. We are under no obligation whatever in such a case. No Government could stand it, if any agent, delegated with a limited trust, whom they might send to other quarters on important business, or important negotiations, could involve the Government ad libitum, disregarding those powers and instructions. It will not do to say that these are honest men who set up the claims, because thousands of honest men might very readily be led into making such contracts; and if there be anything in the character of the men engaged, no Government could stand if it was bound by such contracts.

But there is a difference between the duty of the Government and the power of the Legislature, after they have fully investigated all the circumstances under which the contracts originated, and found them to be free from fraud, or have been entered into under any very high public necessity, involving the safety of society or the safety of great public interests—circumstances under which most officers would feel at liberty to exceed the bounds of their instructions. If the exigencies of this case have been of such a nature as that, then it would be in the discretion of the legislative department to pay or not to pay them as they think proper. I am willing, myself, to give no vote which will sanction the principle that this Government is bound by those contracts. But I do not think that voting a sum of money to have a thorough investigation of the circumstances under which they were made, does commit the Government to the payment of the claims after the investigation shall have been made, whatever may be the result of that investigation, however honest it may appear to have been. For that reason, I am disposed to vote for the appropriation.

Mr. ADAMS. I rise for the purpose of moving to amend the amendment by striking out "ten" and inserting "five," so as to make the appropriation $5,000. I do it for this reason: I agree with the honorable Senator from Michigan, that if the agents of the Government transcend the power conferred upon them, those who trust most must lose. The Government is liable only for such contracts as are made by its officers, within the scope of their authority; but, as was correctly suggested by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, the legislative power has the right—if the contracts have been made by accredited agents of the Government, and innocent men have rendered service to those employed in the business of the Government—to make a remuneration. I think that the whole question resolves itself into this: that if it is the determination of Congress to make compensation to those who have parted with their property, under the authority of agents accredited by the Government in California in relation to this transaction, it is a money-saving business to make the appropriation asked for by the amendment. We all know what has been suggested by the Senator from Maryland, as to ex parte statements. I do not know but that it would be good policy, whenever an unliquidated claim is presented to the consideration of Congress, for the Government to pay a trusty agent to investigate the other side of the question. All those who have been in the habit of attending courts of justice know the advantage of ex parte or one-sided examinations.

The claims presented against the Government in this case amount to $800,000 or $1,000,000. Unless the claimants are more honest—or, take it for granted that they are honest, unless they are more reasonable in their appreciation of what is their right, and the rights of the adverse party, it would be an immense saving to the Government to have this investigation made. I understand the proposition is to appoint an agent to investigate the character of the claims. I move to strike out "ten" and insert "five," for this reason: there are plenty of individuals in California—I could point them out myself from my own limited acquaintance there—reliable men, upon whom this Congress could rely to ascertain all the facts, and furnish us with all the information necessary to enable us, if we determine to pay the claims, to know the circumstances under which the contracts were made, and the value of the supplies furnished to the United States. One half of the amount proposed by the amendment of the committee is amply sufficient. I admit, if you establish a regular court there, call for testimony pro and con, and adjudicate the various claims that may come there, that it would take $10,000 or $20,000, or even $50,000; but to appoint an agent or agents to investigate, furnishing them with a copy of the claims, one half the amount would be amply sufficient, and more than sufficient, to enable a trusty man to furnish all the information that would enable the Congress of the United States to act advisedly in making the payments of the claims.

I express no opinion as to the circumstances surrounding this transaction; but it is due to the Indian Department—as allusion has been made to it frequently—to say that the Indian commissioners were expressly informed of the amount of the appropriation, and were limited in their instructions in regard to their expenditures to that appropriation. It is due to that Department to say, that this transaction, beyond that, has been contrary to the express direction of the Department. Whether the Government is bound, under the peculiar circumstances surrounding the commissioners, from matters which could not have been known by the Congress or the head of the Indian Bureau, will be a matter for the consideration of Congress, when all the facts shall have been presented.

Then the question arises, under these circumstances, whether, as a matter of economy, and as a matter necessary to enable Congress to do justice to its citizens and to itself—and a Government can never do justice to itself without doing justice to every citizen in the community, whether public or private—such an appropriation should not be made as will enable Congress to have the information upon the side of Government at the time the question shall be adjudicated? I think, under all the circumstances, an appropriation for this purpose should be made—not $10,000, because that is unnecessary. Five thousand will be sufficient, and more than sufficient, to enable an agent or agents to investigate the character of the claims. For this reason, even if my proposition to amend fails, still that we may have both sides of the question before us once in the legislative history of the country, in the investigation of claims against the Government, I am willing to make the experiment. In my little experience in this and the other branch of Congress, I hardly know of a solitary case that has ever been presented to the Congress of the United States, where both sides of the claim have been presented to their consideration. It has always been ex parte. I think it will be worth the experiment in this matter to see what will be saved to the Government by investigating both sides. Therefore, I shall vote for the appropriation, even if my proposition to amend is rejected.

Mr. WELLER. If the Senate conclude to appoint an agent at all, I apprehend that ten thousand dollars will not be too much in order to pay the expenses of that agent. The State of California was divided between these commissioners into three divisions—Mr. McKee taking charge of the northern division, Mr. Wozencraft, of the central, and Mr. Barbour of the southern division.

These agents went into the respective portions of the State and made these contracts. Now, sir, in order to investigate the manner in which they were made; in order to determine the question whether the beef was or was not supplied under them, it will be necessary to visit the points at which the beef was to be delivered. The agent who may be appointed will therefore be compelled to go from the extreme northern part of the State to the extreme southern portion, because there are the points at which the beef was to have been delivered. There the witnesses reside whose testimony will be necessary in order to determine the question whether the beef was furnished for a fair consideration.

Now, whether Mr. McKee, as the particular commissioner for the northern section of the State, made contracts for the delivery of beef or not, I do not undertake to say. My understanding in that country was, that Mr. McKee had entered into contracts with parties for the delivery of beef. It was well known there that there was one case where the contractor, finding that it would be very inconvenient to drive the cattle over the mountains and deliver them at the points at which he had undertaken to deliver them, instead of running the risk of losing his cattle by driving them there, drove the Indians and fed them on the beef at his rancho, on the principle that it was much easier to drive the Indians down to the rancho than to drive the cattle to where the Indians were.

There have been charges made in the public newspapers of fraud in all these contracts. I do not undertake to express any opinion as to the guilt of these men; but I know this fact, that the Department was advised more than a year ago, that these Indian commissioners were making contracts; that they were giving drafts on the Government to men who had furnished their property for the use of the Government; and, so far as I know, the Department took no steps to arrest the progress of these events.

I can readily imagine a case where any Senator within the sound of my voice would be willing to vote for the payment of a contract. Suppose these Indian commissioners, when they went there, had found a state of things existing which led them to the impression that the whole of the frontier was about to be devastated by the Indians; suppose that, in order to avert that calamity—in order to prevent hostilities with the Indians—the commissioners, in the exercise of their discretion, contracted for the delivery of five hundred head of cattle, in order to appease the Indians: is there a Senator on this floor, under this state of the case, who would not be willing to pay the amount expended?

It is said that there are some cases of this sort. The commissioners allege that they have gone on the principle, that it was better to feed the Indians than to fight them; and perhaps that is oftentimes the cheapest plan. They allege, as their justification, that they have gone upon that principle. If they found a state of things existing there which led them to the impression, and is sufficient to satisfy the Senate, that a war was averted by furnishing these Indians, who were then starving, with beef, any Senator would say, at once, that a contract for such a purpose should be paid.

I do not know now who are the holders of these drafts. I think that whenever the contractors delivered cattle, the commissioners gave them drafts upon the Treasury, with full knowledge, of course, that there was not a single dollar in the Treasury to pay them. I have seen many of these drafts. Some of them, to the amount of $100,000, were in my hands but a short time ago. They belong to a gentleman who, I know, furnished in good faith his cattle to the commissioners, supposing that they had whatever authority was necessary to carry into effect the treaties which were made. Their impression was, that the treaties would have been ratified; and probably, after they had been formally signed by the Indian agent and the Indians, they were right in taking it for granted that they would be ratified by the Senate; but they have been rejected. The contractors were the holders of the drafts. In one case I know of an individual who had $130,000 of these drafts, which he has hypothecated as collateral security for a loan of $40,000, upon which he is to pay three per cent. a month; so that any one can see at once that he must be inevitably ruined. He has relied on the proceeds of the drafts taken from your Indian agents there to discharge his debt, and the consequences are apparent.

If it be the determination of the Senate to put themselves in possession of the facts, the appointment of this agent is indispensable. It is required not only by the interests of the Government, but it is demanded by the people of the State of California. If you are satisfied that any portion of them have, in good faith, supplied your agents with what was necessary to feed these Indians during the time when they were negotiating, it is your duty to put yourselves in possession of these facts by the appointment of an agent. Although some of my constituents are interested in this matter, I should not press it upon the Senate if I did not believe this information would be invaluable.

Mr. BADGER. The true objection, Mr. President, to the appropriation now sought to be made has not, in my judgment, yet been stated. It lies, in my mind, neither in any implied obligation of the Government for liability for these demands; nor in the amount proposed; nor in the supposition that these duties ought to be exercised by the present superintendent. My objection is above, behind, and more important and pressing, than any of these. It is this: You are going, under this amendment, if it be adopted by the Senate and agreed to by the House, to send out an agent into California for the purpose of investigating these alleged fraudulent transactions. Where are you to go to get him? Where are you to find the agent who can discharge this duty in such a manner as to meet the approbation and satisfy the judgment of the Senate and of the country?

Why, sir, here are four Indian commissioners. We have been told by one of the Senators from California, that before they were sent to that country to discharge these duties, they were men of unimpeached, and, as it was supposed, unimpeachable reputation—men of high character for integrity and firmness. They go there, and directly afterwards they are found engaged—in what? In making contracts in violation of their duty. And more than that: the honorable Senator from California [Mr. WELLER] says that they are strongly suspected, and strongly charged—though he gives no opinion as to whether that charge or suspicion be correct—with having been fraudulently, unlawfully, and culpably engaged in making profit to themselves out of the unlawful transactions attributed to them, and of which they were no doubt guilty.

Mr. WALKER. The papers in California publicly charge it.

Mr. BADGER. Yes, sir. Now, suppose you appoint an agent, and send him there. Unless you can get a Heaven-descended angel, what guarantee have you that as soon as he gets out there he will not be engaged in unlawful transactions, and be immediately charged in all the papers with fraud and corruption by these very claimants? If the moment these commissioners entered on these Indian transactions, they forgot the integrity which their former good conduct was supposed to have implied, lost all recollection of what they owed to themselves, their families, and the reputation they ought to maintain—if all these considerations were insufficient to support them, and maintain their integrity against the temptations which surrounded them, where will you find your agent of any known character and established reputation, who will go out there and investigate the propriety of allowing claims to the amount of $800,000, surrounded by every species of influence that is to mislead and bias him? He must do one of these things: Either yield himself to corruption, or what is next to it, (and practically as to the influence which his report would have, precisely the same,) be charged by all the newspapers with being corruptly engaged in villainously permitting one class of claims to be allowed at the expense of another. That is the difficulty, sir.

Ten thousand dollars is but a moderate sum. The object is desirable. It is important that the Government should obtain the information. But I ask, where is your guarantee that you can get any man who, if his integrity is proof against temptation, can stand against the universal imputation that he is corrupt and wicked? If the commissioners could not get along, how will the agent be able to stand perpendicular and erect, both in fact and in public estimation, in the discharge of this delicate duty with which it is proposed to clothe him? That is the difficulty.

Mr. ADAMS. In deference to the opinion of my friends from North Carolina and California, I withdraw my motion to amend the amendment.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from North Carolina, as has been suggested by a friend near me, is rather against the climate inhabited by my friends from California. It is the supposition that nobody who goes there can be honest. I do not believe that. I wish, however, to assign the reason which shall govern my vote against the proposition, it being entirely different from any reason which has been suggested. It is conceded by every one who has spoken, except the Senators from California, that the contracts which have been made by these agents or commissioners were contrary to the authority vested in them; and, consequently, these contracts impose no obligation, legal or equitable, upon this Government to pay them. I cannot, therefore, for my life, see how those who entertain that opinion—and all of us seem to entertain it, except the two Senators from California—can vote to send an agent to California to examine into these claims, when we prejudice them by the assertion on the part of everybody who has spoken, that the United States are not bound to pay, and will not pay them. Is it not a work of supererogation to send our agent there to make investigation? I have no doubt the Government can get an honest agent, who will make a just and strict investigation; but when every one admits, that even after the investigation may be made, the Government will not be bound to pay the claims, why should we want to investigate in reference to them? Why should we want an investigation in reference to claims for the payment of which we are not bound, and which we do not intend to pay under any possible circumstances? Entertaining this view, I shall vote against the amendment which has been proposed.

Mr. CASS. I desired to say before, that no alteration of the amount appropriated will change my view of the question. My objection is not to the amount appropriated—it is not to its costing $10,000 or $5,000—it is to the thing itself that I object. For one, I am determined not to touch it, and I will have "neither part nor lot" in it.

You will recollect, Mr. President, and the Senate will recollect, that one great ground upon which the Creek claims were sought to be sustained was, that we had sent commissioners to investigate them; and that, therefore, the faith of the Government was committed to pay them. That was one of the strongest arguments presented on that occasion. It was said that we were bound to pay the claims, because the Government, having sent commissioners among the Creeks to investigate them, and having reported upon the claims, it created expectations in the minds of the Indians that we would pay them. Now, I intend to take no such step in this case. I will give no ground for such an assumption. I repeat, I will not touch the matter under any circumstances.

This is one of the most flagrant acts that ever took place in this country. I think no man can doubt that. The honorable Senator from California [Mr. WELLER] says that war may have been averted by it. Why, I concede that there are circumstances of great public danger where, when a man has all the responsibility, he ought to take it. They might carry out measures which, under ordinary circumstances, would be very doubtful, and from which, probably, bad consequences might result. General Macomb, at Plattsburg, was perfectly right in burning the town, and Congress thought so, because it provided for payment for that destruction. Now, if these commissioners did this act with a view to avert an impending and probable war, I would unquestionably look at the circumstances, and see whether they were such as to exonerate them; but I have not the slightest belief in the world in any such thing.

Mr. PRATT. There is no such allegation, as I understand.

Mr. CASS. I understood the honorable Senator from California to say that such may have been the state of things. I have no belief at all that any such state of things existed, and I have no belief that any such motives actuated these commissioners; nor do I believe that if the Indians had not received one pound of beef, there would have been any war any more than there is now. The commissioners made the treaties which have been rejected by the Senate, and then they went on to carry them into effect, and, so far as they could, to pledge the faith of the Government to the amount of a million of dollars. What will be the consequence if we should sanction their act? Why, any Indian commissioner hereafter holding treaties will go on and contract debts equal to those contracted here, and appeal to this case, and say that Congress paid these claims, and that we should pay theirs. It will, in fact, be a motive for the commissioners to contract debts, and for persons to tender their property in order to get paid for it.

I shall not vote for one dollar of these claims that do not come before us in the proper manner. They should not come here by the act of the Government. The Government should take no part in it; but if a claim is presented through the Committee on Claims, and comes here for the action of Congress in that way, I shall take it up, and consider it, and judge for myself what ought to be done; but I repeat, I will take no initiatory steps that shall, by any possibility, lead to the presumption that this Government considers that it is responsible for these debts.

Mr. BADGER. One single word of explanation. I did not intend, as my friend from Maryland [Mr. PRATT] supposed I did, to intimate that there were not men of integrity, who could be secured for the discharge of the duties of this office.

I should be very sorry, sir, to think so poorly of my kind, as to suppose that competent men could not be procured by hundreds. But I say, that in order that this office shall be effectually and profitably discharged, the man who fills it must not only be a man of inflexible integrity, but he must be recognized and admitted to be such. The influence of his decision will depend upon its moral force. His decision does not bind us. What I meant to convey was, that as with regard to these commissioners, they had fallen either under the influence of temptation, or under the unjust imputation of having yielded to it; so with regard to any agent you will send out there. Sir, the spirit of defamation is so rife in the country, that I undertake to say, it is impossible that any man, be he who he may, can be appointed to discharge the duties of an office of this kind, whatever may be the purity, the snow-white purity of his character, who will not be charged, decide as he may, and will not, by a large portion of the community, be believed to have been guilty of some base and corrupt violation of his duty. And in order to the exercise, effectually and valuably to the country, of such a commission as is here proposed, the agent must not only be upright, but his uprightness must be unquestioned; he must not only be pure, but unsuspected.

My difficulty is in knowing where and how you can get such a man. I do not see how. Four gentlemen went into California as commissioners. They went with unsuspected characters; irreproachable men—men of the highest standing. The very moment they got there they are found making contracts in violation of their duty, and are generally charged in the newspapers with the grossest corruption. Now, where can you get an agent that can bring any better guarantees that he will either do right, or will be looked upon by the public as doing right? Therefore I think that, upon the whole, desirable as it would be—for I do not yield to any of the other opinions—to enter into this investigation, we had better, under the circumstances, trust to ourselves to investigate the claims, when they come here, as best we may.

Mr. PEARCE. The allegation was made by these Indian commissioners that there was imminent danger of an Indian outbreak along the whole frontier of California. That was the sole pretense of an excuse for their conduct. And, certainly, if that allegation had not been made, I, for one, should never have been willing to listen, for a moment, to any proposed investigation; for, without that justification, or that palliation of their conduct, it would be a matter of no importance to the Senate whether these contracts were fairly or fraudulently made; whether all the provisions were supplied as they are charged or not; whether they were charged at double prices, or at proper prices. In short, there would be no question for us to consider, except with how much contempt and reprehension we should treat the whole demand. But that allegation does make a difference in the state of affairs. I understand the Senator from Michigan to say that, if it were true that an Indian war could have been, and was, averted by these means, then he might consider the question.

Mr. CASS. I said, and I repeat, that if there was an extreme state of danger in that country, and that could be made manifestly to appear to Congress, it would justify us in meeting the expenditures. I do not think it would justify us in meeting the whole amount of expenditures, but it would justify us in a portion perhaps. But we should require the clearest and the most decisive proof of that fact, and not idle rumors.

Mr. PEARCE. Well, sir, that is the allegation—that is the very thing which I desire to have investigated under this amendment. Other investigations will necessarily follow as to the quantity furnished—whether it was necessary, as to the full amount furnished, and whether it was furnished at proper prices. But it has been said by the Senator from California [Mr. GWIN] himself, that there were actual hostilities waging at the time these men state—that there were a great many Indian massacres and massacres by the Indians at that time. These commissioners pretend to justify themselves upon that ground, and that ground alone. This is the first thing which I desire to investigate, and without which I would not investigate the other questions at all.

Mr. BAYARD. I would ask the honorable

Senator from Maryland, if any such reason was assigned to the President of the United States, or to the Department of the Interior, by these agents at the time they transcended their authority? Was it said at the time, that it was with a view to prevent an Indian war, or because they feared that, if they did not assume that responsibility, such a war would ensue? Or is this merely a foreshadowing of a reason for coming here afterwards? Was it assigned by these agents at the time, as a reason for the exercise of authority not confided to them, that there was danger of Indian hostilities, which justified them in going beyond the appropriations which had been made by Congress?

Mr. PEARCE. I believe that allegation was made, in the letters of the agents accompanying the treaties. I have not the letters before me, however, and cannot refer to them at present. They were printed in the document which was laid upon our tables several months ago. I believe one of the letters bears date in the fall of 1851.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I think the question as to whether these contracts were necessary to avert a war, relates a little further back than to the return of the treaties here, and the reasons assigned for making them. I have thought that the Government took the initiative. We appropriated money in the first place. If these Indian hostilities were threatened then, the appropriation should have been made on the ground that it was necessary to avert them by treaty; and the question should have been presented to Congress at the time the appropriation of $50,000 was made. But I have never heard it urged as a reason for making that appropriation. Some Senator would certainly have recollected, if it had been given as a reason for the appropriation, that there were Indian hostilities impending over the people of California, and that it was absolutely necessary to make the appropriation, and to make large concessions to the Indians to avert a war. We should certainly have heard something of it at the time. I did not hear anything of it, and for that reason I cannot suppose that it can be alleged now as a valid reason for recognizing the acts of the Indian commissioners. It could hardly have been, that we appropriated money and appointed an agent to go out and treat with the Indians, and when the Indians came to treat, they became so hostile, and made such formidable demonstrations, that it was necessary to involve the Government to the amount of $1,000,000 to avert a war. So that, I apprehend, this idea of averting Indian hostilities can hardly be a justification for the acts of the commissioners.

But be that as it may, I think it is the first time in the history of legislation here, that it has been seriously proposed to appropriate money for the payment of an agent to scour the country, and ascertain who has got a claim against the Government, and what is the ground of it; for it seems to me that this proposition amounts to that. If there are claims arising without any very gross or flagrant fraud, as is alleged, it will be time enough to consider them when they come before us in the ordinary way, as ordinary claims. But, if these claims have originated in such fraudulent practices as have been alleged, it seems to me, that, instead of sending an agent there to investigate them, the district attorney of the United States ought to be directed to prosecute the parties. That is my view as to what would be the proper way to dispose of this matter.

If there be no fraud—if the commissioners have, without fraud, exceeded their authority, and contracted debts for which the Government is not bound, it will be time enough to consider them when they are brought forward, and to reject them if we please; or if their authority be found to conform to the law, we can pay them. But if these debts have been contracted under circumstances as grossly fraudulent as have been alleged, to that enormous amount, I think that legal steps ought to be taken by the law officers of the Government to bring it before the courts, and not before Congress.

Mr. ADAMS. I am very reluctant to procrastinate the discussion upon this subject; already too much time, doubtless, has been consumed in the investigation of this and other matters connected with the bill; but I beg the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to correct a slight misapprehension of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT.]

I understood him to say that it is admitted on all hands that there is no legal or equitable claim upon the Government for the amount of these contracts. The first part of the proposition is true. It is admitted on all hands that there is no legal claim; but I, for one, do not admit that there may not be some equitable claim upon this Government for these $800,000 which have been presented. There may be some equitable claim, and hence the necessity of the inquiry. This transaction of the commissioners may be surrounded by circumstances which may show that they saw it was necessary, in order to save their brethren, their wives, and their children from slaughter, to make contracts; and if so, and those contracts did answer that purpose, and it was apparent to every reasonable man on the ground, that it was not and could not have been known here, I ask honorable Senators whether there is not an equitable claim to pay the value of the property taken to save the lives of our citizens? May it not be so? No one here is prepared to say that it is not so; and is it not reasonable that we should investigate that matter?

My friend from Arkansas anticipates the record, and speaks of the merits of the question, in relation to which we are not advised. Senators seem anxious to dispose of this, as if it were an ordinary case. The Senator from Arkansas says, let the parties present their claim. Why, sir, claims to the amount of $800,000 have already been presented. The Senator from Arkansas says, Why institute an inquiry as to who has the claims? We know who hold them already; we know who are the holders of claims to the amount of $800,000, which have been presented here. We all admit that the claims are not legal ones. The question then is, is it expedient and proper now that we should investigate the side of the Government, and appoint an agent for that purpose? That it would be not only profitable to the Government, but right and just to all concerned, I have not the slightest doubt.

Mr. PRATT. It certainly requires no investigation on the side of the Government. The Government rests upon the instructions which she gave her agents. She could only be bound coextensively with those instructions. I submit, therefore, to my friend from Mississippi, that the side of the Government certainly requires no investigation.

The Senator says that he can imagine a case which will produce an equitable claim for these $800,000. He says that amount might have been expended to avoid bloodshed, and that in that case there would have been an equitable claim. Now, I think that the facts stated by my colleague in his first speech are conclusive evidence that no such state of things existed. He stated that the President, after an investigation of the illegal exercise of authority upon the part of the commissioners, rebuked them; that one was forced to resign, and that another was turned out. If there did exist a necessity for this expenditure to avoid bloodshed, we all know the President of the United States too well not to know that he would not have turned out these men if there had been any plausibility in their allegation. He has not been apt to turn out either friends or foes. He certainly never turned out any one without investigation; and he would not have condemned the course of these commissioners if there had been any plausibility in their allegation that their acts were produced by the necessity of avoiding an Indian war. Therefore we have irresistibly before us proof that the state of facts upon which some Senators rely did not exist.

Mr. PEARCE. My colleague is mistaken in supposing that I said that the President rebuked these commissioners. I said that they had been rebuked, but by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I did not say that the President had rebuked them. I have found the letter to which I adverted a moment ago, from which I wish to read an extract. It is a letter from Mr. Barbour, dated January 5, 1852, in which he says:

"The plan for our future operations was duly communicated to your Department. We found the Indians at open war with the whites in many parts of the State; and with but few exceptions, I believe in the southern portion of the State, (that portion subsequently assigned to me,) they were hostile, and the war between them and the whites characterized by those acts of rapine and murder usual in Indian warfare. The country called for some relief from such a state of affairs; the miners had been driven from the gold mines, and every day almost some outrage or injury was done to the person or property of the citizens, and in return many of the Indians were killed, and their stores of provisions destroyed."

This letter was dated January 5, 1852, and Mr. Barbour left California, I believe, in the fall of 1851, with a portion of the treaties in his possession. He was delayed some time on the Isthmus, as I understand, by the loss of his baggage. He finally came to New Orleans, from which place he went to Kentucky, the State of his residence. From that State he addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs the letter from which I have read an extract. That is the first official information, so far as I know, that was communicated to the Government that there was any danger of Indian hostilities in California.

Mr. WELLER. I ought, perhaps, in justice to the commissioners, to say that it was claimed by them throughout, not only in the correspondence but in California, in justification of their action, that these contracts were indispensable to avoid hostilities on the part of the Indians. They say that a great deal of bad feeling had been gotten up between the citizens of the State of California and the Indians, and that by making these contracts and supplying the Indians with food they averted hostilities. I know that that is claimed by them, and it is for that reason I am not prepared to say that the Indian commissioners did no good act.

I was opposed to the ratification of the treaties, because they retained a great many reservations for the Indians in the midst of the white population. A great many of these reservations were made in the northern section of the State, on mineral lands; and I knew that it would be utterly impossible to secure to the Indians the undisturbed possession of the reservations proposed to be set off to them. That was one reason, and a very strong one, which influenced me in voting against the ratification of those treaties. But that the Indian commissioners, in many of their operations, acted in good faith, I do not doubt. I have no doubt whatever that they supposed there was imminent danger of an Indian war. It is claimed by them that none of the tribes of Indians, with which they entered into treaties, gave the citizens of California any trouble during the last year. During the latter part of last year, we were constantly involved in difficulties with the Indians, and our State has been subjected to an immense expenditure in meeting those Indian difficulties. It is affirmed by the commissioners that none of the difficulties took place between the citizens of California and those tribes with which negotiations were had. I confess I am not in possession of the necessary information to enable me to decide whether this be true or not, but I am inclined to the opinion that, to a certain extent, it is true; and that very few of the Indians with whom they negotiated, and to whom they delivered food, gave the citizens of California any difficulty during the past year. It may, therefore, be possible that the General Government, if, in the end, it should be compelled to pay the $800,000, may have saved more than that amount by not being compelled to refund to the State of California money which that State would otherwise have expended in meeting those hostilities.

Now, sir, there is no doubt about this, that although there may have been individuals sent into that country who have transcended their authority, and made contracts against the wishes of the Department, there can still be found some honest man in that country to investigate into the matter. My friend from North Carolina seems to think that because three or four men who have been sent out there have engaged in improper transactions, and transcended their authority, it is therefore impossible to find an honest man there, but that the very moment he breathes the atmosphere of California he becomes a rogue. Why, I could guaranty to my friend from North Carolina that he could go there, spend a whole year, and come back as honest a man as he is now. I undertake to say further that there are just as many honest and intelligent men in the State of California, who have breathed the atmosphere of the Pacific coast for the last two years, as can be found in the State which he represents.

He seems to take it for granted that the whole population of California are interested in these contracts, and that the very moment your agent, sent out under the authority of this law, got there, such a clamor would be raised by the population of California about his ears that he would fall under its malign influence, and, like some others who have been sent out, turn out to be a rogue. I suppose that there are not more than fifty men in the whole State of California who are interested in these claims. It is well known that the beef was supplied by gentlemen who owned extensive tracts of country, and who owned immense herds of cattle. The beef was furnished by them. The great body of the people of California had no interest in the matter; but a very large majority of them were opposed to these treaties. They were opposed to the transactions of these commissioners; and my word for it, so far from the man who may be sent out having improper influences brought to bear upon him, in order to induce him to report in favor of these contracts, the clamor will be the other way. He will find himself surrounded by men who are denouncing the commissioners and the contracts which they have made. There is no danger to be apprehended on that head. If I were to undertake to designate, I could name many men in California who have sufficient knowledge and intelligence to report upon the facts, as to the manner in which the commissioners transacted the public business.

I agree with my friend from Michigan, that this is a most extraordinary case. It is the first time, in the history of the Government, where an agent who was sent out with limited power to draw to the amount of $25,000 or $50,000, has undertaken to make contracts which will exceed $1,000,000; but, nevertheless, the act has been done. It has been done by the agents of the Government. They have procured the property of the citizens of California, who supposed that they were authorized to make these treaties. Those citizens surrendered their property in good faith, and at some day they will be asking Congress, as a matter of justice and equity, to pay them for their property thus furnished.

I shall not undertake to repeat what I have heard in regard to this question, because there is a great deal said which is not true; and I have, in my own past history, a striking illustration of the fact that you cannot always rely on the newspapers. But there are many charges made against the Indian commissioners, which ought to be investigated before we can decide upon any of these claims. That some claims will appeal so strongly to the justice and equity of Congress, as to impress on the minds of honorable gentlemen the necessity of paying them, I have not the slightest doubt; but, in order to discriminate, you must have some person with power to investigate.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, I shall not prolong this debate by noticing the points which have been alluded to, further than in one slight respect. I want to make a suggestion to the friends of this proposition, with regard to the form of it. As the amendment now stands, it proposes to appropriate $10,000, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to make this investigation. Now, I think that if we make the appropriation, we ought to make it as effective as possible. The objection stated by the honorable Senator from North Carolina had occurred to me, and I mentioned it to a Senator near me. If an officer of the Government was to select a particular agent of known character and ability and send him to investigate these claims, no man would undertake it for any compensation that could be given under the appropriation of $10,000. Very few men of competent character would undertake it voluntarily any how, for any compensation you could give. Very few would be willing to go from this country to California; and in California it would be a very invidious task to select an individual. But still I doubt not that there are competent gentlemen who would undertake it for some reasonable compensation.

I think we ought to extend the sphere of authority which we are communicating to the Government. We ought to change the phraseology of the amendment in such a manner as to make it read, "to enable the President to cause investigation" of the circumstances under which these extraordinary claims against the Government have originated. All admit that it is almost unparalleled in the history of the Government. It is worthy the consideration and attention of the highest Executive officer. The Secretary of the Interior might be altogether competent in that respect; but I think it ought to be put under the direction of the President.

Again: there may be a military commission existing in California. The officer in command in that country may change it; and it has been suggested here that these supplies have been furnished under military exigencies, on account of war being threatened by the neighboring Indian tribes. It seems to me that the military officer in command—if he is a gentleman of high character, as I believe he is—I do not know who is there now—I refer to the commanding officer of last year—would be a very proper person to judge of that allegation, and investigate the truth of it; and the President would have power, in connection with the allegation made as to the military exigencies of the country at that time, to direct him to make inquiry into those circumstances, and to report. He might have to send for witnesses at a great distance. He might have to visit the different sections of the country.

Again: the President, under such an appropriation as I suggest, would have the power of sending any known, tried, and experienced accounting officer there—a gentleman possessing such a character as the honorable Senator from North Carolina says he ought to possess. I only make this suggestion to the friends of the measure. I think it would be well enough to have the service done by known officers of the Government, of experience and standing, who would inspire confidence in the public generally.

Mr. WELLER. Upon the suggestion of my friend from Tennessee, I move to amend the amendment by striking out "Secretary of the Interior," and inserting "President of the United States." This suggestion has my entire approbation, and, therefore, I offer the amendment to the amendment. I would assign, as one reason for it, that, amongst the various charges that have been made against the commissioners in California, some were in regard to gentlemen connected with the Department of the Interior.

Mr. BELL. I made no allusion to that.

Mr. WELLER. That is an additional reason why the control of this matter should be given to the President of the United States. It would be perfectly satisfactory, I doubt not, to all the parties in California, that the appointment should be made by the President himself directly.

Mr. BELL. I beg leave to say that I made the suggestion in reference to the power of the President to require the military officers to report to him. The Secretary of the Interior could not do that. The President alone can command the services of the military officers.

Mr. WELLER. I prefer that the appointment should be made directly by the President of the United States, and therefore offer the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that amendment will be adopted, for the reasons which have been suggested, and for a further reason which I think I can give. Under the amendment as proposed to be amended, the President of the United States can order—and, in my opinion, he could not do better than order—the officers of the Army to investigate this matter. They are in the country; the commissaries and quartermasters are scattered all over the country, and they could make this examination with impartiality.

I am very glad the suggestion has been made by the Senator from Tennessee. I am not sure that there are officers of the Army there who can investigate the subject, and can report the facts of the case in a proper manner.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, the Senator from California does not exactly meet the point of my objection to the amendment. It does not rest upon the ground that there are not men of integrity and capacity to discharge these duties in such a way as ought to give entire satisfaction to the Senate and the country; but it rested upon this: That we had strong reason to believe that any person who might be sent there for the purpose of discharging these duties, would either fall a victim to temptation, or a victim to vilification. What is the case here? Four men of unimpeachable reputation were sent out to California as Indian commissioners, and immediately after they entered upon their duties, they were found engaged in unlawful transactions, and were generally charged by the whole newspaper press of that country with being engaged in participating in fraudulent contracts on the Government. Here, where these four commissioners have fallen, you propose to send out one man, exposed to the same trials, the same difficulties, the same dangers, to make an investigation of the proceedings of his four great and illustrious predecessors. Now, sir, I submit, if there is not good reason to fear that there would be something that would be injurious to the integrity and fatal to the reputation of the man who might be engaged in such an investigation? Then my objection was this: As he was not to decide private claims between individuals; as he was not like a judge, whose sentence has weight of its own force, but one whose opinions were to govern us from their moral influence, how could we hope to derive benefit from such an investigation, when he would come here either contaminated with corruption, or with a general imputation upon him, however unjust, that he was so contaminated? That was the ground of my objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I cannot see any good reason for the proposed amendment to the amendment. I take this Administration to be a unit, and I do not see that it makes much difference whether we leave this matter to the President of the United States or to the Secretary of the Interior. I do not see any necessity for the change proposed by the amendment of the Senator from California. I would have preferred the amendment in its former shape.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for the reading of the amendment as amended; and it was accordingly read, as follows:

To enable the President of the United States to cause an investigation to be made of certain claims preferred against the United States for provisions alleged to have been furnished to the Indians of California, §10,000.

Mr. BAYARD. Upon that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays. I think it involves a very important principle, in regard to which I agree entirely with the sentiments of the Senator from Michigan.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 9, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bell, Dawson, Foot, Gwin, Mallory, Pearce, Smith, and Weller—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Borland, Bright, Brodhead, Brooke, Cass, Charlton, Chase, Clarke, Davis, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Houston, Jones of Iowa, King, Mason, Meriwether, Miller, Norris, Pratt, Sebastian, Seward, Spruance, Sumner, Toucey, Underwood, Upham, Wade, and Walker—34.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ATCHISON. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until tomorrow.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope not.

Mr. ATCHISON. I have a great many amendments to propose to the bill by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I understand that we have now got through the amendments of the Committee on Finance.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. SEBASTIAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 6, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of House bill No. 146, to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present certain resolutions of the Legislature of Connecticut.

There was no objection, and the resolutions were received by the House.

Mr. VENABLE. I call for the reading of the resolutions.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I ask whether this reading will come out of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It will come out of the morning hour.

Mr. McLANAHAN. Then I object to the reading of the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions having been received, any gentleman has the right to have them read.

Mr. VENABLE. I call for their reading.

The resolutions were then read by the Clerk, as follows:

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, GENERAL ASSEMBLY, }
May Session, 1852.

Resolved by this Assembly, That the union of the United States, and the Constitution by authority of which the Federal Government is administered, were results of a spirit of compromise and mutual concession among the conflicting interests and sentiments of the people of different sections of the country; and that it is the duty of every good citizen now to exercise the same spirit of compromise and concession in cases of sectional differences of interest or opinion, for the purpose of preserving for themselves and their posterity the blessings resulting from that union and government, in the perpetuity of which are involved not only the future welfare and prosperity of the people of this country, but also in a great degree the progress of the cause of civil and religious liberty and free government throughout the world.

Resolved, That in a Government like this, in which all political power emanates from the people, by whom all rulers and legislators are appointed, and to whom they are responsible, it is peculiarly the duty of all citizens to yield cheerful obedience to all laws regularly enacted by their representatives, until such laws shall have been legally adjudged by the proper tribunal to be unconstitutional.

Resolved, That the series of measures denominated the compromise measures, adopted by the last Congress, disposing finally and peacefully of a variety of questions which had previously disturbed the country, embarrassed the Government and the National Legislature, and seriously threatened the existence of the Union, were wisely adapted to the fair adjustment of the vexed questions at issue, and constituted a fair and equitable compromise of the whole subject; and that said series of measures, as such compromise, meet the full approbation of this Assembly.

Resolved, That the act, termed the "fugitive slave law," is, in the judgment of this Assembly, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, containing merely provisions in detail necessary to carry into effect the provisions of that instrument; and that it is the duty of all good citizens to sustain the execution of said act by all lawful and proper means.

Resolved, That his Excellency the Governor may be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States, to the Governor of each of the several States of the Union, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

SENATE, June 23, 1852.—Passed.

L. B. BRADLEY, Clerk.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 28, 1852.—Concurred.

G. W. SAYLES, Assistant Clerk.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the resolutions be laid upon the table and printed.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. I object to the printing.

The question was then taken, and the resolutions were ordered to lie upon the table.

The question then recurred upon the motion to print.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I wish to be heard at some suitable time upon the motion to print, and upon the resolutions; but I do not desire to debate them now, as time is precious so near the close of the session. I move that the motion to print be postponed until the second Monday in December next, when we shall have more time to discuss them, which I am desirous of doing.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move the previous question upon the motion to print.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to know what will be the effect of the adoption of the previous question upon the motion to postpone?

The SPEAKER. It will cut off the motion to postpone.

The previous question was then seconded.

Mr. CABLE demanded the yeas and nays upon ordering the main question; but they were not ordered.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The question was then taken, and the resolutions were ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were ordered to be printed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put, and the latter motion was agreed to.

FEES AND COSTS OF COURTS.

Mr. OLDS. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business, is the consideration of the following bill:

"A bill to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the 'circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes.'

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Speaker, if this were a bill merely to regulate the fees and costs of clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the district and circuit courts of the United States, as it assumes to be, I should not trouble the House with any remarks upon it, notwithstanding I am persuaded it will work great injustice in this respect if passed.

But I am sure, if gentlemen of this House will trouble themselves to read the bill carefully, they will find it involves the most material changes in the criminal law of the country. These features, I think, should arrest the attention of the House before they give their sanction to the bill in its present form. I hope this bill will, at least, be recommitted, in order to have those obnoxious features stricken out. The features to which I now allude, and to which I shall only incidentally refer, may be found on the second and third pages of the bill. On the third page of the bill is the following paragraph, viz:

"Whenever there are, or shall be, several charges against any person or persons for the same act or transaction, or for two or more acts or transactions connected together, or for two or more acts or transactions of the same class of crimes or offenses which may be properly joined, instead of having several indictments, the whole may be joined in one indictment in separate counts; and if two or more indictments shall be found in such cases, the court may order them consolidated."

It is known to every gentleman who has the least experience in criminal practice, that according to the English law, and according to the law as practiced in most of the States in this Union, wherever there are found two or more counts in an indictment charging felonies, the prosecuting attorney is always required by the court to make his election upon which of the counts he will proceed to trial. This bill proposes to adopt an entirely different rule, and by authority of law, to reverse the practice, and place it in the power of any court of the United States to try any person accused of crime, upon any number of counts. The language is "which may be properly joined," not legally joined. Thus introducing a discretion dangerous in the extreme, if exercised by the courts, and jeopardizing the liberty of the citizens, by placing them within judicial legislation. Under a practice like this, the accused would not be safe. It would be impossible for any man, laboring under the disadvantages which usually surround those accused of crime in this country to prepare himself for a successful defense against the charge of two or more offenses. If prepared for one, he might be convicted of the other for want of evidence, not knowing for which offense he would be arraigned.

Again, Mr. Speaker, on the fourth page it is said: "When two or more charges are, or shall be made, or two or more indictments shall be found against a person, only one writ or warrant shall be necessary to arrest and commit him for trial; and it shall be sufficient to state in the writ the name or general character of the offense, or to refer to them only in very general terms." This is proposed to be the language of the criminal statute law of the United States in the nineteenth century—that crimes upon the face of the warrant are not to be specially described; that a man accused of crime is not to be informed by the warrant of what he is accused, and that the charges need only be described in very general terms. Our ancestors, three hundred years ago, defied and denounced this principle. It was one of the most odious artifices of despotism. The twelve English judges in the time of Elizabeth, denounced it, and in the time of Charles I. they reiterated their condemnation; and we are now, in this nineteenth century, asked to incorporate this tyrannical and odious principle in the criminal code of the Union.

For the purpose of saving a few dollars to the Treasury, we propose to jeopard the liberty and security of every citizen of these United States. But I hope, nay I know, it is only necessary to call the attention of this House to the dangerous consequences emanating from such a proposition, in order to insure its rejection.

Another section provides: "When an indictment for crime shall be tried before a jury, and a conviction is had, in addition to the attorney's fees allowed by this act, the district attorney may be allowed a counsel fee in proportion to the importance and difficulty of the case, not exceeding thirty dollars."

This clause is said to be taken from the statutes of some of the States. I hope, for the cause of justice, there are not many which have adopted it. A premium of thirty dollars offered for rigorous prosecution! How long ere, under such temptation, prosecuting will degenerate into persecution, is not difficult to foresee.

The sovereignty of the United States, with all the means and appliances of power, arrayed against a poor prisoner, suspected of crime, without friends or fortune to defend him, is a spectacle pitiable enough. When rewards for conviction are thrown into the scale against him, well may the law commend him to Heaven for a safe deliverance.

I shall not consume the time of the House any longer in pointing out the several obnoxious features of this bill, but wish to say that the principle of this bill is antagonistic to, and the reverse of all legislation upon this subject from the commencement of this Government.

Mr. Speaker, all the lawyers of this House know that when the Federal judiciary was being organized, it was the anxious desire of the Congress of those times, to make the Federal Government sit easy upon the several States. It was the great solicitude to interfere as little as possible with the machinery of the several States, and particularly with the laws, the institutions, the customs, and the practices of their courts. In conformity with that desire, the Congress of 1789 required that the process of the Federal courts, in each State should conform to the process of the several States, and that the laws and decisions of the several States should be the rules of decision in the Federal courts, wherever they would apply.

Thus, while a uniform system of laws and jurisprudence was extended over the thirteen United States, the modes of executing and interpreting them were expressly varied to suit the preëxisting institutions and habits of the people. New courts were established, and new officers were created; yet those courts and those officers were expressly enjoined to adopt, as far as possible, the forms of process and proceeding, and principles of decision which the several States had respectively established and used. There was unity of design, with variety of detail. This regard for the rights of the States, proceeded as much from the necessity of the times, as from profound policy. Although all the thirteen States derived their jurisprudence from the common law and such statutes of Great Britain as were applicable to their condition, yet in the century which had elapsed between their colonization and the Revolution, local customs, colonial legislation, and judicial interpretation had established in each, forms of proceeding, and principles of interpretation peculiar to themselves, which it would have been onerous and oppressive to change abruptly. Each would have exclaimed, in the language of the Barons,

"Nolumus legis anglie mutari."

These judicial forms have become a part of the laws, the language, and muniments of the State, and the knowledge and practice of them a science or profession—varying in detail in almost every State in the Union—and in the values attached to them.

Now, for the first time, it is proposed to require all who administer the law, as attorneys, solicitors, clerks, or marshals, throughout the United States, except California, however different the modes of administration, whether simple or complex, easy or difficult; whatever the length or brevity of process; however different the forms may be in different States, or however various the wages of labor in such pursuits in different States, to adopt one horizontal scale of fees, whether adequate or not. The exception in behalf of California exposes the grossness of the proposition. The exception is just—but why? Because a different standard of prices for labor prevails there. So with regard to judicial business in every State of the Union. Maine and Louisiana, Maryland and Mississippi, the East and the West, the North and South, have different forms, different prices, which cannot be made to approximate any common standard. It would be as just to enact that one uniform price of manual labor should be charged, from Texas to Maine, as to put a uniform price on the time and labor of attorneys, clerks, and marshals, throughout the United States, without regard to the different circumstances which surround them.

The original laws regulating the fees of these officers being based on the scale of fees, established in the respective States, adding one third, were founded in equity and justice, having due regard to the variety of place and circumstance under which the services were to be performed. Nobody is so well qualified to judge of the value of such services as the Legislatures of the States, and when provision is made for measuring the compensation of Federal officers, by the prices allowed in the respective States in which they serve, every precaution is taken which ordinary legislation can devise.

Now, an entirely different spirit has come over us. Now, we are not only to have Federal courts, but we must have Federal process, exercised under Federal laws, with a total disregard to the local institutions, to the local laws, and to the local practices of the several States.

There never has been, in my judgment, a bill introduced into Congress, showing the features of consolidation more obviously than this. Here a horizontal scale of fees is introduced. Here general terms are used, wholly inapplicable to many of the States, under which no fee bill can be taxed, which imposes upon private citizens more than a hundred per cent. of legal taxation, in order to protect the Government.

Look at the very first feature of the bill, upon page second. The legal taxable costs in every jury trial is to be $20. Now, it is only $10 under the act of 1789. (I omitted to state that the act of 1789 provided that the costs, as taxed in the supreme courts of the several States, with one third added, should be the allowance of attorneys and clerks in the United States courts.) This bill adopts an entirely different standard. Under that standard, in the State of Maryland, the legal cost of an attorney, as taxed, was $10, but now, in every case in which there is a jury trial, the defendant is to be mulcted with $20 costs.

What community at all involved in litigation, can bear oppression of this kind? Whence the change, Mr. Chairman? Do you find the citizens of the United States complaining of the judiciary system? So far as I learn, there is no memorial addressed to us upon that subject. It is the United States, the great corporation of the United States, which considers itself aggrieved. If it be aggrieved, let it address its remedy to its own wrongs, and not attempt to impose upon every citizen an addition of one hundred per cent. taxable legal costs in order to protect themselves.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is not necessary to protect the Government. The Government has the means of protection in its own hands. It has already adopted a law requiring every officer, marshal, and State attorney, to return an account of their receipts; all whose salaries exceed $6,000, are required to pay the surplus into the Treasury. Is not this restraint sufficient? But they tell us the accounting officers of the Treasury say, the marshals and the clerks abuse this right; they make enormous charges, and do not faithfully account. Has not the Government power to remove the marshals—are they not appointed at pleasure, and would not any man justly obnoxious to this charge be a fit subject for instant dismissal?

If the House will take the trouble to examine document No. 2, accompanying the report of the Secretary of the Interior, they will find the grievance proceeds from an entirely different cause. Under the old system, the judges of the courts of the United States were required to examine the accounts of marshals and clerks, and certify them to the Government. By the act of 1842, this duty was transferred to the clerks; and the Acting Comptroller says that the tendency of the transfer has been to induce the judges to neglect their duty, and to rely upon the clerk's certificate, and that since that time the expenses have greatly increased. But the Acting Comptroller does not disclose the whole case. In the document appended to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, will be found a reference to a letter of Judge Dickinson, complaining of the indignities thrown upon the bench by the accounting officers of the Treasury. Judge Dickinson says: "Judge Baldwin, for years before his death, actually refused to examine and certify accounts of the officers of the court, because the officers of the Department (as he thought) improperly interfered with his duties; and Judge Grier made complaint of like conduct."

This is the ground of the complaint. The act of 1798, and the subsequent acts up to 1842, had committed the interests of this Republic and the interests of the Treasury to the supervision of the judges of the district and of the circuit courts. But the accounting officers, not content with relying upon that, undertake to revive and supervise, and to reverse their allowances; and the judges, finding themselves treated with this indignity, have refused to perform that special duty. You will find that the tables returned to this House, while showing an enormous increase in the expenses of the judiciary system, show that that increase commenced about the year 1842, about the time the supervision of the judges was withdrawn—about the time that this responsibility was divided between the clerks and the judges.

We have not had time to probe the whole extent of this business. We have not had time to ascertain where the wrong is, or who committed it. It is evident, from the papers returned with this bill, that the United States Attorney General gave opinions which authorized, to some extent, the revisions of the clerks' accounts by the accounting officers of the Treasury; and the language of the first of these opinions—I refer now to the opinions of Attorney General Wirt—is exceedingly cautious. He expressly declares—"The account, then, is to be first submitted to the Auditor, and he is to examine it—not to control, in the slightest degree, the discretion with which the law has invested the court, but to see that that discretion has been exercised upon the subjects pointed out by the law, or, in other words, to see that the account contains no items but those which are authorized by the law."

Other Attorneys General, Messrs. Butler and Crittenden, following in the wake of Mr. Wirt, have made subsequent decisions, the effect of which is, that the certificates of the judge of the district or of the circuit courts is not conclusive of the law and the facts. And the accounting officers of the Treasury may be authorized to revise their certificates and their construction of the law. Any system which is subject to such a revision must be productive of great injury to this country.

Those of us who have any regard for the profession of the law, those of us who have any veneration for the bench, and who would have the law interpreted by men bred to the law, should see, at least, that a proper respect is paid to the public functionaries of the law. I undertake to say that a bill could be framed, of some ten paragraphs, that would get at the whole of this evil, and not subject the citizens of the United States to an onerous burden of one hundred per cent. of additional legal taxation, or the high judicial officers of the country to unnecessary mortification.

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to dwell upon these general features. My great object was to show that the fee bill, as at present presented to this House, is not at all conformable to the law, the usages, and institutions of the State of Maryland, or the District of Columbia, and that it will be impossible, under the present language of this bill, if all these laws of the United States are to be changed, for these officers to tax their fees at all.

The District of Columbia is peculiar territory. The circuit court of the District has the powers of a county court under the old judiciary system of Maryland; the powers of a court of chancery; is an appellate court from justices of the peace; is an appellate court from the district court of the United States, of which the chief judge of the circuit court is the sole judge; is an appellate court from the criminal court, and has the general powers of the court of the King's Bench, and the power of issuing a mandamus. Besides this, it has local administrative powers—the power of appointing constables, power to grant licences, roads, &c.

You will readily see, that any one performing and executing these administrative powers, must have recourse to the laws of Maryland in order to execute them. If I understand the bill now before me, the clerks of these courts will have no power to charge any fees except those here enumerated. And this leads me to note one of the prominent distinctions in this bill from all others which have preceded it. The learned chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary remarked that they had discarded the itemizing system. Gentlemen familiar with courts of justice know that fees in most of the States are charged item by item from term to term; but here all this system is discarded, and the clerk is to charge a round sum for all the services including the taxation of courts in each cause. Now, our fees are collected from term to term. Fees in the District of Columbia, and fees in the district of Maryland go into the hands of the marshal as the suit progresses, and the largest portion of these fees are collected before judgment is rendered; but under this system the large portion, if not the whole of these fees, is postponed until judgment is obtained, and it may be, never will be collected. The tendency is to render a large portion insolvent.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I ask the gentleman from Maryland whether he is aware of the amount of costs that has been paid by the General Government to the administration of justice in the District of Columbia in the year 1850, or in any other year within the last ten years?

Mr. BOWIE. I have not looked particularly to the amount. My principle is this: "Let justice be done though the heavens fall." I shall not inquire into the costs.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I desire to make this further remark, whether the heavens fall or not, that the costs in this District, in the year 1850, for the administration of justice were upwards of $70,000.

Mr. BOWIE. That may be so, and it may startle the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but I will undertake to say that if the same quantum of justice be administered in any other State of the Union, where liberal compensation is given to its officers, the amount will be the same. Whoever heard before of measuring justice by money? I hope that principle will never be ingrafted upon the statute-book of the United States. Sir, I am an advocate of just and proper economy. Who would ask that a Procrustean bed of justice should be established in this country? Who would have justice administered at the expense of some one hundred and fifty officers of the Government? It is better that a thousand men be overpaid than that one man be denied what is justly due to him. The system now presented is an onerous one; it is an impracticable one. It is one not at all conformable to our laws and institutions, and one which I hope at least this House will not hastily force upon the State of which I am, in part, a Representative. There is no necessity for exceeding haste in this bill. It has just been laid upon our tables. The Representatives of the people have had no time to examine it. It fell under my notice accidentally. I was surprised to see the features it contained, professing, as it did, to be merely a bill to regulate the fees of clerks, attorneys, and marshals.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have been thrown off from the line of argument I designed to address you. I was saying that the committee had departed from the itemizing system, and adopted a general average system, that all causes are to be charged alike with but this distinction: that causes in which there are jury trials $3 50 are to be paid; and causes in which there are no jury trials perhaps $2 50. Then follows another most singular clause, that in the records of the court all evidence is not to be recorded. Look, Mr. Speaker, if you please, to page six of this bill:

"In equity and admiralty causes, only the process, pleadings, and decree, and such orders and memorandums as may be necessary to show the jurisdiction of the court and regularity of the proceedings, shall be entered upon the final record; and in case of an appeal, copies of the proofs and of such entries and papers on file as may be necessary on hearing of the appeal, may be certified up to the appellate court."

Who is to judge of what is necessary to show the jurisdiction of the court, or the regularity of the proceedings? What more important—what more vexed question is ever presented to the highest courts of this country than questions of jurisdiction? And yet, to save the United States—not a pauper—the paltry costs of a record in the case no testimony is to be recorded, except such as is necessary to show the jurisdiction and the regularity of the proceedings. If an appeal be taken, then the necessary evidence is to be certified up. So that any man who has a fee-simple depending upon the muniments of that court, before he can be entirely secured, must take an appeal. And if ever I should be employed in the district or United States court, I would advise all of my clients, for their protection, to take an appeal in order that all the proceedings might be recorded.

Mr. MEADE. I desire to ask a question for information. I wish to know from the gentleman whether, by the practice of the equity courts of his State, it is usual, or ever the case that the depositions of witnesses are spread upon the record books?

Mr. BOWIE. I am not able to answer. I know that in all appellate cases it is so.

Mr. MEADE. I will tell the gentleman that, according to the equity practice of my State—and I had supposed it was the case in every State, because it would swell the record books to an interminable extent, if it were otherwise—depositions in equity causes are filed with the papers, but only such orders, decrees, and pleadings as are here enumerated in this bill, are spread upon the record. When a record is ordered from an inferior to a superior court, the clerk then takes all depositions, and makes them a part of the record, but they are never spread upon the record book. Testimony always comes up in equity causes as part of the record; but in common law causes the testimony never goes up, except by bill of exceptions it is made a part of the record.

Mr. BOWIE. I am aware of that. In all causes in which real estate is involved, decided upon decree, the whole proceedings are recorded in the county in which they occur; but, according to this bill, the clerk of the district or circuit court would keep no record of these proceedings at all, unless there was an appeal.

Mr. MEADE. I will tell the gentleman from Maryland that I have seen and been engaged in chancery causes where, if everything he enumerates and requires to be of record were spread upon the record book, it would fill a volume of the record books. Sometimes there are five or six hundred pages of manuscript contained in the records, where the cause is carried up to a superior court. If the course suggested by the gentleman be adopted, you will have to multiply the record books of the clerk's office in the course of a few years to such an extent that a new building would be necessary to hold them.

Mr. BOWIE. This has been the practice in many of the States, and I am not aware of any inconvenience having resulted from it in my own State. To say only such parts as are necessary to show the jurisdiction and regularity of the courts are to be made records—and in case of appeal the balance may be certified up—is to invest the clerk with the highest judicial powers known to the law. If that discretion is to be vested anywhere, it should be in the judge, and not in the clerk.

Mr. MEADE. The gentleman, of course, does not wish to do injustice to the committee. The gentleman will perceive by the clause that he has objected to, that all process, all pleadings—of course including bills and answers—every decree, and every order and memorandum that may be necessary to show the jurisdiction of the court and regularity of the proceedings, shall be entered upon the final record. That is, entered upon the record books. All the other papers in the cause, such as testimony that is taken, is not made a part of the record unless the case is carried up. But in cases at law the oral testimony of witnesses is not made a part of the record unless excepted to in some way or the other, and then it is made a part of the record.

Mr. BOWIE. Unquestionably, there is a great looseness of expression in this clause, but the discretion to be exercised is one which should be invested in the judge, and not in the clerk; and, therefore, to that extent, at least, I think the clause is defective.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is complained that there has been an excessive and extraordinary increase of the judicial expense of this Government, not at all corresponding with the progress of population. I would ask the House to refer to table A, which was relied upon for the purpose of establishing that position. In Doc. 2, p. 524, there is an abstract of the annual amounts presented in this form by the Acting Comptroller of the Treasury. He puts down the expenses from 1800 to 1801 at $42,000; from 1818 to 1821 inclusive, at $117,000; from 1830 to 1831, at $204,000; being an average of about $102,000. He then gives the aggregate from 1842 to 1847, five and a half years, at $464,623. If these items be correct from 1831 to 1847, there has been no increase in the average expenses of the judiciary, because, if you divide the aggregate of $464,000 by the time given it will give a dividend of a less amount; instead of $102,000 it will give some $85,000 per annum; so that the vice is not in the system, the vice is in the administration of the system since 1847.

Now, if the House will take the pains to turn to Mr. Whittlesey's report, it will find that he shows these abuses emanate from particular sections of the country. In this amount of $564,000 in 1850 and 1851, one account alone of the marshal of Massachusetts amounts to upwards of $100,000, which account is suspended. There is no explanation. We are not informed what litigation occurred in the years 1847, 1848, 1849, 1850, and 1851, but that there was extraordinary litigation in these years must be apparent from the amounts. Yet, upon the face of this paper an argument is addressed to the discretion of this House, based alone upon the numerical, arithmetical proportion of increase from the year 1801. The expenses of the year 1801 is adopted as the basis of the calculation.

If you take the intermediate years, from 1831 to 1847, I am authorized to say, calculating from the papers laid before us, there is not that increase and extravagance which has been alleged, and there must be some special cause known to the accounting officers, which, if laid before this House, would sufficiently explain it. I am no apologist of extravagance. I admit that in the accounts returned from some districts—from the district of Louisiana, the district of New York, and the district of Massachusetts, there are accounts which unexplained are exorbitant. Some of the gentlemen rendering these are eminent members of the bar, and I am not willing to prejudge them without giving them an opportunity to be heard. I am not willing, in other words, because some four or five district attorneys, or four or five marshals of the United States, seem to be prima facie unfaithful and untrue to their duties, to pass a sweeping condemnation upon all the officers in the United States who occupy similar positions. We have already laws reducing their compensation to $6,000. We have compelled them to conform to that sum, and whatever they make over and above goes into the public Treasury. Before we make these accounts the basis of legislation, let us summon these gentlemen before a committee of this House, and give them an opportunity to explain. It would be nothing more than sheer American justice. The former estimates of the old system are shown by the certificates sent us from the accounting bureaus, not to have been extravagant and exorbitant; and it is only within a short time past these abuses have arisen. We should ferret them out, and all who are unfaithful should be visited with the penalties of the law. I implore this committee not to be carried away by its holy horror of extravagance, so far as to be guilty of injustice to individuals.

I have attempted to show the total and entire unsuitableness of this fee bill to the District of Columbia. I understand that no complaint has come up to this House against the officers of this District, or the officers of Maryland. No complaint whatever, in the whole course of their career, has been raised against them. Then, considering this House is the local Legislature of the District, if they desire to stretch this law over the more distant portions of the United States, no harm can be done by their modifying this bill to suit the peculiar circumstances of the State of Maryland and the District of Columbia. The honorable committee have adopted this principle in one instance. They have distinguished between California and the other States of the Union. They have allowed double the amount of fees in the State of California. I submit it to the good sense of this House, whether there is any justice in laying down a horizontal scale of compensation for clerks, marshals, and State's attorneys throughout the United States, and than there would be in laying down a horizontal scale of prices for wheat, hemp, tobacco, or cotton in all the States of this Union? The labor of a clerk and marshal in the State of Maryland and District of Columbia is as much his capital as the labor of the farmer or the planter in the West and South is his capital. The law should not undertake to lay a horizontal price upon labor or services anywhere unless there is some extreme necessity for it.

I do not mean unnecessarily to consume the time of the House with remarks upon this subject. I am exceedingly indebted to the learned chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. McLANAHAN,] and the House generally, for the opportunity they have given me of presenting my views, and the attention they have given me in listening to them. I had hoped that some motion would be made to commit this bill, but in the absence of an opportunity to do that, I shall move the amendments which I have offered, and hope, under the peculiar circumstances of this District and the State of Maryland, that at least the committee will indulge me with adopting them. Let other gentlemen take care of their own constituents as they please.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not propose to go into a discussion of the merits of this bill, although I apprehend, from the indications in the House for the last few days, that there is a desire to pass this bill in its present or some modified shape. I desire to say to the House, that inasmuch as a great portion of the complaints that have been made by the accounting officers of the Government, and which the House have heard from the Committee on the Judiciary, have come from the State of New York, my attention has been directed to the provisions of this bill, and I think that the bill is not calculated to remedy the evils at which it strikes in the State of New York. I propose, therefore, to offer, before the previous question is moved upon the bill, some amendments relating particularly to that State.

The SPEAKER. The committee propose to amend the first section of the bill, and, regularly, no amendment will be in order until that amendment is disposed of.

Mr. HAVEN. I was about to inquire whether this was the second reading of the section by clauses?

The SPEAKER. The bill is open for amendment by clauses. The committee propose to amend the first section, and therefore it will not be in order to move any amendment until the amendment of the committee is disposed of. It has been sometimes the practice of the House to allow amendments to be proposed, and voted upon in their regular order, before the previous question is called. It can be only done by the unanimous consent of the House; and if the previous question be now called and sustained, it will cut off the gentleman's amendment. The Chair desires the gentleman, and the House, to understand the state of the case, before a call for the previous question.

Mr. HAVEN. It was for that reason that I sought this early opportunity to put my amendments in possession of the House. I think these amendments are very important, in case the bill is to pass, and I am desirous of having them adopted, as I have drawn them at length. They have reference to fees nowhere except in the State of New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BOWIE] and the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] as well as the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] have indicated their purpose to offer amendments to this bill. If it be the unanimous pleasure of the House, those amendments will, in that form, be considered as having been offered, and embraced within the operation of the previous question, if it be ordered.

A VOICE. I object.

Mr. WALSH. I hope they will be read first.

Mr. CLARK. I have an amendment which I wish to offer, when the proper time arrives.

The SPEAKER. Objection having been made, no amendment will be in order until the first amendment proposed by the committee is disposed of.

Mr. STUART. Has the previous question been demanded?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. STUART. I wish to say that a bill of this character ought not to be passed by this House under the operation of the previous question. Unless the House by unanimous consent will consider the bill by clauses, and leave it open to amendment without the previous question, I think we ought to postpone it to some time when it can be considered, and when gentlemen throughout the House can understand it.

Mr. BOWIE. I move to commit the bill—

The SPEAKER. A motion is pending to recommit the bill, but the motion to commit to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union would take precedence.

Mr. BOWIE. I then make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] is upon the floor, and the gentleman cannot therefore submit the motion.

Mr. HAVEN. I propose, before I yield the floor to accommodate the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. BOWIE,] as that appears to be the general desire of the House—

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I suggest to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] as there are a number of gentlemen here who wish to offer amendments to this bill, that he permit the bill to be read by sections; so that we may act upon such amendments as have been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, and such amendments as other gentlemen see fit to offer. I understand that the Committee on the Judiciary do not desire to call the previous question, but they desire to have immediate action upon the bill. If gentlemen will pursue that course, and permit the bill to be read by sections, every gentleman will have an opportunity to offer such amendments as he may desire to offer. If gentlemen will not take this course, I give notice that I will in a very short time, if I can get the floor, move the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. HAVEN. I will take this opportunity to make a very few remarks, and to call the attention of the committee—because I assume that it is the desire of the entire House that this bill shall be put in a proper shape in all its parts—I desire to call the attention of the committee to one or two provisions in the bill, in which I think that the committee have failed in the language they used to accomplish the object they desire. For instance, take the first section of the bill. It provides that, in lieu of the compensation now allowed to attorneys, solicitors, and proctors in the courts of the United States, certain fees shall be allowed. By your laws in cases of admiralty, in the State of New York at least—I speak only for my own State—there are certain fees given to counsellors and advocates in those cases, and which are given by the act referred to by the chairman of the committee, the act of 1788 or 1789, I do not remember which, in items amounting to quite as much as this sum which is given to proctors. Under this first section of the bill, instead of limiting the amount, they desire to have taxed against the opposite party a sum that is fixed in this section. The counsellors and advocates of the State of New York will tax an equal amount, to insert it in their record, and collect it out of the opposite party. There should be an amendment for the purpose of covering that object, if that was the object of the committee. The object which I had in view in drawing up the amendments I propose to offer was this: I propose, in the State of New York, as these complaints come mostly from that quarter, to confine the compensation of attorneys, solicitors, proctors, counsellors, and advocates in all cases, whether at law, or in equity, or in admiralty, to the same charges precisely that are given in like cases by the State laws for corresponding services in the supreme court of that State. Those members of the legal profession from my own State who are here, may well understand that this is nothing unreasonable or unfair. The amendment I propose will put all the business of the country which is done in my State, whether it is done in the State courts or in the Federal courts, upon an equal footing. Since the act of 1845, which extended admiralty jurisdiction to the lakes and western rivers, almost half of the important commercial business, at least, of the county I represent, is transacted in the district court, in admiralty.

Mr. McLANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I am very much gratified at the spirit in which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] has come to the examination of this subject; but I think that the objections he has urged against that part of the bill will not, in the language of lawyers, hold water. Attorneys practice in the courts of law, solicitors in the courts of chancery, and proctors in the courts of admiralty. Under the provisions of the act of 1799, in the admiralty courts, there is a compensation allowed to proctors of $17. The only compensation then allowed in this case to any class of practicing lawyers, in whatever court they may practice, is, in the case of a jury trial, $20—but $3 above what is allowed in the admiralty court. When there is no jury trial the item is rendered $10 in this bill. This is the only compensation that any lawyer can receive in any court in which he may practice under the laws of the United States. The gentleman from New York indicates that he would prefer that the House would adopt in this bill a provision limiting the attorneys of the State of New York to the compensation that is now allowed in the supreme court of that State. Why, sir, the great abuses which have grown up in the State of New York have grown up under that system.

Mr. HAVEN. Not one penny of the sum has ever been applied to the Federal courts.

Mr. McLANAHAN. Now, sir, the law, as it now stands, is, that the taxation of costs in the State of New York shall be made according to the existing fee bill in that State. Under the law of 1848, which was found necessary to reduce the fees of lawyers in that State's courts, the fees are remarkably low, and yet I defy any lawyer from the State of New York to point out a single instance in the Treasury Department, where the accounts have been rendered under the fee bill of 1848.

Mr. HAVEN. That is the very difficulty that I propose to remedy by this amendment. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, if he will refer to the report of the Comptroller and the first clerk, in the papers he has laid before us, will find that the difficulty complained of there is that the wording of the proviso of 1842 is such that the marshals, clerks, and officers of the courts in the State of New York, have evaded that provision of the law which declares that they shall be governed by the fees that are now, or may be hereafter, provided; and that they shall make out their bills, and the clerks certify them according to the law of 1799, and not according to any subsequent law. That is the very complaint that is made; and I propose, at the proper time, to point out the language used in my amendment for the purpose of remedying that very evil.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from New York—the morning hour having expired—will allow me to take the floor, I will move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAVEN. I always with great pleasure follow the lead of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOUSTON. I then make the motion I have indicated.

Mr. EDGERTON. Will it be in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. EDGERTON. Then I make that motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I consulted with my friend from North Carolina [Mr. DANIEL] before I made my motion, and he told me that he would not insist upon devoting this day to private business. He said that he desired to proceed with that class of business to-morrow, but that he would yield to the civil and diplomatic bill to-day.

Mr. EDGERTON. Then I withdraw my motion.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Houston's motion, and it was agreed to.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATIONS.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 196, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, there was pending before the committee an amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] to insert after line eight hundred and fifty-four, the following:

For the repair of the two bridges over the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, $4,750.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. At the time that item was under debate yesterday, there was a misapprehension existing here between the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] and myself, in the course of the discussion with regard to it. A total misapprehension existed at the time, and the passage that occurred between us was all wrong—wrong upon my part; and if upon that of any other, it is all right now. I regret it very much, and do not wish that it should ever be remembered. I hope it will not be.

Mr. SMART. I respond with great pleasure to the honorable remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas. I will say that I misapprehended his first remarks to me, which caused me to speak with more than usual warmth, but I am satisfied that there was no unkindness intended; that so far as I am concerned I have always entertained the kindest feeling towards him. Any misapprehension that may have existed at the time has been mutually explained, and I am glad to say there is now nothing to interrupt the good feeling that has hitherto existed between us.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Johnson's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move the same amendment, only altering the sum to $4,850. The original amendment was $5,000. This was offered, sir, by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] with a full understanding of this case. I do not sincerely believe that the House fully appreciates the state of these bridges, or, if they did, I feel persuaded that they would make the appropriation that is asked for in this amendment.

We, sir, by an act, compelled the owners of these bridges to sell out, or else, in consequence of the position in which we had placed them, their corporate privileges were to fall dead upon their hands. They never received the actual money from this Government which they had expended upon these bridges. They never received their capital even back. This I state merely by way of elucidation, as the case has nothing to do with them; but when we took these bridges from them, and made them free, and cut off the means that would have accrued to preserve them in repair, we took upon ourselves the responsibility, as I regard it, and the duty of maintaining them in at least as good a condition as they were maintained under the corporate privilege that once existed in regard to them.

Now, sir, these bridges are decaying. One of these free bridges has been already swept away; and we are doing nothing to restore it. The whole community are suffering from the destruction of this bridge, and yet gentlemen conceive, if we appropriate any portion of money at all for their preservation—works that we made by our own action public works—that we are giving money illegitimately from the Treasury. This is not a just consideration of this matter. If we will look at the millions of Government property now within this District—and I imagine I am saying nothing extravagant when I say that $25,000,000 of public property is within this city—which pays not one single cent of revenue to the city, and that the whole taxes that they have, are collected from citizens and private property—I think we ought to feel, when there is no tax whatever paid by this Government, that we are bound to contribute something to a District where the whole of the functions of the Government are concentrated. Every branch of the Government feels, in some measure, the wants that are created, and that result from the inability of the population in the surrounding country to get to the city with their marketing. It raises the price of living to such an extent as to call upon us directly to appropriate from the Treasury an increase of salaries, to enable men to stay here at all, and discharge the most ordinary duties of this Government.

Mr. VENABLE. I am utterly opposed to any illiberal legislation towards this District. I am willing to do whatever is right and proper, but I think the view of the subject presented by my friend from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] should lead us to a different conclusion to the one at which he has arrived. He says we committed a great outrage upon this District in buying the toll-bridges, and building a free bridge.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman does not state me truly, but never mind.

Mr. VENABLE. I shall certainly not misstate the gentleman. He says we break down the capital of the corporation by purchasing their property at full value, and build a free bridge in the place over which they paid toll. The gentleman certainly goes upon the principle that because we give $10 to a man, we ought to give him $50, and that if we failed to do so we committed an outrage upon his rights. I do not see why we are bound to pay for repairing these bridges, because we have relieved them from paying toll. The gentleman used another argument, that, as the Government pays no tax upon the property which it holds here, all taxes raised in the District, are paid upon private property. Whilst this is true, apparently, it is not so in fact. Look, sir, at the vast amounts voted this District in the annual appropriation bills. There are always some large sums to cut down and grade their streets, and to do anything else which the District asks. I have known them to spend the money voted in removing the same earth two different times in the course of a single year. We have given them whatever they ask. Look at the annual appropriations made for the improvement of the city. They amount to twice as much as any tax that could be properly levied upon public property here. In addition to this we assumed a debt of $1,000,000. We give them money every time they ask it, and yet, like the prodigal son, they come back and say we never settle our accounts with them, and ask for more. If you take the annual appropriations made for this District, and compare them with the taxes paid upon property here, you will find that we pay fully as much as we would in the way of taxation. I am not disposed to pursue an illiberal course towards this District. I have voted for appropriations sometimes against my own judgment, but only when requested to do so by those who were better informed upon the matter than myself. But surely the District has no right to complain of us, that after we have made their toll bridges free, and paid the owners, that they are now asked to keep those bridges in repair. That seems to me to be the plain business-like and practical view of the question, and for that reason I have voted against, and shall continue to vote against these appropriations. I never will vote a cent to build a new bridge in the place of the old one across the Potomac, which has destroyed the channel. It was a nuisance, and it ought never to have been built there. With regard to the other bridges, it is little enough for the people of the District to keep them in repair when we relieve them from the tax of paying toll.

Mr. CLEVELAND. It seems to me that this question is not very well understood. I move to amend the amendment by increasing the amount $50, so as to make it $4,900. I wish the House to act understandingly upon this matter, and I ask their attention for a moment to this question. We have these bridges in the condition in which they are represented, and no one denies that they may be passed. I have watched narrowly, and no man has disputed the statement of either the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] or the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Public Grounds, [Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky,] whose duty it is to take care of the interests of this city, and the whole Republic, in reference to this matter. In the first place, we proposed, as I understand it, to build a new bridge, thereby rendering valueless the bridges upon which toll was collected. Now, suppose we had built a new bridge, I ask whether we should have had to keep that bridge in repair? But the owners of these bridges conclude to sell out, and we take them. In what respect do we stand differently now from what we should have stood if we had gone on and built the bridge which we had agreed to do? There is one other consideration. These bridges are upon our hands, and it is our duty to take care of them. I ask the consideration of the committee to this. If we neglect them now, and injury results, and loss of property, who will be to blame? Will it be the Commissioner of Public Buildings? Certainly not, for he has warned Congress, through the appropriate committee, and that committee comes in here, and, through its chairman, tells you that this appropriation is necessary. I beg to know if they do not understand this matter better than this House? What trouble have we taken? What man of this committee has taken the trouble to inform himself in regard to the condition of these bridges? And yet, sir, the men appointed for that purpose—the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, by their chairman, come here and tell you that it is absolutely necessary that this money should be appropriated, and insist upon it. The gentleman from Arkansas, who, it seems, is familiar with this matter, tells you, in his usual earnest manner, that this appropriation is absolutely necessary. Now, sir, in the name of Heaven, how are we to legislate? Are we to legislate upon our crude notions of economy? Here is an appropriation which, if we can believe the men who were appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the fact—and I trust no man will doubt their sincerity, honesty, or intelligence—is necessary, why should we go behind their opinions upon a matter which they understand, and we confessedly do not? Supposing we do, and when we come together here again, next winter, we find those bridges swept away, I ask whether there is a man in the committee who opposes this appropriation, who will not feel guilty of neglect for which he himself ought to be held in part responsible? In my judgment, this is an appropriation (and I am not very extravagant) which is called for in the only mode in which we ought to vote appropriations—upon the recommendation of the appropriate committee. Is it said that the Committee of Ways and Means have not seen fit to put this item in the bill. I beg to know if they are to override, in the discharge of their duties, the committee whose appropriate duty it is to see to this matter? The Committee of Ways and Means ought not to be expected to go into these details. They know that the committee appointed for the purpose is the one to attend to it. And when the Committee of Ways and Means see fit to leave it out, I beg to know if the Committee on Public Buildings and Public Grounds are not in duty bound to make an appeal from the Committee of Ways and Means to the House?—and what gentleman is there here who will feel disposed to withhold the small amount called for of $4,900 for an object which every one here must believe is an important and necessary one?

Mr. HEBARD. I am opposed to that amendment to increase the appropriation. I will say here that I have no hostility to the District of Columbia, and I have no stinted notions of economy in relation to making appropriations for any of the purposes for which they are called. As often as I have had occasion to vote upon them, I have voted as liberally, I apprehend, as others. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] seems to base his notions in relation to the propriety of making this appropriation upon the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Public Grounds has recommended it, as he says, in a very earnest manner. He says he is prepared to follow the recommendation of that gentleman, because he knows more about it than anybody else. Now, I should like to know what that gentleman does know about it, more than any one of us? Has he examined these bridges? Has he taken any testimony in relation to the wants and necessities in regard to them?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I will answer the gentleman's question. He asks what the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds knows about this matter, more than the rest of us? I answer, that he has this information from the gentleman who was appointed especially to take care of this property—the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds. And I now ask the gentleman from Vermont, in return, whether he has taken the same trouble to inquire of that gentleman, whose especial duty it is to see to this matter?

Mr. HEBARD. I do not know that that information becomes more important to us from having been filtered through the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I suppose all the information that comes from the Commissioner comes alike to us all, and that we can act on it as well from his recommendation as by having it indorsed by the chairman, unless he has some new facts to communicate.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman, if he will permit me, that, by the law of 1840, the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds is directed to make his report to our committee; and the law directs that we shall act upon his report, and report it to the House before it is acted upon by the House.

Mr. HEBARD. I had not said what I meant to say, when the gentleman interrupted me. If I had been allowed to proceed, I should have been through by this time. I meant to say, in reply to the gentleman from Connecticut, that when I yesterday called on the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to know whether or not the appropriation made at the last Congress, in reference to the repair of these bridges had been expended, the gentleman did not know, but presumed it had. I inquired of him, also, in relation to the particular amount necessary for these bridges, and he could only give it in general terms, and by using the language of the Commissioner on Public Buildings.

Mr. STANTON. I read you his report.

Mr. HEBARD. I mean this in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Connecticut. This application does not come to us with any more force, in my opinion, because the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have recommended it, so long as they are in possession of no more facts in regard to it than this House is in possession of. Now, I do not know but that this may be all necessary; but the Committee of Ways and Means have not made such an investigation in regard to it as to have been able to recommend it. It does not appear to me that anybody has made such an investigation. If investigation had been made, and the particular wants and necessities pointed out, I certainly should have voted as cheerfully as any gentleman here, for the necessary appropriation. The only hesitation I have, is because we are constantly running into expenditures and extravagances without sufficient investigation. The only question with me is, whether this money is needed.

Mr. CLEVELAND asked for tellers, on the amendment to the amendment; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment to the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "eight hundred and fifty," so as to reduce the amount of the appropriation to $4,000.

Mr. J. said: It has been assumed in the discussion of this subject that the Government has forced the owners of these bridges to sell them. So far from that being the fact, the owner of one of these bridges, who has been employed in the Capitol for many years, session after session of Congress, did all in his power to induce the members of this House to vote an appropriation to buy that bridge. Not only this, but, to my knowledge, a distinguished Senator—a friend of that individual—upon more than one occasion, and at more than one session of Congress, came into this House when the bill was pending, and appealed to the members of this House to vote for the bill making an appropriation to buy that bridge. It is said, I know not with what truth, that that individual—the owner of one of these bridges—paid some two or three thousand dollars for it, and then sold it to the Government at a valuation, under an act passed in 1848, I believe, appropriating $30,000 for the purchase of these two bridges. That act directed the Secretary of the Treasury to have the bridges valued, and when they were valued, they were purchased and paid for out of that sum of $30,000. That is, so far as I know, the history of the purchase of these bridges from their owners.

I think myself, that if the Government is to keep up a bridge, one of these bridges is sufficient, for I see that they are not more than a mile apart; one of them is here at the navy-yard, and the other is about one mile above it. If, for instance, the upper bridge was superseded, or should go out of use, I do not suppose it would extend the travel of persons who live above, and who now cross at that bridge, more than half a mile, if they had to come to the lower bridge; nor would it, I suppose, increase the travel of those who now cross the lower bridge more than one mile, and perhaps not that, if they had to go up to the other bridge. In this corner of the country down here between the Eastern Branch and the Potomac, for whose particular benefit the lower bridge is kept up, I suppose there can be but very few persons. It is a very small extent of country.

Mr. BOWIE. The lower bridge leads to a section of country one hundred miles long, and on the line of the mails from Washington when carried by carriage. There are four counties lying on the peninsula between the Potomac and Chesapeake Bay, with which this is the main artery of connection.

Mr. JONES. I ask the gentleman, how much further the people living one hundred miles down the Potomac, would have to travel to get to Washington if they crossed at the upper bridge, than they would have to travel if they crossed at the lower bridge?

Mr. BOWIE. I am not aware of any connection between the two roads. The upper bridge leads into the central part of Maryland, and the lower bridge into the peninsula.

Mr. JONES. Well, sir. I crossed over there not long since, in the evening, at the upper bridge, rode down some three or four miles on the other side of the Eastern Branch, and returned across the lower bridge at the navy-yard, and it can make very little difference to the people who live four or five miles below the Eastern Branch whether they take that road and come across the navy-yard bridge, or take the other road and come across the upper bridge.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, we have a great deal of business to transact, and we are, in my opinion, manifesting a great deal of heat upon a very small matter. I have but a word or two to say upon this subject. I am in favor of the original proposition, and opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. The proposition, as I understand it, refers to the bridges upon the eastern branch of the Potomac, and not to the bridge upon the main branch of the Potomac. I would not vote a dollar of appropriation to repair the bridge upon the main branch, and the only fault I have to find with the flood that we had here last winter is, that it did not sweep the whole structure away. I consider it a disgrace to the country, and an eye-sore to the landscape.

Sir, I have no reply to make to the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee as to the manner in which the Federal Government came into possession of these bridges. It is sufficient for me to know that she has purchased the bridges, and that it is her duty to keep them in repair. Now, sir, it appears to me that the old adage of "a stitch in time saves nine" applies to these bridges, because it is evident, from the information which has been thrown before the committee, that if you do not appropriate money enough now to keep them in repair, you will have to appropriate a still larger sum at some future time. You must repair the decay which is continually going on in these structures.

The House seems to have been seized with one of its periodical economical spasms upon the subject of the bridges across the eastern branch of the Potomac, and I am surprised to find gentlemen upon this floor who, when the matter presents itself in the form of enormous appropriations, do not hesitate to vote any amount of money that may be asked, to any sort of claim that may come before Congress, refusing now to appropriate $3,000 or $4,000 to keep in repair works that have been purchased by the United States, and that the United States is obliged, at one time or another, to keep in repair. Nor do I concur with the gentlemen who have thrown out sneers at the inhabitants of this District. I never knew the people that inhabited the capital of any Government, State or Federal, that did not come in for the abuse of the legislators who met at such seat of government. It is the case in my own State. It is the case in every State I have ever been in. The inhabitants who live at the seat of government are always the scape-goats to receive the overflows of bile of the honorable representatives who congregate there. I have seen nothing in the conduct of the inhabitants of this District, or in any application they have ever made to Congress, to warrant the constant sneers thrown upon them by gentlemen on this floor. Sir, they are under the protection of Congress. We legislate for this District absolutely, and it is our duty, in a just, ay, and in a liberal spirit, to pass laws for their benefit, without seizing every occasion that presents itself to heap insult upon them. I hope that this committee, without entertaining these amendments which are constantly offered, will vote an appropriation corresponding with the amount that is recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings for the repair of these bridges, because it is work that is absolutely necessary to be done.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, moved to amend the amendment by striking out $4,850, and inserting $4,875.

Mr. S. said: The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] says that when the bill was pending for the purchase of this bridge, an individual stockholder was very active in getting the bill passed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I said the owner of one of these bridges.

Mr. STANTON. Well, the owner of one of these bridges may have taken an interest in this matter; but he was the owner of the smaller of the two bridges. I now hold in my hand a memorial which was offered at the time this bill was pending before this House, and the memorial remonstrates against the passage of the law because it would inflict a gross injustice upon the stockholders of the company. The memorial is under consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary, at this moment.

The memorial is from the president and directors of the company, and shows the value of the stock held by them. I read all but the formal parts:

"That it has come to the knowledge of your memorialists that a bill has passed the Senate of the United States, and is now before your honorable body, appropriating the sum of $30,000 to provide for a free bridge over the Eastern Branch, between the city of Washington and the State of Maryland, either by the purchase of one or both of the bridges already erected, (if they can be purchased for that sum), or by the erection of a free bridge, in case the proprietors of the existing bridges should decline giving them up for the sum proposed.

"Your memorialists have entire confidence in the desire of Congress to do not only that which is liberal to the District, but also just to individuals, and they feel assured, that in order to secure the speedy rejection of the bill alluded to, or else such an increase in the appropriation as will be sufficient to give to individual owners the cost and actual value of their property, it is only necessary to make known to your honorable body the fact, that in the bill above-mentioned, the Congress of the United States presents to the Navy-Yard Bridge Company the unpleasant alternative of the entire destruction, in value, of their property in the erection of a free bridge at the side of their own, or the surrender of their property at a large sacrifice, by an involuntary sale, upon terms as to the fairness of which they have not been consulted, yet into acquiescence in which they are by the bill morally coerced; the poor choice (if choice it can be called) of taking a part of that which they held on the faith of a Congressional charter, or losing the whole.

"Your memorialists do not for a moment suppose that this alternative was presented in the bill for the purpose of coercing a sale at a burdensome loss to individuals, but, on the contrary, that the sum appropriated was supposed to be sufficient to cover the full value of the existing bridges. Your memorialists, therefore, deeming a notice of the fact all that is necessary in such a body to secure them from injury and loss, would simply state, that their capital stock is $37,500, on which they regularly receive a profit of six per cent. per annum, after defraying expenses for repairs, bridge-keeper, &c., and reserving a handsome sum for extraordinary emergencies; for the correctness of which statement they invite an inspection of their books and papers.

"Whilst, therefore, your memorialists are not anxious to part with property which yields so sure and regular an income, they would nevertheless not wish to stand in the way of the public interest and convenience, if the actual cost and value of their property should be offered them, notwithstanding its value is yearly increasing. Their object is not to drive a bargain, but to shield themselves from loss.

"Your memorialists would therefore respectfully propose that the appropriation should be raised to a sum sufficient for the fair purchase of the two bridges, or else, that an act should be passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay such a sum as three disinterested individuals should award after a full examination of bridges, books, and papers, and of such facts as may be brought to their knowledge."

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks which have just fallen from the honorable Representative from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE,] he speaks of the overflowing of bile upon the part of gentlemen upon this floor against the inhabitants of this District. Now, sir, I rise for the purpose of setting myself right upon this subject before this House, the District of Columbia, and the country. I have no bile, nor have I overflowed any upon the people of this District; nor have I intended to use disrespectful language to the people of the District. The position which I assumed yesterday, and which I assume here today, is this: I stated distinctly on yesterday that I had too much respect for the people of the District of Columbia to encourage them to pursue a policy calculated, in my opinion, to foster in their minds a spirit of pauperism. I was not disposed to encourage them to come here every session of Congress and ask us for bounties, because I believe that where that spirit is encouraged it has a tendency to degrade the people where it is encouraged. Now, I say once for all, that this was not that overflowing of bile which the gentleman from Kentucky has denounced.

But what excites the intemperate zeal of the gentleman who advocates the making of these grants to this people? Cannot he return proper respect and decency to men who entertain different sentiments from himself? Cannot he withhold his slanderous charges? And the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who hurled his slanders at me and my State on yesterday, because I took the liberty of an independent freeman in expressing my sentiments fearlessly in the face of the public sentiment of this District—I say to that gentleman, that it is my intention to improve the earliest possible opportunity—and I will do it today if the House will give me permission—to defend my State and its institutions from the foul charges which have been hurled against it and them, upon this floor, contrary to the rules of order which should govern every gentleman upon this floor. I ask the House if they will grant me the privilege of defending my State from these charges, which have, contrary to the rules of this House, been made against her and her institutions?

[Cries of "No!" "No!" and "Agreed!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself strictly to the subject of the amendment under consideration.

Mr. SKELTON. Well, sir, then I will take the earliest opportunity—the first which presents itself—to repel the unjust charges against my State and her Representatives.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. SKELTON. A few words now with regard to the argument which is presented by gentlemen upon the other side of the House—an argument upon which I wish to show you that this proposition is based upon injustice, and it is upon this principle alone that I oppose the appropriation. It is this: The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] tells us that because we have made or purchased these bridges, and furnished them to the inhabitants of the District free of cost, we must now keep them in repair. Why, sir, I ask the gentleman what he would think if he were to present me with a valuable house, and then I were to turn round and tell him, "You have given me a house, and now it is your duty to keep it in repair!" Why, sir, the logic is false. There is no principle of justice upon which it can be sustained. If we have been generous and liberal to the people of this District, that is no reason why it should be demanded of us that we should continue that liberality. Sir, I came here to advocate principles of justice, and I demand of the Representatives upon this floor that they shall act upon principles of justice as well as generosity to the people of this District. What reason is there that they should pension themselves upon our generosity?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. One word in reply to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SKELTON.]

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

The amendment to the amendment was then rejected.

The motion then recurred upon Mr. JOHNSON's amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I do not propose to make a five minutes speech, but I move to reduce the appropriation one dollar, for the purpose of saying that the gentleman from New Jersey—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to restrict debate within a very narrow compass.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Very well; I have only a word to say upon this matter. I wish to say, as a preliminary remark, that the gentleman from New Jersey was altogether mistaken when he supposed that I intended any reflection upon himself, or any other member of the House. I did speak of the members of this House pouring out their superfluous bile upon the people of this District.

Mr. SKELTON. Is that very respectful language to the members of this House?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The gentleman will be kind enough to take his seat. I was about to exempt him—

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. I call the gentleman from Kentucky to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to the amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I have only a word more. I was proceeding to say, that according to the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey, the observation I made did not apply to him, for he has exempted himself from the scope of the remark by declaring that he entertained no such feelings. I therefore desire to say, that I meant no reflection upon him or any other member of the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish merely to say to those who may be interested, that the memorial from which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] read, remonstrating against the purchase of this upper bridge was by the owners of the lower one. They remonstrated against the injustice which would be done them by purchasing the upper bridge and making it free, without purchasing the other also; and the effect of the memorial was to induce Congress to purchase both bridges instead of one. That is the fact of the case in reference to this memorial.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, (Mr. JONES yielding,) said: I am opposed to this amendment. But I desire to state that in debate yesterday upon the subject of these bridges, while speaking of the position in which the people of this District would be placed by the allegations made by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SKELTON,] that they would be made paupers by appropriations of this sort, I alluded to what I had just been informed of by a gentleman whom I supposed to be a gentleman of truth, that a tax was levied in the State of New Jersey on strangers passing through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I said nothing with any unkind feeling. I indicated no unkindness either in manner or anything else.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. JOHNSON. There was no personality mixed with my remarks, and you must—

Mr. STEVENS. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is called to order by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot see what the gentleman's remarks have to do with striking out one dollar. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman's humor is good humor, and he will always carry his point.

The question was then taken, and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I think we have consumed time enough upon this appropriation. I wish, however, to submit an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas. I move to strike out $4,850, and insert $4,999. I hope the committee will come to an immediate vote upon the appropriation. I suppose our minds are as much made up now as they ever will be with regard to it.

I will say but a word or two in explanation of my amendment. Five thousand dollars, I think, is the sum estimated by the Commissioner of Public Buildings as necessary to keep up these bridges.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Eight thousand dollars was the estimate of the Commissioner of Public Buildings. The Committee on Public Buildings recommended but $5,000.

Mr. STEPHENS. Ah, it was the committee then who recommended the $5,000. Well, sir, $5,000 is perhaps, then, too small an amount; but at least it is as small an amount as will be necessary. Now, I concur with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE,] who replied to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] that whether these bridges ought to have been bought or not in the first place is not the question under consideration. They are now owned by the Government, and we are the public carriers. We have engaged to carry whatever is needed over them. They are the bridges of the Government. They do not belong to the city, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] asserted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman alluded to me as opposing the policy of the Government in purchasing these bridges. I did not speak of the policy at all. I merely alluded to the subject for the purpose of correcting an impression in relation to the purchase.

Mr. STEPHENS. Well, sir, as to whether it was right to buy these bridges is not the question now before the committee. I say these bridges now belong to the Government of the United States, and we are bound in law and in morals to keep them up or to abandon them. Suppose an accident should occur upon one of these bridges—

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. I should like to ask the gentleman a legal question.

Mr. STEPHENS. Well, be quick. [Laughter.] Mr. CABLE. It is, whether the United States have the right to attach the bridge, or whether they have the jurisdiction and ownership of the soil at each end of the bridge?

Mr. STEPHENS. I suppose they have. I presume they have the same franchise that the original corporators had. I take that for granted.

But I was proceeding to say, that if any accident should occur, from your neglect, upon one of those bridges, you would be morally and legally bound as much as the original corporators for it; and, therefore, so long as we are the owners of these bridges, we should either keep them up or abandon them. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] said that the people of the District ought to keep them up. Why, sir, we have bought the bridges, and the people of the District have no right to repair them.

Who is it that pays the fees of the officers of these bridges? The Government of the United States. Suppose the corporation of Washington were to raise a subscription, or tax the people to keep up those bridges. Why, sir, they would not be permitted to lay a plank there. Your officers have possession of them, and they are under your jurisdiction and control. And, again, I repeat that so long as we hold them, we ought to keep them in good order. I want a vote upon the question. I think we ought to pass it, and I hope the House will do so.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am opposed to the amendment, and I am equally opposed to any additional consumption of time upon this subject, as I hope we may be able to get through this bill to-day. It is important that we should do so. I believe we all understand the subject, as well as we shall after further discussion, and I therefore hope the House will come to a vote upon the subject immediately, and let us pass on to other items of the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I call for tellers upon my amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to correct the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] in regard to the estimates. The estimates of the Commissioner of Public Buildings was $8,000.

Mr. STEPHENS. So it has been explained to me, but the committee reported $5,000. I would rather have $8,000, but as we cannot have that, and as $5,000 has been voted down, we will take $4,999.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GOODENOW and STEPHENS appointed.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. STEPHENS; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the amendment as above amended—

Mr. VENABLE demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. HAMILTON, and STANTON of Tennessee appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 46.

So the amendment as amended was adopted.

Mr. STROTHER offered the following amendment:

For the repair of the Potomac bridge, $17,000.

Mr. S. said: Mr. Chairman, the vote of the House just now taken recognizes the duty and propriety, on the part of this Government, of keeping up and preserving the connection between this District and the adjacent States; and every reason which influenced the House in the vote just given, bears upon this question with increased and accumulating force, since the connection with Virginia is with a larger population and a larger extent of country, and of more extensive use to the Government and to the people of the District. This connection is therefore more important than the others. During the winter this river is occasionally frozen over, and in the absence of this bridge, all mail connection with the southern States is interrupted and sometimes cut off.

Now, the committee will observe that I have placed in my amendment the sum of $17,000. I have adopted that sum on the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, who estimated that $20,000 would be enough to put that bridge in repair, and to pay the expense of the keepers. The expense of the keepers being estimated at twenty-nine hundred and some odd dollars, it leaves the round sum of $17,000 to be applied to the improvement of the bridge. The facts in relation to this bridge, its purchase by the Government, its ownership by the Government, are the same as in relation to the other bridges. So that the cases being analogous, the committee cannot hesitate to adopt the amendment.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. STROTHER—

Mr. MEADE demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. STROTHER and MOLONY were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 50; no quorum voting.

The roll was then called, with the view of ascertaining the absentees. The following gentlemen answered to their names:

Messrs. Abernethy, Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Bissell, Bowie, Bragg, Breckinridge, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, G. H. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskey, Chandler, Chapman, Chastain, Churchwell, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Cobb, Cullom, Curtis, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dean, Dinwiddie, Disney, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Dumian, Durkee, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Giddings, Gilmore, Goodenow, Gorman, Hall, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Henn, Hillyer, Holladay, Horsford, Houston, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Mann, Mason, McCorkle, McDonald, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, Meade, Milson, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Penniman, Perkins, Phelps, Polk, Price, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Ross, Sackett, Savage, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Alexander H. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, St. Martin, Stratton, Strother, Stuart, Sutherland, Thurston, Townsend, Venable, Wallace, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Wells, Alexander White, Wilcox, Wildrick, Woodward, and Yates.

The committee then rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. PHELPS) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had, according to order, under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 196, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853, and having found itself without a quorum, had ordered the roll to be called, and instructed him to report the facts to the House, with the names of the absentees, which are as follows:

Messrs. Charles Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, Babcock, David J. Bailey, Barrere, Bartlett, Beale, Bell, Bennett, Bibbhauss, Bocoek, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Burt, Bushy, Colecock, Conger, Cottman, Darby, George T. Davis, Dawson, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmundson, Evans, Ewing, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Gentry, Goodrich, Green, Grey, Grow, James Johnson, Mace, W. Harris, Haws, Hibbard, Hunter, James Johnson, Mace, Marshall, Martin, McQueen, Meacham, Miller, Orr, Peaslee, Porter, Powell, Kanton, Reed, Richardson, Robinson, Russell, Scudder, Scurry, Slat, Snow, Stone, Sweetser, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, G. W. Thompson, Toombs, Tuck, Walbridge, Welch, Addison White, and Williams.

There being now a quorum present, the committee again resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee found itself without a quorum, the committee was dividing upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. STROTHER.]

The tellers will resume their places, and the House will be again divided.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 64.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. Is it in order to offer an amendment, to come in at the end of the paragraph in relation to public buildings?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be.

Mr. CABLE. I move to amend, by adding, that the bridges across the Eastern Branch, with the one across the Potomac, be surrendered to the authorities of this District.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair doubts about the regularity of that amendment; the gentleman will, however, reduce it to writing.

The amendment was then reduced to writing, and presented, as follows:

That the bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac be surrendered to the municipal authorities of the District of Columbia, and also the one across the Potomac.

Mr. C. said: I do not intend to offer any explanation of that amendment. It explains itself. My particular object is to test the legal decision which gentlemen of the legal profession have given to this question. I want to know whether they will, by their votes, sustain the position they took in order to carry the previous amendment—that the United States would be bound, in case a man should fall through one of these bridges and break his leg, to respond in damages. I think, however, that upon the merits of this question a good deal might be said; but, as a matter of course, members will make up their own minds. I hold that the United States have no right to thrust one end of a bridge upon either Virginia or Maryland, without permission from the particular States.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I have simply to reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CABLE,] that, originally, at the time the bridges were erected, the territory upon the other side of the river, as well as that upon this side, belonged to the District of Columbia. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, if he knows whether the authorities of the District would receive those bridges, provided the Government is inclined to surrender them, as is proposed by his amendment?

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment of Mr. CABLE—

Mr. FICKLIN demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. FULLER, of Maine, and CULLOM appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 46.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, moved to amend what had already been inserted in the bill in relation to bridges, as follows:

And that, as the Government of the United States is the supreme authority in the District, that said Government now accept them.

Mr. S. said: I understand the effect of the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CABLE,] and incorporated into the bill by the committee, is to surrender these bridges to the District of Columbia. I do not know that there is any authority in the District to accept the bridge, unless it is the Government of the United States, because we constitute the Legislature, which is the supreme power of the District; and if the gentleman's amendment continues in the bill, it seems to me certainly right that this amendment should follow it. His proposition was to give the bridges to the District, and mine is that we, as the supreme authority in the District, receive them. I am perfectly willing—

Mr. CABLE. I wish to know of the gentleman, whether we are to understand him to hold that the Congress is the municipal of the District?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly; the United States has power over the municipal authority of the District.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Such a motion cannot be entertained by the committee.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I ask for the reading of the amendment again.

The amendment was again read, as above inserted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not think we ought to take up so much time with the subject of these bridges. I hope gentlemen will not offer any more amendments. Let us get on with the bill.

We have spent more time upon the subject than half a dozen such bridges are worth.

Mr. STANTON. If there is no objection, I will withdraw my amendment.

No objection was made, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. STROTHER submitted the following amendment:

For the repair of the Potomac bridge, $15,000.

Mr. ORR. I rise to a question of order. The amendment in relation to bridges, which was first adopted, surrendered the bridges to the authorities of the District of Columbia, and they are not now under our control. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot decide what amendments the committee may or may not adopt. If they make incongruous legislation, it is not for the Chairman to decide, and he therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. STROTHER. If the bridges are to be surrendered, there is nothing to forbid their being surrendered in good order; and therefore the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided the amendment to be in order.

Mr. STROTHER. Of course, I entertain the opinion that the House will not surrender this property to the District when the people of the District are only partially interested in keeping up this connection. Although it is important to the people of the District that this connection should be preserved, it is also important to the Government and to the adjacent States; and the obligations put upon or undertaken by the Government when these bridges were purchased, have accumulated with the increase of the business and population of the country.

It has been objected that this Long Bridge is not at a place where the connection should be. The adoption of the amendment I offer will not conflict with the erection of a permanent bridge at another place. Even if, in the wisdom of Congress, a permanent connection shall be established elsewhere, in a mode that will reflect credit upon the skill and far-seeing wisdom of the country in the magnitude of its structure and its permanence, its construction will occupy a great length of time, during which, unless this bridge be repaired, an important connection with the seat of Government will be cut off. The sum I propose will place this bridge in a condition in which all the uses required can be obtained. If it please Congress to establish another bridge, then this outlay will be more than compensated for by the uses of this bridge during the time occupied in the construction of a permanent one. Those, therefore, who are in favor of the construction of a permanent bridge elsewhere ought not to object to the placing of this structure in that condition in which it can be used during the erection of the permanent structure. I shall not go over the arguments which have been urged heretofore, showing the necessity of this appropriation. I entertain the hope that, in any view the committee may take, it will be its pleasure to adopt the amendment I have offered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am opposed to the amendment. I am of the opinion, however, that if it be the pleasure of Congress to construct another bridge over the Potomac river, it should not be constructed on the site of the Long Bridge, which was recently washed away. It should be above the head of navigation, at Georgetown. A large portion of the old Long Bridge, between the two channels of the Potomac, is a close dam, and the river is rapidly filling up above it. It is said by many who live in that part of the city around the President's House, that the health of that locality is seriously affected thereby. Before another bridge is constructed across the Potomac, the matter should be referred to a proper officer of the Government, who should examine and report upon it, that it might be constructed in a proper manner.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will state a fact in this connection. The Commissioner of Public Buildings estimated $20,000 for the repair of the Long Bridge before it was carried away by the late freshet. If $20,000 was necessary then, the appropriation now of the amount proposed by the gentleman's amendment would be $15,000 absolutely thrown away. The estimates of the Commissioner of Public Buildings must have been utterly futile, and worse than that, or else this $15,000, now proposed to be appropriated, would do no good, for one of the draws is washed away. As I have already said, before any part of the old bridge was damaged by the late freshet, the Commissioner of Public Buildings estimated for its repair the sum of $20,000. It will be seen, from that basis, that $15,000 now will amount to nothing.

Mr. STROTHER. I desire to state a fact or two. First, in reply to the gentleman from Alabama. He states that the sum of $15,000 is not enough, because the estimate of $20,000 was prior to the washing away of the bridge. The gentleman must have forgotten that an amendment was offered in the Senate, based upon a report of the superintendent, that he could repair the damages of that freshet with $10,500.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have the estimate of the gentleman himself, made before that freshet, for $20,000.

Mr. STROTHER. I am aware of that fact; but there has been an estimate since addressed by him to the Senate for its action of $10,500.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, that shows that no confidence can be placed in the officer.

Mr. STROTHER demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The following clause of the bill was read, viz:

"For the completion of the east wing of the Patent Office building, $30,000."

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move to strike out "$30,000," and in lieu thereof to insert "$103,000."

The amendment is in pursuance of a recent minute estimate of the superintendent.

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am also instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment in pursuance of the estimate, to come in after the eight hundred and sixty-second line:

"For finishing the front of the basement of the center building of the Patent Office, and making it conform to the design of the wings, $3,200."

The question was put, and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. DUNHAM. I am unanimously instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment, to come in after line eight hundred and sixty-four:

For purchase and payment of the building at the corner of F street north and Seventeenth street west, in the city of Washington, held by William H. Winder, and now in the occupancy of the United States, $200,000: Provided, Said William H. Winder shall make to the United States a good and sufficient title in fee-simple with general warranty, free from all liens and incumbrances to said building and premises on which the same is situated; such title to be approved and accepted by the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury before payment.

Mr. D. said: The Committee on Public Buildings of the last Congress recommended the purchase of Winder's Building. The Committee on Public Buildings of the present Congress also have recommended its purchase by the Government. I think there are many weighty reasons why the Government should do so, and not continue as it does now to occupy it at a heavy rent. Those who have examined the matter will recollect that Mr. Winder was induced to erect this building for the accommodation of the Government upon certain recommendations—unofficial and unauthorized, it is true—of the then Secretaries of War and the Treasury. He erected the building in 1847, and we have been occupying it as his tenants since that time. We are now paying twenty-one thousand eight hundred and some odd dollars annually as a rent for its use. We have money now lying in the Treasury, for which, at present, there is no use. Any member of this committee will see that the price we offer for the building is inadequate when compared with the rent we now pay for its use. It will be readily perceived that in less than ten years we will have paid in the way of rent the price of the building, and yet not have it in our possession. Our officers now occupy it. I know that some gentlemen argue that the Government ought to erect another structure; but such an edifice as the Government ought to build cannot be erected until we shall have paid for this building in the way of rent. Suppose you were to commence this very year to build a suitable structure for the use of the Government, and such a building is recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings, it would not be completed until you had paid for Winder's Building in rent. This, then, is a matter for the careful consideration of the committee. Is it not best that we should purchase this building at once, and have it under our absolute control? Is it not better that we should pay for it at once and own it, than to pay in a series of years for it, in the way of rent, and then not own it?

Mr. BOCOCK. What did the building cost?

Mr. DUNHAM. It is impossible, I presume, for the man who erected the building to tell exactly what it cost. The Committee on Public Buildings have investigated that matter minutely, as also have the Committee of Ways and Means. We have the statement of several of the best architects in the city—among the rest of Mr. Walter, an architect of public buildings—and we are satisfied that the price proposed to be paid for it is not anything more than adequate. Indeed, the Committee on Public Buildings thinks that it is an inadequate price. Some of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means think the price is inadequate; but that committee has unanimously come to the conclusion that the Government had better take the building at the proposed price than continue to pay the rent we are now paying. A principal that would yield an interest of the amount equal to the rent we pay, would be much larger than the price we propose to pay for the building.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I am opposed to the amendment, but I will not now detain the committee with my reasons for my opposition. I think we will soon have a new building for the War, Navy, and State Departments. This public building must, in a short time in our history, be erected. I am, therefore, utterly opposed at this time, to the expending of so much money upon the purchase of a building so unsuitable both in place and architecture as this one is. I am not now going into a discussion as to whether this building is suitable, whether it is constructed of good material, whether it be lasting, or whether it be safe or not. I know that doubts have been entertained as to its stability. It is not of that character of architecture which the public necessities will soon demand. The gentleman said that the rent of this building, whilst we were erecting a new one, would pay its cost. Mr. Winder put up that building in about one year. We pay $21,000 per annum. It may be that we pay too much. You had better pay $40,000 rent if you use the building for two years, than to give $200,000 for it, as at the expiration of that time you can put up another building. I say that we ought to go on for the next year as we have the past year, and then set about putting up a suitable building. I think that we shall see erected, in the course of four or five years, three or four buildings suitable for the use of different Departments of our Government; let us, therefore, not spend this amount of money at this time, but keep our funds for making such an improvement as will serve the wants of the Government, and also contribute to ornament and adorn the public grounds.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out $200,000 and insert $100,000. I offer this amendment in order to enable me to make a few remarks in regard to this question at this time. When this building was first proposed to be sold to the United States, I think its owner asked $280,000. He then reduced the price to $250,000. One of the standing committees of this House, I believe, at the present session, has reported a bill to purchase it at $250,000, having had before it the statements from the heads of the Department, the engineers and architect, and the Commissioner of Public Buildings as to the stability of the structure, its cost and value. I have opposed the purchase of it at those prices, and have uniformly stated, and now believe, that it is not such a structure as should be employed by this Government as one of its permanent departments. I consider it entirely and completely inadequate, and I have only been induced to favor this proposition for buying the building at $200,000, which Mr. Winder says he will take for it, in consideration of the circumstances in which we are placed. We have the building now at an expense of $21,800, including the warming of it, which is about $20,000 for the rent. I agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] that we should erect a building; but when he says that it is not such a building as the Government should have; and that Mr. Winder built it in twelve months, does he think that this Government can construct a suitable building for its public office, in two years? It will take you one year from this time to get the plans and estimates of a building of the kind, and then, to judge from the work going on under our very eyes, it will take some eight or ten years I think, at the least, to complete it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That is true, but we will save the interest upon the $200,000; and let us not go into this investment. The gentleman himself admits that it is not such a building as we want; let us, therefore, at once, if the gentleman pleases, provide for the erection of a suitable building.

Mr. JONES. I am willing to do that; but we cannot get that until, in my opinion, you will have paid the amount of this $200,000 in the rent of the building. It is more, in my opinion, than the building cost; but I believe at that price it will be a measure of economy, and not of extravagance; because, when we shall have put up such a building as we shall need, and this will be no longer wanted, we will have the building and ground upon which it is now situated. It is in view of these circumstances, and the delay necessary and consequent upon the erection of such a building as I think is needed by this Government for public offices, that I have given my assent to this proposition, reluctantly, I will say, even at that price, because as a permanent public building for this Government, I would not take it at any price. I will withdraw my amendment.

There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi, moved pro forma to strike out $200,000, and insert $175,000. He said: I am utterly opposed to the purchase of this building. It is not such a one as ought to belong to the Government at any price. Why, look at this building. Has it the appearance of a national building? To my mind, it resembles more a great manufacturing establishment than anything else. It cannot possibly be made creditable to the Government. I hold that when this Government owns buildings, whether it erects them or purchases them, they should at least reflect some little credit upon the architectural taste of the nation. I am opposed to the purchase of this building upon that ground, and I am opposed to it upon the further ground, that I do not choose, as a member of the National Legislature, to permit Mr. Winder, or anybody else, to consult his private taste in putting up a building for the nation. This nation has the means, has the taste, and I trust it will have the proper spirit, to put up its own buildings; and in a manner creditable to the nation.

The argument of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] as to the amount of rent which we are paying for this building amounts to nothing. I would rather pay twenty years' rent for it than have it said that the United States owned such a building at any price. It is a great unseemly building, wholly unlike any other public buildings, with no architectural taste about it. I think that we should go on and pay Mr. Winder his rent so long as we choose to occupy the building, and then go about, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] says, erecting our own buildings suitable for the uses of the Government. Put them in the right place, and not have them stuck up in the corner of some private square. For these, and forty other reasons which may be stated, I have from the beginning opposed the purchase of this building. I understand that in the course of a year or two another distinguished citizen intends to put up buildings for the heads of the Departments. While upon this subject, allow me to say, that I am in favor of the Government putting up residences for each one of the heads of the Departments; but if any private individual presumes to come forward and put them up upon his own architectural plan, and according to his taste, I shall oppose the purchase of them. I desire to see the Government put up buildings which shall reflect credit upon the whole country, and which shall be upon a scale commensurate with the magnitude of the nation. I desire to see erected for the War Department, the Navy Department, and the State Department, such buildings as will reflect credit upon the country; and I wish also to see private residences for each one of the heads of the Departments which shall also reflect credit upon the country. But I will permit no man, so far as my legislative action is concerned, to consult his tastes about putting up buildings for this Government.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. It may be proper in opposing this amendment that the committee should understand the circumstances connected with the erection of this building. It was erected under the encouragement of the Secretaries.

A VOICE. What Secretary?

Mr. BAYLY. Mr. Marcy. I know the whole circumstance of this case. We were renting at that time, at enormous rents, a large number of frail and combustible houses. They were rented at large prices, because no property holder will rent buildings for the public offices at the rates at which he would rent for individual purposes. These buildings were combustible, and there were valuable documents in all of them. They were rented merely at the discretion of the Department. It was suggested by the Secretaries to Mr. Winder, who had been largely engaged in the erection of buildings, that if he should erect a fire-proof building near the other Departments, and that the Government would rent it of him. Well, he erected the building, and the Government has rented it of him. Although some gentlemen say that it is a bad building, architects say otherwise. He has this house on hand. For reasons to which it is not necessary to advert, I understand that he is under strong obligations to make sale of it. When I was at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, it was part of my duty to investigate the whole case, as I did very carefully and laboriously; and my opinion of the matter is, that advantage is taken of the necessities of this man to give him less for the building than he ought to take.

The question was then taken on Mr. Brown's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I propose to increase the appropriation $50. I do this for the purpose of stating, that when the proposition was first made to rent this building, before it was completed, some five or six years ago—I do not remember the precise time—I protested against that mode of proceeding, and at the time stated, that the plans, as presented under the administration of General Jackson, advocated and recommended by him, ought to be carried out; that new buildings should be put up, the Treasury building completed, and corresponding buildings—not corresponding in architectural character, but in general form—upon the opposite side of the square. This is still my opinion; it is the proper course which should be adopted by the Government. I am glad, upon the present occasion, to find that there seems to be a general feeling in favor of this mode of proceeding by the Government. I wish to call the attention of the House to another important fact in reference to this building. My colleague [Mr. JONES] is correct when he states that you will not erect in ten years such a building as this Government ought to erect, and that the expenditures for the rent of this building during that period will amount to more than you now propose to pay for it. I call the attention of the House to this fact, that there is not a fire-proof building now in the possession of the Government affording the same room, the same conveniences, and the same advantages as this building, that did not cost five times as much as it is now proposed to pay for it. Although the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] stated that this building has not the architectural proportions and appearance which a building owned by the Government should have, yet it has one advantage that no other Government building has, and that consists in the fact that it is perfectly and substantially fire-proof. It is an economical building; and, sir, I think that the Government might learn an important lesson from the construction of that building, by which it might profit in future. Here is a building containing a number of rooms, equal, I believe, to the number of rooms in some of the separate departments, and in no single instance is there one that has not cost three or four, or perhaps five times as much as this building costs. It is a substantial building. It is a building which is certainly not without beauty, and certainly not without every convenience that is necessary for a public building. I think that, upon every consideration, the Government will be a gainer to the whole amount of the $200,000, or at least, to the value of the building at the period when you may erect one to take its place. But even at that time there will be a necessity for the occupation of this building. I have no doubt that if you build new War, Navy, and State Departments, at the completion of those buildings, crowd them as you may, you will still find a necessity to rent this building, such will be the growth and extent of our country.

Mr. FITCH. I am opposed to this amendment, and likewise to the original proposition. I desire to say a word or two in reply to the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] who very reluctantly favors this amendment, and of my colleague, [Mr. DUNHAM.] They say that we have been paying an enormous rent for this building, more than the interest on the money they now propose to give for it, and that, therefore, it would be better to purchase the building, and pay this amount for it than continue the rent. The payment of that rent has been compulsory on our part. I will not say that we have been dealt unfairly with, but our necessities have been imposed upon, and we have been compelled to pay an exorbitant rent, higher than an individual would have paid for the same building. But the gentlemen say that because this extortion in rent has been practiced, we must submit to another still greater, in paying an enormous price for the building. The actual cost of the building could not have exceeded $120,000. As to the stability of the structure, I presume gentlemen who were here two years since, remember certain evidences of it then afforded. Why, sir, a gust of wind, not very remarkable for severity, carried off the roof of the building. And, again, recently, when there was a young earthquake, which excited no alarm elsewhere, it frightened the clerks out of the building like rats from a sinking ship.

A VOICE. The President left the White-House, too.

Mr. FITCH. He knew he would be compelled to leave it, to make room for a Democrat, on the 4th of March next, and took the slight jar of the earthquake as a gentle hint, to avoid the worse shaking which was to come then, by vacating now. But to return to the Winder Building. Do these facts show remarkable stability in it? By no means; and, as the gentleman from Mississippi well remarked, there is nothing of convenience or architectural beauty to recommend it; and, if nothing of strength, then why should we purchase it? We are told that we ought to purchase this building now, because the price of it is reduced; that the owner originally asked $280,000, that next year he fell to $250,000, but that now he offers to sell it for $200,000. That very argument is a strong one for deferring the purchase, because at this rate we shall get it for $110,000 in another year, if it shall be necessary to purchase it. But it is far better to build than to buy buildings of this kind. Its purchase would be a bad investment, even as a temporary expedient, for it will be like the bridges over the Eastern Branch—we shall be compelled to appropriate five, ten, or fifteen thousand dollars annually to keep it in repair. And the first severe wind, or a discharge of artillery, or slight vibration of the earth, might tumble it down. If we purchase it, in addition to great expense to keep it in repair, we shall ultimately be compelled to erect buildings for the very purposes for which it is now proposed to purchase this one. It is badly built, badly ventilated, and badly arranged, whatever interested parties, or parties ignorant of what public offices ought to be, may say to the contrary.

There is another edifice which I have in my eye, and in which I am officially slightly interested, that the Government can purchase at a bargain, if they must buy instead of building, though that is a policy I would by no means recommend. At the proper time, I shall move to strike out all in relation to Winder's Building, and insert the one at which I have hinted.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, then withdrew the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, renewed it, and said: At an early part of the present session of Congress a resolution was adopted by the House directing the Committee on Public Buildings to inquire into the amount of rent that was paid by the Government of the United States annually, and the amount which had been paid for the last ten years. In the discharge of the duty imposed upon the committee by this order of the House, we made the necessary investigation, and we found that this Government has paid during the last ten years more than $150,000 rent for houses belonging to private individuals in this city, not one single one of which was fire-proof. We are now paying at the rate of $32,000 per annum for rent of houses belonging to private individuals, and occupied by the Government; this one of Winder's, and a little affair belonging to the Commissioner of Public Buildings, being the only two that are fire-proof. We pay for Winder's Building at the rate of $21,875 per year, and for Captain Easby's building at the rate of $300 per year. Those are the only two fire-proof structures belonging to private individuals, occupied by the Government; and for those we pay nearly $25,000 per year.

Now, sir, a great deal has been said about this structure of Winder's; and I should like to know of those gentlemen who have spoken upon the subject, whether they have examined the building; and whether they are prepared to state, upon their own knowledge, that the cost of this building was $120,000; that it was erected in an insufficient manner; that it is insecure; that the gust of wind which carried off the roof would not have carried away any roof similarly suspended, and whether it would not have carried off the roof of this Capitol if it had been within the range of that hurricane. Now, I have been to that house; I have examined it from its foundations to the cornice; I have had practical men with me, who knew all about building, to examine it with me; and they all concurred with me in saying that it was substantially and well built. Every room in the house is arched over, and there is not a particle of wood in it that can be burnt or destroyed by fire. It is the only house in the occupation of the Government outside of the public buildings, in which the archives of the Government are safe, except the little caddy over here belonging to Captain Easby.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Fitch] says that the cost of that building could not have exceeded $120,000. I will convince him, or any other gentleman who will go with me over the calculation, that it has cost fully as much as the amount which the Committee of Ways and Means propose to give for it. Take the number of bricks in the house—and any school-boy can make a calculation as to the amount—and knowing the cost of that kind of work, you can easily ascertain the aggregate. Why, the iron-work in that building cost $60,000 and more. Mr. Winder has the bills and receipts, which show that it cost $60,000. Well, in addition to the brick-work and iron-work, there is wood-work about the house—window-frames, and so forth, and there is painting and glazing, and a number of other items, which necessarily increase the expense to a large amount.

But the Committee on Public Buildings did not rely entirely upon their own judgments in regard to the construction of this house. Here is the certificate of the present architect of public buildings, who says that he went and examined the house, and that such a house could not be built by the Government for less than $240,000, exclusive of the value of the ground, and that is worth $30,000.

Here is the certificate of Mr. Ward, an old builder of this city, whom I have known from my boyhood to the present moment, and whose word would not be disputed by any one who knew him. He says that such a house as that could not be built for less than $250,000. And here is the certificate of a gentleman of the name of Coltman, another builder, who has been here for a quarter of a century, and is known to the people of this city—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McMULLIN. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, and in opposing that amendment, I desire to notice the argument of my colleague, [Mr. BAYLY.] I understood my colleague, who professes to know all about this Winder's building, to say that the then acting Secretary committed this Government in regard to that building.

Mr. BAYLY. Oh, no.

Mr. McMULLIN. That there was an implied understanding—

Mr. BAYLY. I wish to say at once, that my colleague utterly misunderstood what I said. I do not think he was listening to me when I spoke.

Mr. McMULLIN. I may have misunderstood my colleague, but I certainly was listening to him and trying to understand him. I understood my colleague to assert that the Secretary—and he told me that Mr. Marcy was Secretary at the time—recommended the erection of this building. Did my colleague say that?

Mr. BAYLY. I did not.

Mr. McMULLIN. Then what did you say? There were other gentlemen who understood my colleague to say, as I understood him, that Secretary Marcy recommended the erection of this building. Now, sir, that is one of my objections to the purchase of this building. I deny the right of Secretary Marcy, or Secretary anybody else, acting in his official character—

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Virginia will allow me to say, that Mr. Marcy did not recommend the erection of the building. It is due to Governor Marcy, that I should say this much.

Mr. McMULLIN. I understood my colleague to say that he did recommend it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Governor Marcy, in his letter, stated to Mr. Winder, that if the building were completed, he would occupy a part of it, but—

Mr. McMULLIN. I cannot allow the gentleman to occupy any more of my time. There seems to be a difference between the statements of my colleague and the present chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I understood my colleague to say that Governor Marcy recommended the erection of this building.

But, sir, I desire to say further, that while gentlemen are talking here about saving money to the Government, by purchasing this building, they forget that the Government is now in debt to the amount of $100,000,000, and must pay six per cent. interest on the money which they have borrowed. If you deduct the six per cent. which you must pay in the form of interest, I ask you if this Government will be saving the twenty-odd thousand dollars now paid in the form of rent?

But, again, I wish to call the attention of the committee to another fact. Notwithstanding what the learned chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings has said, I tell that gentleman, and tell this committee, that I have examined this building myself. I know that the public officers are, at times, really afraid to remain in the building. Go and examine it, and you will find that it is cracked almost from bottom to top; and not only are window frames cracked, but it is cracked between the window frames. It is a rickety concern. I would not like to stay there, if I were one of those officers. But I tell the House, that it is due to ourselves, before we pay this $200,000 for this building, that one or two more committees should investigate the subject. I concede to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] a very high degree of architectural skill, but when I see the building with my own eyes, it is very difficult to convince me that I am wrong.

Mr. STANTON then, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, moved pro forma to increase the appropriation $40.

I move this amendment, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of saying a word in reply to my colleague, [Mr. McMULLIN.] My colleague saw fit to criticise my remarks, without having heard correctly what I said, or if he did hear, he did not understand. Now, I never said that Governor Marcy recommended the erection of this building. I generally understand the force of the language I use, and I sometimes take pains to use the proper language. I said that this building was erected under the encouragement of the Secretaries—I used the plural term. He asked me what Secretary. I said Marcy for one. Walker was the other. The building was erected under their encouragement. That is the record.

Mr. McMULLIN. What is the difference between recommendation and encouragement?

Mr. BAYLY. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's question shows that I am right. He asks me what is the difference between encouragement and recommendation. The gentleman has encouraged me to make this speech, but I do not think he recommended it. [Great laughter.] Does the gentleman understand me now? I used this word, and the gentlemen who sit near me so understood me. I said it was done under the encouragement of the Secretaries. I only used the singular, when my colleague asked me, what Secretary? I replied Marcy was one; I should have gone on and stated that Walker was another, but for the hurry under the five minutes rule. I might have said under the encouragement of the Executive. That is the proper expression.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to increase the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition already pending is to increase the appropriation $40. Another amendment is not in order until that is disposed of.

A MEMBER. You can speak in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I have only a word or two to say upon this subject. This is a commercial matter, which any merchant would settle, if it were his own, in five minutes. We are paying for this building a rent upon a principal of $325,000—that is, at the rate of six per cent. interest. The rent we pay would make the principal about $325,000. The proposition now is to buy the building for $200,000, the interest of which, at six per cent., is $1,200 a year. The plain, simple proposition before the House, therefore, is, whether we will save over $7,000 per annum; and I say, that is not a question about which a merchant or planter would hesitate a moment.

Mr. SACKETT. Will the gentleman allow me a moment, simply to make a statement in connection with this matter? In ten years the difference between the interest upon $200,000, which it is now proposed to pay for this building, at the usual rate, and the rent which we pay for the building would amount to $89,680. In twenty years it would save the entire cost of purchasing the building.

Mr. BROOKS. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have a surplus of between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000 in the public Treasury, and the question is, What shall we do with it?

Mr. McMULLIN. Pay the public debt.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from Virginia says, "Pay the public debt." Why, sir, we can do that if we choose to pay $112 or $115 for $100 of that debt, for that is about the amount of premium upon the United States stocks. But how can we pay the debt we owe before it becomes due, unless the creditors choose to take it? We cannot pay the public debt unless we buy United States stocks at from twelve to fifteen per cent. premium. Is it not, then, wise to take this surplus money which we now have in the Treasury, and invest it as it is now proposed, in the purchase of a public building which the public officers of the country have certified is necessary? Which your architects have certified is strong? And which the Committee of Ways and Means have unanimously agreed to recommend? and it is very seldom that anything is reported here, and especially an appropriation, unanimously, by that committee. I believe it was also unanimously recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings, as a measure of public economy, and as a wise investment of the surplus public money which now lies idle in the Treasury.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one word with regard to the safety of that building. There is a contest going on in this city between the builders and Winder's Building. When I first came to this city, living, as I did, in the vicinity of that building, I almost instinctively went upon the other side of the street as I passed it. I always felt shy of it. There was something of ticklishness even when I looked at it, for I was told that it would tumble down about my head. This comes from the struggle that is going on between the builders and architects. To make us build three or four more public buildings in order to give them employment, they tell us these tales. I am willing to build more public buildings, but I am not willing to be deluded by idle tales as to the danger of this one. They are all got up by the builders and architects, who want us to appropriate large sums of money in the erection of other public buildings. This building is as safe as any of the kind in the world, I think, and I am assured so by architects in whose opinions I have great confidence. I have no fear or apprehension in my own mind now. I think it is one of the best buildings of the kind in the world; one of the best fire-proof buildings, and one of the best buildings to be used as a depository of the public records whenever we begin to erect other buildings. If it had been used alone as a depository of pension certificates, land warrants, and other public documents, which require to be deposited in a safe public building, it would be worth a half a million of money to the country at this moment merely as an idle depository. The public papers are constantly in danger in the War and Navy Departments; and in the Treasury Department large claims have arisen against this Government, because the public records have been destroyed by fire. The Government has paid for these claims ten times over what a suitable fire-proof building would cost; so that if we were to purchase this building only for the depository of these papers, it would be money well invested.

The question was then taken, and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FITCH. I move to strike out all that relates to "Winder's Building" and insert in lieu thereof "the Smithsonian Institution."

I expect to have the support of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] for this amendment, because he cannot make the complaint against the Smithsonian building, that it wants architectural beauty, however much it may want convenience. There is one thing in relation to it which is a particular recommendation. The roof is not in danger whenever the wind changes, and the walls are too substantial to give way to the concussion from a discharge of artillery, or because the earth takes a slight ague fit. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] stated, that the objections to the purchase of Winder's Building came from the builders and architects of the city. There has no objection of mine come from any such source, but from my own observation. I saw its roof prostrate upon the ground, and I have noticed that the walls are unsound, as the gentleman from New York can ascertain if he will take the trouble to examine them. I do not believe there is an inmate of the building who will certify that he believes it to be safe. Its inmates must view with tremor the approach of a cloud from the west or south.

The building I propose as a substitute for it has no such objection. It has architectural beauty, and its walls are durable. The interior of its main part is not finished; and in that fact is another advantage, because the Government officers can arrange it to suit their wants and conveniences. It is true if the present officers of that institution had had the erection of the building, it would probably have been a somewhat different affair, and might not have cost as much. Several gentlemen who happened at that time to be connected with the Institution as officers were men of taste; they looked rather to fancy than utility, and the building was erected in accordance with their plan. The present officers, looking to convenience and utility, are willing to dispose of the building that they may erect a new one having those requirements. I presume Mr. Winder is also very willing to get rid of his, but we are more liberal than he is. We will take two thirds the cost of our building, and that is infinitely a better bargain than to purchase Winder's Building for $200,000. You can make the former much more useful to the Government. I cannot say, it is true, that the Smithsonian building was erected under the "encouragement" of any Secretary, although I believe quite a number of Secretaries had somewhat to do with it; and the entire Congress, too, more or less, for they are the trustees of the fund out of which it was built. It is therefore already in one respect a public building; and I believe if it is deemed necessary to purchase a building for offices, Government cannot do better than to make it one in all respects by buying it. Purchase it off our hands, and permit us to erect another that will answer a better purpose at a less expense.

Mr. HEBARD. I am opposed to the amendment. I thought the proposition to purchase Winder's Building monstrous enough, considering the monstrosity of its appearance, and its uncouth looks; but when the gentleman proposes to substitute the Smithsonian building for that, the other dwindles away until it quite vanishes. I could not consent at all that this Government should impose on us such a disgrace as to have it said that it has the proprietorship of that Smithsonian building.

But, sir, there have been speeches enough made upon this subject already. I rise not for the purpose of making another speech, but for the purpose of bringing the committee, if possible, to a vote. I think we have had speeches enough upon this subject to satisfy every gentleman who will be satisfied, as to how he shall vote. I think the whole proposition is entirely unsatisfactory. There is no disposition manifested to favor the proposition, and we may as well come to a direct vote upon the main question, and dispose of it.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the amendment,

Mr. DUNHAM demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. FULLER, and STANTON of Tennessee, were appointed.

Mr. GOODENOW. Will the Chair state what the amendment is?

The CHAIRMAN. It is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Dunham,] for the purchase of Winder's Building, $200,000.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 86.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BOWIE offered the following amendment, to come in after the eight hundred and sixty-ninth line, at the end of the clauses under the head of "public buildings:—"

For erecting a bridge across the Potomac river, at some suitable point between the Long Bridge and the rock called the Three Sisters, to be selected by the Engineer of the United States, under the direction of the President, $30,000.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I make the question of order, that there is no law authorizing the expenditure of the money proposed in the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Bowie.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order, and decides that the amendment is not admissible.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, offered the following amendment, to come in at the same place as the last amendment offered:

To complete and revise the grades of the city of Washington, and to determine the plans for the drainage and sewerage thereof, $6,000; the surveys and plans to be made by the engineer now in charge of that duty, under the direction of the President of the United States: Provided, That no change shall be made in any established grade in said city without the consent of the corporation of Washington.

Mr. S. said: In the appropriation bill passed the last year, or the year before, the sum of $4,000 was appropriated for the purpose of carrying out this service. That sum has been expended. I understand that the Government of the United States owns the streets and avenues in the city of Washington, and that they are exclusively under the jurisdiction of the Government; and it is the only power that can regulate the grades thereof. The streets were originally deeded to the Government of the United States, and they are now under its jurisdiction. I have in my hands a letter from the engineer in relation to this matter; and as it gives a better exposition of the facts than I can give, I propose to occupy the five minutes allowed me by permitting the Clerk to read it.

The letter was then read, as follows:

SIR: The instructions communicated to me by the Secretary of the Interior, for my guidance in the discharge of my duties as engineer to complete the grades of Washington, direct that after I shall have taken exact and careful levels of all those streets and avenues within the city of which the grades have not been heretofore determined, and established for them proper grades, I shall, so far as the appropriation will permit, proceed to take levels of the streets and avenues for which grades have been heretofore devised and recorded, with a view to ascertaining and reporting where and to what extent those grades have been departed from, what modifications of them may be required for the public interests, and to what extent such modifications can be carried out consistently with private rights already vested.

This latter branch of duty indicated by my instructions is, in my judgment, that of the greatest and most urgent importance. The original plans of grades, as laid down in the old graduation book, are, as a system, bad, and to some sections of the city almost ruinous. While at many points they have greatly retarded, and at some points have entirely prevented improvement. The public necessities have compelled and are yet compelling much improvement in spite of them. With every dollar expended in improvements, in accordance with these old plans of drainage, the difficulty and expense of the proper remedies is increased, and, therefore, it is of the utmost consequence to determine with the least possible delay what the ultimate plans shall be, in order that the expense of their execution shall be reduced to the lowest possible amount, their adoption encounter the least possible individual opposition, and present impediments to improvement shall be most effectually and speedily removed.

The present appropriation, however, cannot touch this portion of the work. I still believe that I will be able to make it accomplish its original immediate purposes and complete the grades of the city; that is, devise a system of grades for all that for which nothing at all had been devised before. The aggregate length of all the streets and avenues in the city is two hundred and thirty miles, of which there are one hundred and twenty-seven miles for which I have to devise a system of grades. Of the original appropriation by Congress of $4,000, I have expended $2,500. With this amount I have taken careful and exact levels, at points varying as the nature of the ground required, from one hundred feet to twenty feet apart, of the whole one hundred and twenty-seven miles not previously examined, (together with cross sections where the inequality of the ground required them;) have constructed an exact and original skeleton map of the whole city upon a scale of two hundred feet to an inch, (or twenty-six and four tenths inches per mile,) and maps of several localities of especial difficulty on a scale of one hundred feet to an inch, and have now in progress a general map of the whole city on a scale of one inch to seven hundred and fifty feet, (or seven and four one hundredths inches to one mile.) On the large skeleton map it is my purpose to show the contour lines of the original surface, and, in a different color, the contour lines also of the surface after graduation, so that an inspection of the map will show to the nearest foot or half foot the cut or fill necessary to bring the surface at any point to the grade. On the small general map I propose also to draw the contour of the graded surface, showing every five feet of elevation above tide, and, by colors, indicating each particular basin of drainage within the city, in such manner that the map will inform any one who may examine it how much surface and what surface is drained through any particular channel at any particular point. I think it will be conceded that this information (original to the extent of six tenths of the entire city) thus collected and thus arranged will represent $4,000 judiciously and economically expended. It will be obvious also that both industry and economy will be required to enable the remaining $1,500 of the appropriation to accomplish its original immediate purposes.

I deem it therefore most important to obtain, as speedily as possible, additional funds for the purpose of enabling me thoroughly to revise all of the old work, and to carry on that revision, as it can best be done, pari passu with my present work. To do this effectually and well, additional funds to the amount of $6,000 will be requisite. With this $6,000 additional, the necessary party or parties could be put immediately in the field, and the results of their labors could be, day by day, incorporated in the office with the plans now in progress. The field-work in revision could not progress as rapidly as in the unbuild portions of the city, for the reason that the houses already built would render necessary a class of laborious and minute examinations. This will partly account for the disproportion between the amount proposed to be appropriated for the portion of the city to be revised and the amount appropriated for that for which the grades were to be completed. But this disproportion of appropriation sought is due, also, to another cause. I propose to connect with these determinations of the surface drainage, the establishment of at least the leading and governing facts of a system of sewerage for the whole city, and so much of the details of the system as will effectually secure to the Government and the corporation of Washington that every dollar thereafter expended in sewerage shall be rightly expended; in the construction of a component part of a consistent and thoroughly-arranged whole, and judiciously expended in the prevention and removal of nuisances; not as now wasted in works ultimately to be reconstructed, and, in almost every instance, the immediate cause of more nuisance, filth, and disease than they are designed to remedy. The United States and the corporation are annually wasting money in building sewers, which are worse than useless; and individual citizens, impelled by necessity, and undirected by proper information, are constantly evading and violating the law to the same bad and unprofitable end. The amounts thus, often in a single year, worse than wasted, probably exceed the whole amount that I suggest to be appropriated for this object. It is in vain to say that in our climate, and with our stiff soil, a populous city can be drained by surface-drainage alone. The lower front of every populous square in the city demonstrates, on every summer day, that the fact is otherwise. Of course, until a supply of water shall be provided for the city, no general system of sewers can be effectual. It is possible, however, so to arrange and perfect a system, that what must unavoidably be done before water is introduced into the city, shall be well done, and in harmony with the ultimate system, while the levels taken in the execution of this work would give all the necessary facts to determine, when needed for that purpose, the distribution of the water.

Can $6,000 do more general good, or improve and advance the whole city as much, by any other possible expenditure of so small a sum? Will not the corporation present the facts to Congress, and procure from the authority that gave us this immense street establishment, the means to prevent it from being an immense evil?

Mr. FICKLIN. I desire to ask my friend from Kentucky [Mr. Stanton] a question in relation to this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Further debate is not in order.

The question was then taken on Mr. Stanton's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SKELTON. I rise for a personal explanation. Since I made my remarks this morning, in regard to the State of New Jersey, the gentleman from Arkansas has stated to the House that he had no intention to cast reflection upon my State, or of doing it any injustice. I wish to state to the House and to the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. Johnson,] that, so far as I was concerned, I had no intention of charging that gentleman with any course of conduct designedly offensive, nor had I any intention of saying anything personally offensive to him. I know that gentleman's generosity of sentiment too well to suppose that he would designedly say anything offensive.

Mr. JOHNSON. In regard to the matter of which I spoke, I never knew anything personally, and it was humorously said on my part entirely.

Mr. DURKEE. I wish to state that I had intended to address the House on this bill. But as I was prevented by the close of debate, I will publish my remarks.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I offer the same amendment which I last offered, with the exception that I reduce the amount one dollar.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman will not offer his amendment, but allow us to progress with the bill.

Mr. STANTON. I offer the amendment because the House does not understand the question, and because the matter is itself one of economy. When the gentleman himself [Mr. HOUSTON] understands it, and the House understands it, they will pass the amendment.

Now, the Government of the United States exercises jurisdiction over these streets and avenues. The grades are made one day at great expense, and changed the next day at another expense. The great object Congress had in view when it adopted the original proposition upon this subject, was to devise a general system, by which the grades would be fixed permanently for all time to come. This proposition simply proposes to carry out what Congress has heretofore directed to be done; and, in order that the House may have a full understanding of the subject, I request the Clerk to read the balance of that letter.

[The Clerk then read the balance of the letter, which is inserted above in full, commencing with the words "I deem it, therefore, most important," &c.]

Mr. PICKLIN. I wish to inquire whether these grades are not already made the foundation of application for damages against the Government on account of injuries to property arising therefrom?

Mr. STANTON. I know of but a single case in the city where damages have been asked for by the owners of property, and that is on the street running north from the Capitol, past Captain Wilkes's, and that case is one where there has been a deep cut of some twenty or more feet.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. STANTON, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STUART offered the following amendment, to come in at the end of the clauses under the head of "public buildings."

For refunding to the State of Michigan the amount of money advanced by said State in organizing, subsisting, and transporting volunteers previous to their being mustered into the service of the United States during the war with Mexico, together with the interest on said sum at six per cent per annum, $20,000; which said sum, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to pay and cancel the claim of said State, as presented and now filed in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury Department, together with interest as aforesaid on said claim from the time said advances were made by said State, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Governor or other proper officer of the said State of Michigan.

Mr. S. said: At this late hour I do not wish to detain the committee one moment unnecessarily. It is well known to everybody—

Mr. HEBARD. I rise to a question of order. My point is, that this amendment does not propose appropriation in pursuance of any existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question made is, that the proposed appropriation is not to carry out any existing law. The joint resolution of 1846, and the act of Congress in 1847, provide for the payment of the expenses incurred by States, corporations, and individuals in raising and sustaining troops called into the service of the United States during the Mexican war. The Chair is therefore of the opinion that the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Michigan is in order.

Mr. STUART. As I was about stating, when interrupted, this money was advanced some five years ago, by the State of Michigan, when we were called upon to raise a regiment for the Mexican war. It was near the close of the war, and the regiment was raised in great haste, and expedition, and the State promptly advanced the money. There is no dispute anywhere, as to the advance of the money. The Department does not dispute it; but by the stringency of the regulations in the War Department, the State is unable to furnish such receipts as they insist ought to have been taken, under their regulations, from captains who paid out that money, so as to enable the accounting officer to pass the account. There is not an accounting officer who denies but what the evidence is satisfactory to show that the money has been advanced in the language of the law. But these restrictions have been made by the Department, in order to meet individual claims, and to prevent frauds from being practiced upon them; and they require the same vouchers from a State that they do from an individual, and it is impossible for the State of Michigan to comply with them, because the regiment was raised expeditiously, and these receipts were not taken. Many of the individuals are dead, and it is out of the power of the State to get them. But we promptly responded to our duties under the Constitution, and the laws of the country, and there is no reason in the world, founded in equity and justice, why the claim should not be paid.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to ask the gentleman what is the amount of the claim?

Mr. STUART. It is $15,000. The amount provided for in the amendment is $20,000, or so much of that sum as shall be necessary to adjust and satisfy the claim of Michigan, with six per cent interest from the time the advance was made.

Mr. FOWLER. Another question I wish to ask is this: Is there any dispute that the State has actually advanced and paid this amount of money?

Mr. STUART. Not a particle anywhere; and the law under which this money is to be refunded, expressly provides that six per cent shall be paid from the time the advance was made.

Mr. STANLY. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] by inserting the additional sum of $10,000, to be paid to the State of North Carolina, for money advanced by her for the same purpose. Both claims stand upon the same footing; and if the one is allowed I hope the other will be. There is no doubt about the payment of this money.

I am just informed, Mr. Chairman, that Alabama has a claim of a like character. I will include both States in the same amendment, and make the sum $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the claims of the States of North Carolina and Alabama, for money expended in paying soldiers engaged in the Mexican war.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had better reduce his amendment to writing.

The amendment was reduced to writing, and presented, as follows:

"And the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the claims of the States of North Carolina and Alabama, for expenditures made by said States in paying soldiers engaged in the war with Mexico."

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I raise a question of order. What does the gentleman propose to amend?

The CHAIRMAN. A question of order has already been raised upon the amendment. The amendment is proposed to come in after line eight hundred and seventy-six under the head of miscellaneous.

Mr. STEVENS. Has the Chair decided that it was germane to the section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided that it was in order, being an appropriation to carry out existing laws.

Mr. STEVENS. I submit the question of order—that it is not germane to the section in which it is proposed to be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of order comes too late.

Mr. CLEVELAND. It seems to me that this is a very loose way of transacting business. We have appropriate committees appointed for the express purpose of taking into consideration these various claims, and those committees, I believe, have been in the city of Washington always ready to receive the applications of gentlemen. The gentleman whose amendment I now oppose is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and of course cannot say that he was not aware there was a committee whose appropriate duty it was to attend to this matter. I object to this mode of doing justice to the States. I acknowledge my willingness to pay to the States of Michigan, North Carolina, and Alabama every dollar thus advanced by them; but I am opposed to having these questions sprung upon this committee by any member after they have been considered and rejected by the appropriate standing committee.

Mr. GENTRY. With the gentleman's permission, I desire to state that various claims from individuals and corporations have been presented to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that they have all been rejected upon the ground that the general law authorizing the payment of all claims for advances made in preparing and marching troops into Mexico during the war by States, corporations, or individuals, is ample and broad in its provision. The committee have investigated that subject time and again, and decided against every claim upon that ground.

Mr. CLEVELAND. And of course there is no sort of apology for attempting to get them in by this mode, and I warn the committee against granting these claims in the way they are attempted to be paid by gentlemen who rise in their places and ask to make an amendment providing for such and such a case. The law is ample enough to furnish them with all the remedy they need. If it is not, I think we should wait and receive a report from the committee to which the subject was referred before making the allowance. I am decidedly opposed to individual members getting up and, to a general bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, offering such amendments as this. It is dangerous, and it is unjust and unfair to the committee and to the country.

Mr. SACKETT. I ask that the law be read.

A MEMBER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Further discussion is not in order.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. ORR. I would ask of the gentleman from North Carolina to modify his amendment so as to provide for the payment to South Carolina of $20,000 for advances made by her.

Mr. STANLY. I have no objection to modify my amendment in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. Will not the gentleman enlarge his amendment so as to embrace an appropriation of $20,000 for the improvement of the Allegheny river?

Mr. STANLY. Yes, sir, of $30,000. [Laughter.]

Mr. GENTRY. The law is ample. If proof be made under the law, every cent of these claims can be obtained.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut. Has not the amendment been considerably enlarged?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Is it not, then, in order to discuss the enlarged amendment? No discussion has been had since modifications have been accepted by the gentleman from North Carolina to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is very true; but the amendment is under the control of the gentleman from North Carolina. Further debate is not in order.

Mr. SEYMOUR. One of these claims has been before the committee, and they are prepared to report against it.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. STANLY was rejected.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move the following amendment:

For moneys advanced by Virginia during the Mexican war to pay the expenses of volunteers, $5,000.

I offer that amendment simply for the purpose of stating that the claim of Virginia for advances to her Mexican volunteers has been before the Committee on Military Affairs. The subject was carefully investigated by that committee, and the result of their investigation has been that the Secretary of War is authorized, under the provisions of the act of 2d of June, 1848, to make all payments of that description satisfactorily established by evidence before that Department. In pursuance of the instructions of the committee, I have made such a report, which has been laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia. It is simply this: Whether the provision he alludes to does, in his opinion, meet cases where it is perfectly evident the money has been expended, but where vouchers cannot be shown for it, owing to the absence or death of those who, in the service, had the money and expended it?

Mr. FAULKNER. I presume not. That is a question of fact alone. The law has settled the principle, and the law has given to the Secretary of War all the authority, if the facts can be made out satisfactorily to his mind. I presume in the absence of testimony—in the absence of vouchers the Secretary of War would have no authority to act upon the subject.

Mr. STUART. I am opposed to that amendment, and I wish to call the attention of the committee to a few facts. If the gentleman from Virginia had listened to what I related, he would not object; nor would any gentleman of this committee.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is not addressing himself in opposition to the amendment which he professes to do.

Mr. STUART. I am under special obligations to the gentleman from Ohio. He has discussed this bill out of all sort of order, and nobody has objected.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to another question of order; the gentleman has no right to comment upon my conduct.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman takes especial pains to call me to order the moment I rise to say anything.

I wish to address myself to the argument of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER.] The State of Michigan advanced this money. The regulation under the law to which the gentleman has referred, requires that a certain species of proof shall be made in all cases. The law provides that it shall be proved satisfactorily to the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War sets down and makes a set of regulations, and says that "if you cannot comply with these regulations I will declare it not proved under that law." What are those regulations? Although the State has advanced the money and paid it into the hands of the officers, yet if those officers did not take receipts for every dollar and every cent they paid, and cannot present those receipts here, the Secretary in his regulations cuts it off. He says these regulations are indispensable in order to prevent frauds by individuals. What are the facts? The Government has been plundered by individuals from the day the law was passed till this, notwithstanding his regulations. Frauds have been committed over and over again. Some of the perpetrators have fled the country, and others have been indicted. The effect of these regulations is to prevent payment to the States. While the Department states they have no doubt we have paid the money—that the evidence is clear—they say, Here is our platform of regulations—if you cannot come up to it we will not pay you.

Now, I do not propose to override these regulations. Let them stand there. Let them cut off as many frauds as they can; but I submit it is the duty of Congress, where they believe that the State has advanced the money, that we shall pay it. That is all there is in this case. The law is of no use to us, because here is a set of regulations the State cannot comply with, for the reason that some of the officers are dead, and some in the haste of raising equipping and taking their regiments into action, did not take receipts. There are about two thirds of the claim, therefore, excluded by the regulations. I ask gentlemen what reason there is for keeping us here year after year, under such circumstances? We have had the opinion of the Attorney General, that this debt ought to be paid. The Secretary of War sat down and replied to him that if that opinion prevailed, individuals would come in under his regulations, and the Government would be defrauded. If there is any reason for it, I am willing to be voted down; but is there any reason, founded in equity and justice, that a State which advanced this money, five years ago, should not have it refunded?

The question was then taken on Mr. FAULKNER's amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question then recurring upon the amendment—

Mr. STUART demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. STUART and HART were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 52.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JENKINS moved that the committee rise. Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. STEPHENS, of Georgia, and MOLONY were appointed.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 43.

So the committee agreed to rise.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 196, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30th, 1853, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. DUNCAN. With the leave of the House, I will make a report from the Committee on Commerce, in order that it may be printed and referred. It is the bill making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the direction and establishment of the same, and for other purposes.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, objected.

On motion by Mr. MOREHEAD, the House then adjourned till to-morrow at eleven o'clock, a. m.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. STEPHENS, of New York: The petition of S. E. Quidor and others, citizens of New York, praying for the extension of Uri Emmons's patent of April 25, 1823, for a planing machine.

By Mr. HOW, of New York: The memorial of Isaac Turner, Seth Turner, and others, for bounty land.

By Mr. FLOYD: The memorial of John D. Jones and others, of New York, for the passage of a law for the better protection of life on vessels and boats propelled by steam.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 7, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. DUNCAN, by the unanimous consent of the House, reported, from the Committee on Commerce, a bill making appropriations for light-houses, lights-boats, buoys, &c., providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes; which was read the first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of House bill No. 146, to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States.

Mr. STEPHENS, of New York, said: At this late day of the session, I am aware that I deviate from the general practice in requesting, in open House, the introduction of a petition; but I do so in the case of this one forwarded to me by a number of respectable inhabitants of the State of New York, that the attention of every member of Congress may be called to the subject to which it relates—the frequency of steamboat disasters, and the consequent fearful destruction of human life. It particularly alludes to the burning of the Henry Clay, which occurred on the 28th of July last.

It is not necessary, nor do I intend to depict to you the heart-rending scene of that awful calamity, as day after day the friends of absent ones searched in the dread of finding them among the lost. Nearly all the eighty or more bodies recovered have been claimed by their friends. Among those who untimely met their end, a few were strangers; but at the hands of a Christian community they received the rites of Christian sepulture.

With regard to those who had charge of that boat I have nothing now to say. An outraged people have taken measures to redress the wrong committed upon them.

I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce, and trust that they will promptly consider and grant the prayer of the petitioners. The petition is in the following words:

To the Honorable the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned most respectfully and most feelingly call the attention of your honorable body to the published accounts of two fearful and appalling disasters, on board of two boats propelled by steam, within the last thirty days—one the St. James, of New Orleans, on the 5th of July, and the other the Henry Clay, of New York, on the 28th of the same month; and earnestly ask that the bill for the better protection of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled by steam recently passed by the Senate of the United States may be immediately acted upon by your honorable body.

The undersigned also desire to call your particular attention to the fearful record of the loss of human life by the burning of the steamer Griffith on Lake Erie, on the 16th of June, 1850; and to the fact that the bill now before your honorable body has been pending in Congress since that terrible catastrophe, during which time, the precious lives of hundreds of passengers have been sacrificed.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will, then, present it under the rules.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. HAVEN. At the time when I yielded the floor yesterday to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUTON], I was remarking upon some of the provisions of this bill, in reference to their bearing upon the State of New York, and the construction resorted to to evade the intention of the framers of the clause in the appropriation bill of 1842, which provides that the district attorney, marshal, clerk of the circuit court, and clerk of the district courts of New York for the northern and southern districts, shall not hereafter receive any greater or other fees and emoluments for services rendered by them, respectively, in the said courts than now are, or hereafter may be, allowed by the laws of the State of New York, to attorneys, solicitors, counsel, sheriff, and clerks, in the highest courts of law and equity, in said State, for like services.

It will be seen by the report of the Comptroller of the Treasury, and the bills of costs thereto annexed, that, inasmuch as this provision was a limit upon the district attorney, and inasmuch as it declared he should have no greater fees and emoluments for services than by the laws of New York are given to attorneys, solicitors, and counsellors; and inasmuch as the laws of New York then authorized a person, who was both attorney and counsellor, to receive fees in the same cause, in both capacities, the district attorney claimed he was entitled not only to district attorneys' fees, but to the fees given to counsellors also, and the clerks and taxing officer, actually taxed and certified his fees and costs on that principle, and in pursuance of such claim. So that, instead of a restriction, the provision of the statute of 1842, which I have referred to, was construed so as to enlarge his fees by adding to them the fees of a counsellor in like cases.

I endeavored to show yesterday, that a like result would flow from the first section of this bill, in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; for as that section now stands, the solicitors, proctors, and attorneys, of the first few lines of it, who are, what in the civil law are called advocates, can, in addition to the items given by the section to them, make up a further bill as advocates in each case, under the provisions of the law of New York of 1789, regulating fees in admiralty in said State; and by the declaratory rule of taxation, adopted by the court, they would be entitled to collect both bills from the losing party. It is judicially determined in New York, in the northern district at least, and is provided by the ninety-fourth rule of the court, in that district, that this act of 1789, of that State, governs the fees in admiralty, in the district courts of that State; and as the construction referred to is not affected by the bill under consideration, and as the fees given by this bill to solicitors, attorneys, and proctors, are only declared to be in lieu of all fees now allowed to them, the advocates will tax their bills of costs according to the New York fee bill of 1789, and collect them under the rules and laws as I have already explained. But I will leave this branch of the subject, and look at the bill in its general aspect, and in some of its other details, before submitting my amendment to the House.

The general object of the bill—the leading and prominent idea which the Judiciary Committee seem to have entertained, and by which they have been governed in framing the bill, has been to equalize the fees throughout the whole country, or, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Bowie] has expressed it, to lay down a "horizontal scale of compensation;" that is, to give to solicitors, proctors, and attorneys, as well as to marshals, clerks, and district attorneys, the same compensation in the district in which Vermont, for instance, is included, as is given in New York and in Louisiana. This is not right. In my opinion, such a mode of compensation, whilst it sounds well in the abstract, is not an equal and proper mode, and will be found to operate unjustly. It is a maxim, that "equality is equity." This is true in a general sense, but equality is not always equity. Equality of compensation is not equity; unless it is as between parties that are equal, and upon an equal amount of services. To make equality equity, as between Vermont and Louisiana, you must first put into the hands of the district attorneys, marshals, and clerks of Vermont, an amount of business equal to that which they do in Louisiana, and then you must make the practice and modes of proceedings in both those States agree; one must not involve more labor than the other. A clerk or marshal in Vermont, who cannot by law practice in the court whilst he remains such, and to whom you furnish business enough to employ him only a tenth part of his time, is entitled to more compensation for what he does, than a like officer in New Orleans or New York, for the same amount of services, to whom you furnish business enough to employ his entire time, as well as that of his deputies.

This is one difficulty. I do not say that it is an insuperable one, in my mind, to this bill. I apprehend it will be found to be a difficulty with gentlemen in various parts of the House, and from various parts of the country, when they endeavor to come to a practical conclusion upon the bill.

The main difficulty with me is in reference to the fees of district attorneys, marshals, and clerks in my own State. I am desirous that this bill, in some modified form, or some well-considered bill on this subject, should become a law. I think the public interest requires it. I believe it would be great injustice to leave this matter without further legislation. I know the committee who have reported the bill desire, if it is not now, that it should be made to be equitable and just, and not oppressive upon any part of the country, or upon any interest of the country, or unequal or unjust in favor of the officers of any particular localities.

I have looked carefully into the bill again since yesterday morning, and am willing to say that, whilst I am not entirely satisfied with all the provisions of the bill in reference to district attorneys, yet I will accept it as an improvement upon past legislation and construction on that subject. I think it will answer in that respect, and I am willing to adopt it until experience shall dictate a further change. It is quite a reduction upon the items heretofore charged and allowed. I do not say allowed by law, but allowed by the certifying and taxing officers to the district attorneys in the northern and southern districts of New York.

In reference to clerks' fees as provided in this bill, I think they are much too high for those officers in the State of New York. Whilst I presume as applied to Vermont, New Hampshire, and Virginia, they are not too high. Nay, I doubt whether for those, and many other localities, they are high enough. That is my judgment—my opinion. In fact, I doubt whether the clerk of the district in which Vermont is included, or the clerk of the eastern district of Virginia, can get a living under this bill. I am informed, also, that such is the fact in reference to some of the other States and some of the interior districts.

The fees of clerks in this bill are nearly, if not quite, as high as they have been heretofore taxed and certified under the old bills, particularly in proceedings in admiralty; and I should say, when you take into consideration the pay per folio for entering orders, proceedings, decrees, and such like charges, and for copying them, that it would be in no way surprising if, in the aggregate, they were found to be higher than under the present mode, honestly followed. This makes the fees of clerks in my own State enormous, particularly in the district courts—less so, I think, in the circuit. Whilst I would be willing to give this enormous compensation to the clerks if they alone were concerned, I am not willing that the people of the State of New York, and those who live upon the borders of the great lakes in the northwest, should submit to bear these onerous burdens.

I do not propose to dwell upon this matter in its details, but I wish to call attention to the subject sufficiently to show, briefly, the practical effect of this bill in respect to this rate of clerks' fees in my own district. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee reporting this bill, [Mr. McLANAHAN,] has told us that it was intended by the committee not to reduce the present amount of fees, as a general thing, but to correct abuses. I think, as I have said, and the committee intended, that the bill does not reduce clerks' fees, but leaves them about where it found them.

Now, I will take a case in my own district, with all the facts of which I happen to be acquainted. The case was one in admiralty, and was against the propeller Ogoutz, which was owned, I believe, in some of the States bordering on Lake Erie, Huron, or Michigan; and it is not unlikely that some gentlemen on this floor, representing some part of that region, are familiar with its history. Stephen Dudley and others filed their libel against the Ogoutz in the district court of the northern district of New York, on a claim of $118 75. On filing the libel, a warrant of attachment or arrest was issued against the boat, and she was seized by the marshal at Buffalo. After her arrest, twenty-eight other persons, mostly mechanics, grocers, sailors upon the boat, butchers who had furnished her with meat, and bakers who had supplied her with bread, presented by petition their various claims to the court, and, to use a technical phrase, intervened for their interest against the boat—their claims varying in amount from about $15 up to about $500. The aggregate of these claims, as finally adjudged and decreed by the court, was $3,838 68. Now, sir, the clerks' fees upon those claims against the Ogoutz—that one case of arrest, and those twenty-eight cases of intervention—as taxed and certified by the proper officer, were $495 91; whilst the marshal's fees, also, as taxed and certified, for arresting and seizing that boat under the original warrant, and the fees which he received under the other claims that intervened, amounted to $659 81, to which add $214, certified by the taxing officer, for ship keeping and poundage, and you have the very respectable amount of $873 81.

This, sir, is an isolated case. I speak from the facts accurately collected and published, and have the statement made by one of the proctors before me. I do not wish to press it upon the House; but I submit to my friends here—gentlemen from Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin—all the States whose citizens have shipping interests upon the northwestern lakes—whether they think it is right, equitable, and fair, nay, whether it is endurable, that the vessels of their constituents afloat upon these great freshwater seas, bearing their property and products to a market in New York, shall, after being libeled and arrested there, be subjected to the payment of these enormous fees before they can be released? I can say to them that I think it is a great injustice, and operating very much to the detriment of trade and commerce. I, for one, am unwilling that the property of citizens of my district, or the State of New York, shall be subjected to like fees when it goes West, and is libeled in their ports. In this case I speak from the record, and am not mistaken.

Mr. FICKLIN. I desire to inquire of my friend from New York [Mr. HAVEN] how he proposes to remedy these heavy costs? He admits they are as onerous under the present law as they will be under this bill. How does he propose to diminish these costs?

Mr. HAVEN. I will answer here and now, leaving the subject I was pursuing. I see that it is the opinion of the Comptroller of the Treasury, and of the Secretary of the Interior, that the fees of clerks in criminal cases are not now too high. I propose to remedy it in this way, that the clerks' fees, in all criminal cases in New York, shall be as provided in this bill; and in civil cases in suits at law, in equity, and in admiralty, their fees shall be limited to half the amount fixed by the items in this bill. That will, in my judgment, pay a full and liberal compensation to the clerks, and it will be full as much as the business men of the country, engaged in commercial pursuits, will be willing to submit to. I propose this reduction only for my own State, but its benefits will be felt by all the northwestern States. These same charges without reduction, when you come to transfer them to Vermont, New Hampshire, or Virginia, will probably not be an adequate compensation to the officers, but they are enormous in New York. That is the remedy I propose, and I will offer an amendment to effect it, at a proper time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in regard to marshal's fees in the case of the Ogoutz, ill-fated as she was, in being captured and detained on a warrant of arrest, yet, let us turn her to advantage, by drawing lessons from her, in our pathway of legislation. There was in her case one warrant of arrest, and twenty-eight interventions. The House will see that interventions are expensive, when applied to vessels in admiralty and proceedings in rem, as well as when applied to national affairs, and in all cases are to be avoided if possible, and never to be entered upon without duly providing for the costs. The marshal's fees in the one case of arrest, and twenty-eight cases of intervention, as I stated before, amounted to $873 81, including ship-keeping and poundage.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. How does the marshal get his fees, in a case of intervention?

Mr. HAVEN. Any person having a claim against the owners of a vessel proceeded against in admiralty, if such claim be a maritime lien upon the vessel, can file his petition containing a statement of his claim, and the facts and circumstances which make it such a lien on the vessel, and praying that it be paid out of the proceeds of the vessel when sold by the marshal, or out of the remnants so called, if already sold, and the proceeds in court. On filing this petition, the judge directs a monition to be issued by the clerk; it is a notice to all the world that the vessel is seized, and is sent to the marshal for service, and he serves it by sticking it up on the mast of the vessel, and publishing a copy in the newspaper. Now, the marshal for serving the monition, it coming under the designation of a process of the court, in addition to his fees of service, gets travel fees from the place where the court is held, to the place of service, which, in the case of the Ogoutz, was over one hundred and fifty miles. The monition was sent him from Auburn to Buffalo, by mail, and returned in the same way, making his fees for service, travel, and return, on a monition at least $11 31, I believe, to which add the printer's fees, and you get the grand result. This was repeated twenty-eight times in the Ogoutz case, on that number of different claims.

I know, sir, it was and is the desire of the Committee on the Judiciary to have this matter righted so far as it is possible to right it, and preserve any of the features of this bill. I know that, as fair men, they would be unwilling to subject the business of our commercial men, not only of the Atlantic, the Pacific, and navigable rivers, but of the great western and northwestern lakes, to these enormous charges and fees, for such comparatively trifling services; and I trust they will yet see the impropriety of sacrificing these interests in commercial communities to any fallacious idea of general uniformity of fees throughout the entire country. We might as well insist upon a uniformity of climate, of products, of business, and of institutions, throughout the Republic, as upon a uniform scale of fees to business, so very unequal in amount and under such very different circumstances.

I do not know which is the very best mode of remedying these evils, and correcting marshals' fees; but it has occurred to me that, if we adhere to any portion of this bill, the interest of my own State—and I am now looking to that—would be best cared for by providing that the marshals of the two districts of New York shall have and receive the same fees and compensation as the sheriffs of counties in that State. Such a provision will reduce the aggregate of their compensation quite considerably, for there is no such thing as charges for several of these kinds of services under our sheriffs' fee bill; and whilst it will reduce them essentially, it will still give a full, fair, and sufficient remuneration to the marshal for all the services he may perform. His fees should be further restricted, so that, in no case, he should have fees for traveling over one hundred and twenty miles; that is, more than sixty miles going and sixty miles returning, for the service of any process. This is particularly necessary in our northern district, where our courts of admiralty are now held more than one hundred and fifty miles from the places where the great majority of arrests and seizures of vessels are made. Besides, the marshals usually have deputies within one hundred and twenty miles of each other throughout the districts, so that the geographical limits of their circuits would come together in most cases; hence I would restrict pay for travel to (say) sixty miles for going and sixty returning, and for seizing and arresting a vessel, or any property in rem, on a warrant of arrest, to the sum fixed by this bill.

Give us such a rate of fees and compensation to marshals in New York, and then if the bill is deemed reasonably unobjectionable by gentlemen from other States who are acquainted with its probable operation there, I shall take great pleasure in aiding in perfecting and passing it. Still, I imagine that neither the convention which framed the Constitution, nor the Congress which enacted the judiciary act, and the process act, so called, ever fancied that any attempt would be made to reduce this whole subject of fees and compensation, to a dead level throughout the Union. So far from foreseeing, or even fancying such a state of things, it seems to have been their great object to preserve perfect harmony and uniformity between the State courts and Federal courts. So that the Federal courts should operate for Federal purposes within each State upon a system hardly distinguishable from the State system. And as early as 1789 Congress enacted, that the forms of writs and executions, except their style, and modes of process, and rates of fees in the circuit courts and district courts, should be the same in each State respectively, as was then used or allowed in the supreme courts of such States. And the forms and modes of proceeding in causes in equity, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, should be according to the course of the civil law, and the rates of fee the same as then were, or were last before then allowed by the States respectively in the courts exercising supreme jurisdiction in such cases.

This was, in my opinion, wise legislation, and no person heard complaints whilst it remained a law. It was the subsequent attempts to change it for a more level rate of compensation, by providing in many instances a fixed rate of fees for some services, all over the Union, that opened the door to abuses and cupidity. I am impressed with the idea that it would be better to return now to the system of 1789.

The Legislatures of the several States know best what it is proper and expedient to pay officers for services performed in their own courts, and why should the business of the country in the same localities be subject to two different rules and modes of compensation, and to the fluctuating and sometimes conflicting dissension of two different law-making powers? State rights, and harmony, and uniformity are much more likely to be preserved under such a system than under conflicting systems proceeding from different sources.

I fear, as I before intimated, that this bill results from a fallacious idea that we can produce equality, by adding equally to subjects that are unequal before such additions are made.

So much in regard to district attorneys, clerks, and marshals' fees. A few words in reference to the fees of attorneys, solicitors, proctors, counselors, and advocates, who practice in the United States courts. In regard to this matter comparatively few persons out of the State of New York have any interest. And within that State it is a matter purely between these professional gentlemen and the parties litigant. I propose to apply the same rule precisely to them, in business performed in the Federal courts in that State, which is, by the laws of that State, applied to them in regard to business performed by them in the supreme court of that State. Under the laws which heretofore were in force in that State, their compensation would be quite as disproportioned to their services as the compensation of clerks and marshals would be under this bill; but the evil was felt by the people as their business and commercial relations and pursuits became more and more extended, and the Legislature has applied an effectual and very proper remedy. The laws of that State, of 1848, as subsequently amended, have abolished all fees to attorneys, solicitors, and counsel, and given to the prevailing party, by way of indemnity for his expenses out, a sum varying not essentially from the amounts given by this bill in civil cases to attorneys, solicitors, and proctors. I propose to amend this bill so as to give these same sums to the prevailing party, or to their solicitor, attorney, proctor, advocate, or counsellor, as the case may be, in all cases at law, in equity, or in admiralty, in the Federal courts held in New York.

There is an obvious and sufficient reason for this rule. It is applying the same rule and the same compensation in like cases to the entire business of the State, whether commercial or otherwise—the same rule precisely. It saves professional men from great perplexity and confusion, arising out of different and often conflicting rules and modes of compensation. I deem it wise, however, to make one exception to this rule. In cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, I propose that when the party libeling the property, or intervening with a claim, shall procure a judgment or decree for less than $150, no more than one half the sum given in the supreme court of the State to the prevailing party, by way of indemnity, shall be given in the Federal court to the "solicitor, proctor, or attorney." I propose to do this for this reason: While it will reduce the compensation much below what it is by this bill, and make it only half what it would be in the supreme court of New York, it will, at the same time, discourage the libeling of vessels, and, to some extent, prevent intervention for those small, unimportant, and insignificant sums or claims against men who are engaged in commercial business, and are almost invariably solvent, responsible, and respectable, and who are always ready to pay such debts. And when the property of such man is proceeded against, it is most generally by persons who set up larger claims than are due them, in the hope that their unjust exactions will be paid by the owner rather than have his vessel and property tied up in business season by process from the court of admiralty.

Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House further with regard to this bill at present. I have made this explanation with a view of bringing to the minds of gentlemen here the bearing of the propositions I have made in reference to amending this bill, by making New York an exception to a general rule that the bill is designed to establish. Whilst I think that this bill, in a modified state, or some other bill on this subject ought to pass—nay, sir, whilst I believe that legislation is imperatively necessary to correct the many and great abuses exposed by the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, and whilst I am willing to go almost any length with that committee, or any other gentlemen here, to perfect this bill or make a better in its stead, still the result of my careful examination and experience tells me that this bill as it is will be highly objectionable, and will very injuriously affect the interests of my own State. In most cases, except that of district attorneys, it increases the fees and compensation of the officer rather than decreases them; and I believe the House is satisfied that it ought to be made to operate directly the other way in that State.

Now, sir, not knowing what disposition the House may make of this matter—what snarl it may get into in the maneuverings of various gentlemen who may undertake to engineer this bill—I propose to offer the amendments which I have prepared, and to accomplish the purposes I have indicated, as an amendment to the last amendment offered by the Judiciary Committee, which I take to be in order;—is it not, sir?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has some doubt whether, strictly speaking, even that will be in order, the first amendment of the Committee being first in order, and that is amendable.

Mr. HOUSTON. Do I understand the Chair to say that that is amendable?

The SPEAKER. The first amendment proposed by the committee to the first section of the bill is the first to be considered by the House; but as the gentleman has indicated his purpose to offer it as an amendment to the last amendment proposed by the committee, the Chair will consider whether or not it is in order. The Chair doubts.

Mr. HAVEN. Under the circumstances, I dare not yield the floor unless I can get in my amendment; and if I cannot do it now, I shall feel it my duty, under the advice of those in whose judgment I have confidence, to move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Still, in doing so, I desire to say that I am as anxious as the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, or any member of this House, that this bill, and the whole subject with which it is connected, should be fully considered, and wisely disposed of by the House at an early day. I now move to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MEADE obtained the floor.

Mr. LETCHER. Will my colleague give way for a moment?

Mr. MEADE. I presume that on the motion made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] it will still be in order to discuss the merits of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. MEADE. If my friend desires the floor for the purpose of explanation, for a short time, I will yield it to him.

Mr. LETCHER. I desired, sir, to have said something upon the merits of this bill, but I shall not abuse the indulgence which my colleague has extended to me, by doing so at this time. I will therefore confine myself altogether to a defense of the two officers in my district, who have been very improperly arraigned before this House, and severely censured, by the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, not only in the report some time since presented, but also in his speech delivered on Thursday last.

In the report of the committee, and on the fourth and fifth pages thereof, six specifications of abuses will be found. The fifth specification is in the following words:

"5th. Proceedings for contempt of court, and for many other things, have been unnecessarily multiplied in some districts. There was in one district, at one time, no less than one hundred and twenty-two prosecutions pending for contempt of court, against seventeen persons, for non-attendance as witnesses; being thirteen prosecutions against each of six persons, and four prosecutions against each of the other eleven persons, and the whole costs thrown on the United States."

When this report was printed, understanding that this specification was intended for the benefit of the clerk and marshal of the western district of Virginia, both of whom are constituents of mine, I wrote to these gentlemen to ascertain what were the facts in the case referred to, and which were complained of in this specification, that I might lay them before the House, in order that their vindication from the assault, which had been made upon them, might have a place upon the records of Congress.

Subsequently, when the bill came up for consideration, the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in the course of his elaborate speech, referred to this specification of abuses, in these words:

"Allow me to call the attention of the House to some of the abuses in the 'Old Dominion.' An inquiry was made, under a resolution of this House in January last, directed to the Secretary of the Interior, 'What is the practice of issuing attachments for non-attendance of witnesses?' In the western district of Virginia you will find this state of things disclosed in the report of the First Comptroller: Proceedings for contempt of court have been unnecessarily multiplied, which is one of the causes of the increase of judicial expense. There were in the district, in the year 1849, at one time, no less than one hundred and twenty-two prosecutions for contempt of court against seventeen persons, for non-attendance as witnesses, being thirteen prosecutions against each of six persons, and four prosecutions against each of the others. The whole cost was thrown upon the Treasury of the United States. In the year 1850, the witnesses in Virginia seem to have been contumacious again, and you find eighty-three proceedings against fourteen witnesses in one case, in which the clerk's fees amounted to over $197, all of which was charged to the United States, besides the marshal's fees for serving process in each of these proceedings. I admit that it is sometimes necessary to issue attachments against witnesses for contempt to the process of the courts, but it cannot fail to strike any one as a most singular feature of the administration of the laws in this district, that the Government is so frequently called upon to pay the costs of these proceedings on attachments for contempt."

Now, sir, the facts of this case, so loudly complained of, are these; and they were known at the Comptroller's office when the information was furnished to the Judiciary Committee which forms the ground-work of this attack upon two of my constituents, both of whom are most estimable gentlemen: John D. Fenton was indicted in the western district of Virginia, for robbing the mail upon thirteen different occasions, and different witnesses were relied upon to establish his guilt in each instance. The offenses being thirteen in number, and committed at different times, as a matter of course thirteen indictments were found against him at the succeeding term of the court, upon the testimony of these witnesses. The charges were distinct, as if they had been made against thirteen different men. The witnesses were summoned in each case for the United States, and the defendant in his own behalf summoned his witnesses in each of the thirteen cases. A number of the witnesses failing to appear on both sides, the district attorney and the counsel for the defense, without consultation, or connivance with the clerk, or the marshal, but in the just and proper discharge of the duty they owed to the Government of the United States on the one hand, and the prisoner on the other, asked for rules against these absent witnesses to secure their attendance at the next term of the court, to render satisfactory excuses for their absence, or, failing to do this, subject themselves to the fine which might be assessed upon them. These rules were issued by the clerk in exact conformity with the rules of practice that prevail in our State courts, and they were served by the marshal just as the same process in the State courts would have been served by the sheriff of the county. These are the facts, and, when they are understood, I submit to the members of this House, whether any abuse has occurred, which can be justly censured? They have acted in strict accordance with the established rules of practice which prevail in our State courts, as every Virginia lawyer well knows. They have done only what was ordered by the court to be done in these cases, and if this had not been done, the witnesses could not be held to answer for their disregard of the process of the court. The clerk issued these rules, and the marshal executed them, as these officers were bound to do, and claimed their fees, as they had an undoubted right to do. Can it be pretended that they acted improperly? When the marshal sent on his account to the Comptroller's office, the charges for these services were in it, and explanations in regard to the items demanded. The attention of the marshal and clerk was thus directed to the matter, and they were informed that the accounts would not be passed upon until their explanation should be received. Upon this application the explanation was furnished, and that explanation was satisfactory. The accounts were allowed, and after this lapse of time, and under these circumstances, these officers are now held up before the country and grossly libeled. And in order to give point and force to the libel, a portion of those facts are furnished to the committee and to the country, while others material to their vindication are studiously concealed from the Judiciary Committee.

This is all I feel called upon to say. I have placed these gentlemen in a proper position before this House, and I think I have satisfied the members that they have done nothing wrong—nothing deserving of censure. If the Comptroller and his officers had furnished these facts, as they ought to have done, no such imputations would have been found in the report of the Committee, or in the speech of the able chairman, and I would have been relieved from the necessity of saying anything in vindication of these gentlemen on this occasion.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, (Mr. MEADE yielding the floor.) Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to say a few words? I shall not enter into a minute examination of the provisions of this bill. I propose to confine the few remarks I have to make to a general consideration in reference to the bearings of this bill upon civil suits—upon suits between citizen and citizen, and not where the United States is a party.

I have supposed, sir, that the evil which was to be remedied by the passage of a bill of this character, was confined to the officers of the United States, whose fees in some cases were charged to have been unreasonable, and large bills made out where there was great discretion given not only to the person claiming the fees, but also to the court who should determine what were allowable; and upon recurring to the President's message, in which this subject is brought to the distinct consideration of Congress, I find that the evil which was complained of exists in that quarter, and in that quarter only. If we will refer to it, we shall find that our attention was called to the want of a uniform fee bill, prescribing the compensation to be allowed to district attorneys, clerks, marshals, and commissioners. These are all United States officers, and the evil has been felt and known in its full extent in the administration of the Government through the Treasury Department; and the report which has come to us from the Secretary of the Interior, under whom these matters are placed for his consideration, shows us that the evil is confined to that quarter. Now, sir, when we look at this bill, we find that it not only assumes to provide for the regulation of fees and compensation for these officers of the Government, but also the fees and everything that appertains to the administration of justice between citizens in civil suits, so far as compensation or fees are concerned.

Now, sir, I object to the bill in this particular. If it was confined to a reform of the evil which has been complained of, and which I conceive is demonstrated by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the officers of our Government who have communicated the facts on this subject, to be a great and crying evil, and one that ought to be reformed, I should have no objection to the general principles on which it is founded. As to the details of the bill, so far as the fees of these public officers are concerned, I am not prepared to say but that they are proper. I have taken some pains, by communication with public men who are conversant with the duties of these officers, and with their compensation, in the State where I reside, to ascertain, by a distribution of the bill, which has been reported by the Judiciary Committee, and by correspondence with them, whether the fees as prescribed for these officers were proper and adequate, or whether they were too large, and I have heard no objection to them in the main. I believe they are satisfactory, so far as these officers are concerned. But there is an inherent difficulty in this matter which has been felt before in the legislation of this country. We find that soon after our Constitution was adopted, and the establishment of a judiciary system came up for the consideration of Congress, this very matter of the regulation of compensation in civil suits was the subject of very serious embarrassment. It was found so impracticable then so to frame a fee bill in reference to civil suits as to meet the wishes of all parts of the country, that it was abandoned; and gentlemen, by referring to the law of 1799 upon that subject, will see that the legislators of that day felt called upon to fall back upon the most rational ground that could be occupied upon this subject, and leave this matter where the people of the different States had left it. They were supposed to know better, from their own local usages, from their customs, from the manner of doing business in their courts, and from the modes which they had adopted for the enforcement of private rights and the repression of private wrongs, what rates of compensation should be given, and how the laws giving that compensation, in the shape of fees, or otherwise, should be carried out.

This arose, undoubtedly, from those institutions of a judicial character that were introduced into each State at its early settlement, peculiar to itself, peculiar to the inhabitants of the State. We know that in all the old States—and I believe it is no less true in regard to the new States that have since been admitted into the Union—each State has its own mode of procedure, from the commencement of a civil suit down to the enforcement of the collection of the amount of judgment, peculiar to itself.

In one State it is a very light matter to conduct a suit according to the rules of court and to the laws of the State prescribing the form of procedure, and but very little in the nature of practice is to be done; in another State the law prescribes a series of steps, a mode of procedure, before you can collect the simplest debt, every one of which must be followed in the progress of the suit. Again, in some States there are courts of equity; in others there are none, and equitable powers are exercised by courts of law. In some of these States there are proceedings peculiar to courts of equity, as, for instance, the examination of witnesses are not in open court, but are held before an officer, at his chambers, and all the various proceedings of the courts differ entirely from the proceedings in other States. Now, what I object to in this bill, is that no notice has been taken of these institutions, of these modes of procedure in judicial matters, institutions, and modes differing entirely in their character, and still in the main coeval with the very settlement of our States. A horizontal fee bill is here attempted to be established to graduate the pay of every man by one general rule.

Mr. MEADE. I must really interrupt the gentleman from New York, for the purpose of resuming the floor.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I owe an apology to the gentleman from Virginia for having occupied so much of his time. I should not have occupied a moment of it if this bill had been in committee, the place where measures of so much importance and detail are usually discussed. But as it is in a situation where the previous question may be sprung upon us at any time, I felt called upon to address a few remarks to the House.

Mr. MEADE. The gentleman will have to owe me two apologies if he goes on any longer. [A laugh.]

Mr. SEYMOUR. I have an amendment, which I wish to offer at the proper time, to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is it an amendment to the first amendment proposed by the committee?

Mr. SEYMOUR. I believe it is. It is to the first part of the bill.

Mr. MEADE. I cannot yield to the gentleman any longer.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield me the floor for one moment?

Mr. MEADE. I do not know for what object the gentleman desires it. If it is to make a short speech like that of the gentleman from New York, I cannot yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire only to make a suggestion.

Mr. MEADE. Well, I will yield for that purpose for a moment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise merely for the purpose of making a suggestion to the gentleman from Virginia and to the House. I am satisfied that this bill is imperfect, and that it is the opinion of the House generally that it should be amended. It is a very important bill, and I would suggest that, by unanimous consent, it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made the special order for one or two days, for the purpose of perfecting it, and of bringing to bear upon it the experience of all the States of this Union.

Now, with regard to my own State, I consider that portion of the bill which relates to the fees of attorneys, a premium for bringing suits in the United States courts, suing defendants out of their jurisdiction, taking them two or three hundred miles, and then taxing them with twenty dollars of fees, contrary to the whole policy of our State laws. I hope, therefore, that the suggestion I have thrown out will be concurred in, otherwise I for one shall be compelled to vote against this bill if I have no opportunity of offering the amendments which I desire to offer to it.

Mr. MEADE. I presume there is not a practicing attorney in this House who does not feel that a general bill of this kind is a most difficult one to prepare. Every man at all conversant with the practice of the courts must feel that the very best mode for the preparation of this bill would be a committee of three lawyers, well acquainted with the practice of the courts, quietly assembled around a board, and giving their minds exclusively to the various minutiae that come up for consideration. A bill of this sort cannot be wisely framed by a House of Representatives consisting of two hundred and thirty-three members, of all occupations and employments, some acquainted with the business and others entirely ignorant of it. I had rather take a bill, without looking into a single provision of it, framed by three lawyers acquainted with the practice of the courts, than one framed by this House after six months' deliberation; and there is not a lawyer in this House who will not subscribe to the opinion which I now express. It is not pretended by the Committee on the Judiciary that the bill which they have reported here is perfect. It will not be pretended that that committee, or any other committee, could possibly make a bill that would be perfect. The only way in which a proper and fair bill is to be constructed is, by first consulting and being controlled by past experience, and then watch its mode of operation; and as each difficulty may arise, and as each defect in the bill may be discovered, apply a legislative remedy to that particular defect.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BOWIE] seemed to have worked himself into a rage yesterday, because of the sweeping attack upon the courts and their officers. But while the gentleman made very loud complaints of this sweeping attack, made by the Judiciary Committee, I witnessed not a single effort on his part to contradict or to controvert a single position assumed in that report. If he made such an attempt, it did not arrest my attention. There are some five or six charges made by the committee in relation to the abuses in some instances, and the usages of the courts in others, and yet not a member of the House, who has spoken upon this subject, has, in the slightest degree, attacked the positions assumed by the committee.

Mr. BOWIE. I addressed my remarks to certain features of the bill, quoting them, and having them read to the House. The report accompanying the bill it has not been my good fortune to read. I consider the bill the material part of the report of the committee, and as embodying their views.

Mr. MEADE. Well, Mr. Speaker, the bill attempts to effect that which the whole Judiciary Committee was in favor of—that is, to make the practice of the courts and the fees of their officers uniform, as far as it was practicable; and the objection which was urged to this bill by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] is, in my opinion, its very best recommendation. I think that if this bill will, in future, have the effect of making more uniform, though to a limited extent, the practice of the various States, we shall, in that respect, have achieved an object worthy of the consideration of this House.

One of the greatest objections which can be urged against the present judiciary system of the United States grows out of the fact that there is such a variety in the practice and in the mode of charging fees in the several States. Now, sir, this bill does at least prescribe a uniform rule of charging. While the laws of the States and the practice under them are in some instances still made the rule, uniformity is only attempted where it is believed to be practicable. This bill does not in general reduce the fees of officers for actual services, but rather increases them, notwithstanding which, I believe its passage will have the effect to reduce the whole amount of the expenses of the judiciary from $550,000 to about $300,000; it will not be accomplished by paying any officer of the court less for services really performed, but by preventing the payment for constructive services, or for such as need not be performed. The instances brought to the attention of this committee by the intelligent and learned chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. McLANAHAN,] and those incorporated in the report from that committee, show to this House that these officers have in many instances taxed their ingenuity, not for the purpose of charging larger fees than the law allows, but for the purpose of devising multitudes of little motions and orders, altogether unnecessary, and conducing only to swell the compensation of officers, at the expense of suitors and the Government. In the prosecution of a single offense, (an attempt to destroy the vessel Franklin,)—in that one prosecution—for though there were two or three parties concerned, and six indictments found, I may call it a prosecution for a single crime—although it lasted for less than two months—only forty-three days, I believe—bills were charged to the amount of six thousand and odd dollars, for the services of a single officer, thus securing to himself in this short time almost an independent fortune. In view of these facts this House cannot fail to see the necessity for legislating speedily upon this subject.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how is it possible for this House to take up and consider this matter, in all of its minute details? How is it possible for those who have never looked into a fee book, and know little of legal proceedings, as is the case with a majority of the members of this House, how is it possible, I say, for them to determine the practicability, or the wisdom of the provisions of this bill? They must necessarily rely upon the opinions of those whose experience teaches them what is needed. They must necessarily trust it to a few, whose occupation in life makes them qualified judges of the whole subject, and who by themselves in committee, shall discuss every clause, and weigh the import of every word in it, taking care to anticipate and provide for every conceivable state of things. This cannot be done in a popular assembly, or a noisy House, like this.

A bill involving so many minute details must be thoroughly examined, and understood; its provisions should not be the sport of chance or caprice.

The report of the committee brings to light cases in which fees of $40 had been charged by a new district attorney, after the prisoner had been convicted, and nothing remained but to pronounce judgment. It would be a very difficult thing for a lawyer, who had never been a district attorney, to devise a fee bill of $40 against the Government, after trial and conviction; but such a bill has been produced, and I presume paid. I will state some of the items: Two retaining fees, $8 each; two motions for sentence, $3 each; motion to suspend sentence, $3; motion to extend recognizance, $3; motion to discharge debt on pardon, $3; motion to discharge recognizance, $3, &c. Such practices call loudly for legislative interposition—a remedy should be applied at once. You can do it only by detailing on that service the legal experience of the House.

These abuses existed not in 1800, when the expenses of the judiciary were but $42,000, nor in 1820, when they were but $100,000. They are to be credited to the progressiveness of the present age, embracing a period of twenty years, from 1831, when the expenses were only $200,000, to 1851, when they had swelled up to $565,000.

Mr. HOUSTON, (interrupting.) Has the morning hour not expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DANIEL. I rise for the purpose of submitting a motion which I have very often made here without any success. Yesterday, upon the representations of my friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. HOUSTON,]—that being objection day—I declined to submit the motion to go to the consideration of private business. I generally make it a rule to decline insisting upon that motion whenever I think the public interests imperiously demand the action of the House upon a particular bill. I was in hopes yesterday that the bill now under consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, would have been disposed of in the course of the day. It was not disposed of, however, and as the session is drawing to a close, and as there are some printed bills before the Committee of the Whole House, which, if not acted on by the House before the close of the session will involve much private suffering, I feel it my duty to now submit to the House that we proceed for this day to the consideration of private bills. I suppose the loss of this day will not make much difference with the appropriation bills. That kind of business can be transacted upon any day, while these private bills can only be considered upon Fridays and Saturdays. Feeling this to be my duty, therefore, I submit the motion, and the House can dispose of it as they choose.

STEAMBOAT DISASTERS.

Mr. KING, of New York. I have been requested to call the attention of the House to the appalling loss of life by the recent destruction of steamboats on the Mississippi and on the Hudson; and to present a petition in favor of the bill for the preservation of the lives of passengers on board steamboats, which has passed the Senate, and is now in committee in this House.

There being no objection, the petition was received, and on motion of Mr. K., referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was going to make some suggestions in relation to the importance of getting through with the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill as soon as possible; but the House understands it as well as I do. I ask that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. This being private bill day, the motion must first be put upon going into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The question was then put, and upon a division 60 rose in the affirmative.

Mr. FOWLER demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER and McMULLIN were appointed.

The question was again taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 71.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The question then recurred upon the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and being put, it was agreed to. So the rules were suspended.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATIONS.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Phelps in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 196, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1853, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on yesterday, it had reached the eight hundred and sixth line of the bill.

Mr. STANLY. I offer the following amendment to the bill:

To refund to the State of North Carolina the amount of money advanced and transportation furnished to volunteers from that State during the late war with Mexico, the sum of $9,382 53, with interest at the rate of six per centum per annum, from the first day of March, in the year 1847, until paid.

Mr. S. said: If the committee understand that amendment, after voting the amount which they did on yesterday to the State of Michigan, I do not think there would be a single member upon this floor who would oppose it. I hold in my hand the Congressional Globe of February 8, 1850. A bill to this amount passed the Senate during that session, but never reached the House. Mr. BORLAND, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate, reported the bill. I now propose to read from his remarks upon that occasion, which I adopt instead of my own. Mr. BORLAND said:

"I will state in a few words the grounds upon which the committee have reported this bill. This claim of the State of North Carolina arises under the act of Congress making provision for the payment of the expenses of the volunteer troops raised for the war in Mexico. The provisions of the act extended to the appropriations of money made by the States as well as individuals. The Military Committee believe that this claim properly comes under the provision of the act, and that it should have been paid under that construction of the law by the War Department. The Secretary of War, however, under the rules established by that Department, thinks the vouchers furnished by the State of North Carolina are not such as those rules require. Application is therefore made to Congress for a special act making this appropriation. The Secretary admits the charge to be a reasonable one, and only finds a difficulty in the manner in which the vouchers are prepared."

The War Department has not suspended or rejected the claim from any want of evidence that the money had been paid by the State. But the rules of the Department require that the vouchers presented should be the receipts of the soldiers and others, to whom the money was paid. Under the circumstances under which this money was paid, these vouchers were not obtained. The money was paid in North Carolina to the commanding officer of the regiment, and by him to the captains, and afterwards by them to the several companies. This evidence has been furnished to the Governor of the State of North Carolina, and he has made application for refunding the money paid—$9,000; a little more than $10 to each individual; which the Secretary of War says is a very moderate allowance."

Now, sir, that is the whole matter. The Secretary of War makes the regulations upon this subject according to the general act of Congress, which the gentleman from Tennessee referred to on yesterday. He decided that this case did not come within the regulations of the War Department. There is no doubt that the money should be paid. I hope the money will be refunded to all the States which have, like Michigan, advanced money for this purpose. I have adopted the language of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, and applied it to my own State. I hope the committee will see fit to adopt the amendment.

Mr. FAULKNER. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. STANLY. I hope the amendment, or rather this case, will be allowed to stand by itself.

Mr. HOUSTON. This matter I think may as well be understood by the committee first as last. I have no doubt—at least I presume that the claims of North Carolina are just as much entitled to go into this bill as the claims of Michigan; and the claims of all the other States, standing upon the same footing, might just as well be put into one amendment and inserted in this bill, as to be inserted upon separate amendments.

If you retain one of these cases in the bill—for instance that of Michigan—all the other States standing in the same condition ought to be inserted.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] that this amendment be inserted with a general clause added, to the effect that all other States standing upon the same footing shall come within the purview of that provision.

Mr. HOUSTON. That may as well be done, as it will save time, for all the States are in pretty much the same condition; and indeed the Secretary of War told me, in a conversation recently, that the principle involved here would let in all the States, including the war of 1812, and in every war from that time down to the present. The committee had, therefore, better consider the extent of this question before we act upon it. If we intend to provide for one State, let us provide for all, where the same principle is involved.

Mr. FAULKNER. What does the gentleman desire to have us understand by his remark, that the Secretary of War said that the principle involved here, if established, would let in all the States?

Mr. HOUSTON. I mean this: that if the principle be adopted of overruling the decisions of the War Department, in its exclusion of claims that do not come within the rules and regulations of the Department, all the States will be let in with their claims. That is what I mean. I understand the point to be involved in the claim of my friend from Michigan, [Mr. Stuart,] as well as in the claim of Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and almost every one of the States, to be this: The provisions of the law of 1848 require that the money and interest shall be refunded to the States, corporations, and individuals that made advances for raising and equipping troops for the Mexican war. The States have applied under that law to get the money, as also have corporations and individuals. The money has been refunded in all cases where the proof, required by the regulations of the Department, has been presented. The proof required by the Department is, that the evidence shall show not only that the money has gone out of the coffers of the Treasury into the hands of the State agent, but that it shall show that the money was actually applied to the purpose of raising and equipping troops for the Mexican war. The reason why the claims of the State of Michigan, of Alabama, and of all the other States, are not admitted, is, that they cannot show vouchers for the money expended, beyond the agent who received it from the State. In all these cases the States show that they placed money in the hands of A and B for the purpose of raising troops, but they do not trace it, by the proper evidence, under the regulation of the War Department, showing that it ever was applied to the services of the General Government, in raising and equipping troops. That is the difficulty in relation to the payment of all these claims, and the reason why they have not been heretofore paid. If we intend to overrule that action of the War Department, let us do it in regard to all the States standing upon the same footing.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] has stated this matter correctly, but I think where a State produces to the War Department a voucher—an honest, bona fide voucher—that establishes the fact of the advance of the money, that the War Department ought not to require anything further.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let me say to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Stephens,] that that is the precise point. The War Department takes this ground, that when a State hands over to A or B money to be appropriated in that way, that the State should adduce proof, of some sort at least, showing that A or B, the agent for the State for that purpose, applied it to the purposes for which it was advanced.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to make one inquiry of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. Did I understand the chairman to say, that he is willing to allow an amendment which shall include those States which have yet unsettled claims for moneys advanced for war purposes in the war of 1812?

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman misunderstands me, if he understood any such thing. I stated that the Secretary of War said, that the principle involved here, if established, would be the means of letting in all the States for such and similar claims for the war of 1812, and of every war since; and that to pay such claims would require a great deal of money.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. STANLEY, and it was agreed to.

Mr. COBB offered the following amendment:

And for the payment to the State of Alabama, for money advanced for transporting and subsisting troops during the Mexican war, $4,000, or so much as may be found necessary to pay the principal and interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the time of said advance until paid by the Government of the United States: Provided, Before payment, the amount claimed shall be certified to have been paid, or that it is still due by the Government to said State, which certificate shall be deemed sufficient testimony in the adjudication of such claim.

Mr. C. said: I shall occupy but a minute in explaining and advocating this amendment. The justice of the proposition is so apparent to every member of this committee, that I certainly would be trespassing upon their judgment, as well as their liberality and disposition to do right, if I were to consume their time in the advocacy of this claim.

It is well understood, that when General Taylor was in extreme peril in Mexico, a requisition was made upon the State of Alabama, as upon other States, for troops to relieve him from his perilous condition. Our citizens in Alabama, as in many other States, responded to the call instantaneously, and they marched from the northern part of the State, and from the extreme points of the State, to the city of Mobile, with the view of proceeding from that place to the seat of war.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb,] that he accept this modification to his amendment: "And that all other States under like circumstances, shall be put upon like footing."

Mr. COBB. I should have no particular objection to that; but this is a small matter, and we had better pass it, and let every State stand upon its own merits. I intend to vote for every one of these claims that are founded upon the same principle as that of the State of Alabama.

I was stating that, in the promptness with which the citizens of Alabama responded to that call, too many of them repaired to the place of rendezvous, and some of them were compelled to return home. Our State paid for the transportation of these troops. It is true that the Governor paid out the money rather loosely, without taking the proper vouchers; and by not being able to produce these vouchers, the Government refuses to pay the money advanced. The claim is admitted, and the Government is satisfied that it is just; but, upon the principle they have prescribed for the action of the Department, it cannot be paid through the Department. It is but about $4,000, and I hope the House will allow it to be paid. I have, in my amendment, required the Governor of Alabama, before this money shall be paid, to certify that it is due and unpaid; and if that does not guard the Government from wrong, I do not know what would.

Mr. MILLSON. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb,] as I was opposed to that offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. Stanley,] and to that introduced yesterday by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. Stuart,] I have no sort of objection to refunding to the States all that they may have properly paid or advanced for the prosecution of the Mexican war; but I do protest against the introduction of these contested cases into the general appropriation bill. A few days ago, this House, by an almost unanimous vote, determined to stop discussion in the Committee of the Whole upon the general appropriation bill, because they saw that the items of that bill were of such a character as to require no further consideration than they had already bestowed; and because—I speak at least for myself—they had no idea that propositions suggesting changes in the existing laws, and involving appropriations for debatable objects, would be entertained, when there could be no further consideration of them than that allowed in the short space of five minutes.

Now, sir, if these claims are just, they can, I presume, be allowed by the Department. If there be anything in the rules of the Department which forbids their allowance, and if there be any equitable considerations which make it proper to allow them, a joint resolution may be introduced authorizing a new mode of decision. But, sir, see the evil resulting from this practice of first terminating debate in the Committee of the Whole upon the bill under consideration, and then allowing the most important matters to be introduced by way of amendment. And, in this connection, I think it will be in order for me now to refer to what the committee has already done, for the purpose of exemplifying and illustrating the evils of this practice. A day or two ago a subject of much importance was brought forward by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Evans,] proposing additional restrictions upon our foreign trade, and on his motion the committee voted to impose new burdens upon this commerce, and that, too, when no discussion of this grave subject could be allowed, except that which could take place under the five minutes rule. Upon a subsequent day, a proposition was introduced by my colleague, [Mr. Bayly,] which, I humbly conceive, involved a serious reflection upon the Constitution itself, in proposing to sanction, in some sort, a practice which was so odious to the framers of the Constitution as to induce them to insert a clause in the Constitution prohibiting it, as far as they had authority to do so, on the part of any of our public functionaries; and no discussion could take place upon that subject, except that brief and unsatisfactory discussion which five minutes would allow.

Now, sir, I am no way opposed to the payment of the just demands of those States, if properly brought forward. I vote against them here upon principle, as I voted against the amendment proposed yesterday, for paying to Virginia the amount claimed to be due to her. If these States have a just claim upon the Government, and are entitled to demand the interest upon it, they cannot suffer by a little delay; and these delays are necessary to enable the House to consider calmly and maturely the propriety of making the allowance.

For these reasons, among many others that I have not time to state, I trust that not only the proposition now pending, but all amendments, proposing changes in the general laws, and making innovations upon our established course of legislation, will be voted down by the committee.

Mr. HIBBARD. I rise to a question of order which will apply to this and to all similar amendments which shall be hereafter offered, and I understand there are to be several. The amendment is not in order, because it is for an appropriation not heretofore authorized by any law.

The CHAIRMAN. In reply to the gentleman, the Chair will state that that same point was raised yesterday on an amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. Stuart,] The Chair then decided that the joint resolution of 1846 and the act of 1848, authorized the reimbursement to States, corporations, and individuals, of money advanced and expended in supporting volunteers called into service during the Mexican war. The Chair makes the same decision now, and therefore overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. HIBBARD. I move pro forma the reduction of the appropriation proposed by the amendment, one dollar. It strikes me that this amendment is altogether out of place at this time as an amendment to this bill. I will not proceed to argue the question of order, because I understand now what I did not when the question was raised, that it was settled upon yesterday. The proper business of appropriation bills is to appropriate moneys for the expenses of the Government—to provide for the payment of sums authorized by law. When specific claims of this description are offered as amendments, I understand it is not usual, nor proper, for them to be added to the appropriation bills, unless they have been adjudicated and settled as due by the Department. It is not the province of an appropriation bill to allow a claim where there is question as to its justice. It ought not to be appropriated if such a question be pending. It is then a matter for the consideration of the Committee on Claims, or of some other appropriate committee. This is a claim, not of an individual, but of a State against the Government. Whether or not it be due is a question, and this is not the time nor occasion for the settlement of that question. It may and it may not be due, and the claim should be referred to the Committee on Claims, or some other appropriate tribunal. There has been no adjudication at the Department upon it.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut. I wish to say to the gentleman that this subject has been before the Committee on Claims, and they are now prepared to report adversely upon it.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 10, 1852.

NEW SERIES...No. 134.

Mr. HIBBARD. The gentleman says that this claim has been before the Committee on Claims, and that they have agreed to report adversely to it. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion, for it bears at once upon the merits of the case, and illustrates the impropriety of passing it in this form. I understand a class of claims embracing and standing upon the same merits as this—upon the same propriety and same law—

A MEMBER. Not this one.

Mr. HIBBARD. I understand it is not contradicted that this or a similar claim has been rejected by the committee. Sir, it shows the impropriety of this mode of procedure, as a matter of order, and it bears upon the question of the merits of the claim. This is no place to pass upon such questions. I know nothing of the action of the committee on claims, except what the gentleman from Connecticut has said, and I do not understand that to be contradicted. Rejected after examination before the appropriate committee, it is now sought to be tacked on as a rider here. This mode of proceeding is all wrong. Pass this amendment, allow this claim, and by the same rule you will add to this bill every claim of every State, and every individual, now pending before Congress. We will consume the remainder of the session in unfinished action upon this single bill. I invoke the friends of the bill, and the committee generally, if they would ever finish the work in hand, to discourage amendments of this description.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I rise to oppose the amendment, with a view to reply to my colleague who spoke in favor of the principle contained in it. He took occasion to say, in condemning hasty legislation, that I, on yesterday, had offered an amendment to the bill, which was in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MILLSON. I did not say the gentleman offered an amendment which was in conflict with the Constitution. I said that the principle of that amendment involved a serious reflection upon the Constitution.

Mr. BAYLY. Very well. The gentleman said that it involved a reflection upon the Constitution. What was it? It was a proposition to include in an amendment which was carried, and which I afterwards, when I found it was objected to, offered to strike out, $150 to the minister for a snuff-box and watch he had given to a dragoman of the Sublime Porte. The only clause of the Constitution bearing upon that is this:

"No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign State."

This clause prohibits the taking, and not the giving of a present, &c., from any king, prince, or foreign State. I suppose that my colleague means to insist, that the converse of the proposition was true, and that it prohibits the giving of any present, &c.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under the necessity of reminding the gentleman that he does not see the relevancy of the remarks the gentleman is now submitting, to the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire, which proposes to reimburse the States for moneys they have expended in raising volunteers for the Mexican war.

Mr. BAYLY. It was precisely upon that proposition my colleague has indulged in a reflection, as I regard it, upon me, as one of the organs of this House; and I should like to know by what rule the Chair can indulge remarks in favor of the amendment, and will not indulge others in reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the gentleman to order. The Chair has no recollection of the remarks to which the gentleman alludes, as having been made by his colleague. He did not hear them.

Mr. BAYLY. As my colleague has been indulged in making reference to me, by every rule of parliamentary law I have a right to reply to his remarks.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

My colleague says that the proposition was a reflection upon the Constitution. The Constitution says that no public functionary shall receive a present from a foreign potentate without the consent of Congress. It does not say that our Ministers cannot comply with the usages at other courts; and I say here, the usage of this Government has been, from its foundation, to comply with the usages of courts in making presents. Will my colleague say that forbidding to take presents is implicitly a prohibition to give them? Why, sir, the Constitution does not even prohibit the reception of presents. It only prohibits the officer from appropriating them to his own use; and when they are offered, they are always received, and are either deposited in the Patent Office or sold, and the proceeds go into the public Treasury. Now, what becomes of my colleague's point?

Mr. MILLSON. With my colleague's permission, I do not see why, when I made general remarks in reference to a bill before Congress, my colleague should suppose those remarks to intimate a reflection upon him as one of the organs of the House. I was expressing an independent opinion as an independent legislator.

Mr. BAYLY. Did not my colleague state that I had introduced a proposition reflecting upon the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. MILLSON. This practice of giving and receiving presents by diplomatic agents abroad, existed at the time of the formation of our Constitution, as it does now; and because it existed then, and because the framers of the Constitution regarded it as a serious abuse they expressly prohibited any one of our agents from receiving a present from any foreign potentate. In the condemnation of the principle, so far as the reception of these presents is concerned, they unquestionably meant to imply a condemnation of a similar practice by agents of other Governments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, before putting the question, that in this peculiar case he has indulged remarks which he deems not in order. Hereafter he would beg gentlemen to confine themselves to the proposition under consideration. Unless they do, he shall feel bound to enforce the rules of order.

Mr. HIBBARD, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut. I move to reduce the appropriation one dollar.

I do so to say a word to prevent misapprehension of my remark while the gentleman from New Hampshire was on the floor. I noticed at the time that he misunderstood me. This subject was submitted to the Committee on Claims. A much larger amount was then asked for. The committee were prepared to report adversely to the application, on the ground that the law made ample provision for all such cases. The petition was thereupon withdrawn, and on application to the proper Department, a great part of the claim was allowed and paid. As to this residue, I know nothing in particular about it; but I am opposed to this loose mode of bringing in and adjudicating on these claims. If the law already provided is not ample, or if there are defects in its administration, it is easy to apply to Congress by a proper memorial, and let the matter be investigated by the appropriate committee. It seems to me the general appropriation bill is no proper place for their consideration. On this ground I have voted against all the applications of this nature, and shall continue so to vote.

Mr. FAULKNER. I submit the following amendment:

For refunding to the State of Virginia the amount of money advanced by said State, under the act of her General Assembly of the 10th day of August, 1849, in organizing, subsisting, and transporting the Virginia regiment of volunteers for the Mexican war previous to its being mustered into the service of the United States, together with interest on said sum, at six per cent. per annum, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the same.

Mr. F. said: The claim of Virginia for advances to her regiment of volunteers yet remaining unpaid by the Federal Government, amounts to $3,734 85, with interest. This sum, as appears by the certificates of the Auditor and Treasurer, was paid to the officers and soldiers of that regiment in pursuance of an act of the General Assembly of that State, passed on the 10th of March, 1849. The claim was laid before the Secretary of War by the agent of Virginia, and rejected by him, because he did not think it was embraced within the provisions of the joint resolutions of the 3d of March, 1847, and the 2d of June, 1848. A memorial was then laid before Congress, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. As the organ of that committee, I have presented a report to this House, which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed, differing from the Secretary of War in his construction of these laws, and expressing the opinion that the claim of Virginia is within the provisions of existing laws, and should be settled at the War Department. Here, sir, I should have been content to leave this matter. But the Committee of the Whole having on yesterday recognized as proper to be placed in the general appropriation bill a similar claim for the State of Michigan, and this morning one of like character from the State of North Carolina, I feel justified and required, notwithstanding the protest of my colleague [Mr. MILLSON] against this mode of legislation, to urge upon the committee the claim of Virginia. Our demand is a just one, and amply sustained by evidence. I have before me an authenticated copy of the law of the State authorizing the payment, and the certificates of the Auditor and Treasurer proving the fact of disbursement. Narrow technical objections ought not to be urged against such demands, coming from one of the States of this Union. They are the most competent judges of the expenditures necessary for the full equipment and organization of their volunteer regiments. They are best informed of the difficulties to be overcome, and the means proper to overcome them. It cannot and ought not to be presumed for a moment, that they would push these expenditures beyond the necessities of the case.

The joint resolutions of 1847 and 1848 had their origin in a wise and patriotic policy. Congress meant to refund to all States, corporations, and individuals, the advances in good faith made by them to the volunteers engaged in the Mexican war. The Constitution contemplates the burden of every war to fall upon the General Government, and wherever individuals or States, and particularly States, in the exigency of the moment, step in and make advances which should come from the general fisc, they should be refunded without that rigid examination into the expenditure which some gentlemen now contend for. I had no inconsiderable agency myself in aiding to raise the regiment contributed by Virginia for the Mexican war, and I know something personally of what I am speaking about. It was raised at a most inclement season of the year, and under circumstances of peculiar difficulty and discouragement, and whilst I concede that the State of Virginia has been just and liberal to her volunteers, she was not more so than sound policy and the occasion required. The Secretary of War—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAVEN. I am opposed to this amendment. The statute which was read yesterday by my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. GENTRY], provides that all claims of this kind shall be paid upon proof being made, which shall be satisfactory to the Secretary of War. These gentlemen here tell us that they have made proof, as they claim, before the Secretary of War. If they have the proof, they can get their pay. If they have not got it, then I deny that they have any claim. What is a claim good for without proof? And how do we know it is valid without proof? I would like to inquire whether this committee intend to pass these claims without proof? They have made their proof, they say, such as it is, before the Secretary of War, but they have not brought that proof before this committee. Why should this committee allow these claims without proof, when the Secretary of War will not allow them with proof of the imperfect and inconclusive kind they have furnished? If anything is to be done by this committee on the subject without proof or investigation, we had better at once provide that upon any member saying his State has a claim, of which he knows nothing, and of which no proof can be made, that claim shall be deemed sufficiently established, and shall be paid.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] permit me to remind him, that the Secretary of War, in reply to a letter addressed to him by a member of the Military Committee, placed his objection to the allowance of this claim, not upon the ground of want of evidence, for that was ample and satisfactory, but upon the ground that the existing law did not, according to his construction of it, justify his making the payment? There is no justice or propriety in recognizing the claim of one State, and rejecting that of another, resting precisely upon the same grounds. I am content to leave the whole subject to the War Department, or to pass an amendatory resolution, if that be deemed advisable. But if one State is provided for in the general appropriation bill, all having like claims should be placed upon an equal footing.

The question was then taken on Mr. FAULKNER's amendment, and rejected.

Mr. SACKETT. I move to amend the amendment by inserting $2,000 in the place of $4,000. I do it for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the law which has been referred to heretofore, and for the purpose of showing that, if we are to pass anything, we should make the sum as low as possible. The law referred to is the law of the 2d of June, 1848, and I wish to refer to a provision of that law. The law upon the subject of proofs is this: "That proof shall be made, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, of the amount thus expended, and that the same was necessary and proper for the troops aforesaid."

By this amendment, and by any of this class of amendments, we assume, if we pass them into a law, the payment of all the money paid by the States, though put into the hands of their own agents in form, for the support, subsistence, or transportation of troops, although it may have been all squandered, and none applied in accordance with the provisions of this law, and although not one farthing of the money has ever been made available to the United States, as is required by the original act under which these claims arise. If this be so, it is manifestly improper to pass any such amendment as will, by its own operation, relieve the States from supplying proofs of the due application of the money appropriated by them in accordance with the provision of the law on which the claim is based. Some portion of this money may have been properly applied; other portions of it may not have been properly applied. Some portion of it the United States ought to pay; other portions of it the United States, perhaps, ought not to pay. The provision of the law expressly declares that this money is to be applied to the support of troops, &c. If the State agents have misapplied the funds put into their hands, there is no provision of the law of 1848 making it obligatory upon the United States to pay it, and they ought not to pay it; because the States should be responsible for the action of their own agents. Gentlemen must see the impropriety of passing these amendments without an investigation before a committee, as to what has been paid by the States in pursuance of the regulations of the United States. If the United States ought to pay them, we ought to ascertain first what the amount is, what is properly due, and what not. This House knows nothing about the propriety of the amendment, and if we pass these amendments we assume, as facts and legal, all they state, and that we ought to pay the money, whether due according to law or justice, or not.

Mr. SACKETT. With the consent of the committee I will withdraw my amendment.

There being no objection, the amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following amendment:

For refunding to the county of Berks, in the State of Pennsylvania, and to the city of Reading, in said county, the amount of money advanced by said county and said city, in organizing, subsisting, equipping, and transporting volunteers, previous to their being mustered into the service of the United States during the war with Mexico, together with the interest on such sum at six per cent. per annum, $2,500; which said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay and cancel the claims of said county and said city, as presented, and now on file in the War Department, with interest as aforesaid, from the time said advance was made, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the municipal authorities of said county and said city.

Mr. Chairman, the claim here presented is one from the county of Berks and city of Reading, in the State of Pennsylvania, for money advanced for the subsistence, equipment, and transportation of volunteers for the Mexican war.

In 1847, a joint resolution was passed by Congress upon this subject, which provides for the refunding of money advanced by States, or their agents; but this resolution, which has been referred to by several gentlemen who have addressed the committee, does not extend to counties or cities; under that resolution no relief can be given to Berks county or the city of Reading. Now, the State of Pennsylvania, whose patriotism no one will question, in peace or in war, made no provision for the equipment, subsistence, or transportation of the volunteers from Berks county; and, consequently, has made no claim on the General Government, and never will, for the money expended for that purpose. This matter, at least so far as we were concerned, was left entirely to the counties, or to the friends of the volunteers.

The county of Berks, which has always been famous for her patriotism, and has been fully represented in every war in which the country has been engaged, from the Revolution down to the Mexican war, offered three companies in about ten days' notice of the requisition of the Governor of Pennsylvania. In order, however, to make a fair distribution of the forces required through the State, he was enabled to accept of but one of our companies. A meeting of the citizens of Reading and of the county of Berks was called for the purpose of providing for these volunteers. Among other things, it was ascertained that the United States Government would not muster them into the service except at Pittsburg, a distance of three hundred and eighty miles, and until mustered into said service, no provision of course would be made by the United States Government for their subsistence, &c.

The men who offered themselves were the brave and hardy sons of the county, who were willing to risk their lives for the honor of their country; but they had no money to expend, even for their own subsistence. To supply their necessities, the meeting recommended an advance of $1,000 from the city of Reading, and $1,000 from the county treasury. They appointed a committee of five, of which I was one, to disburse the money, and to call upon the General Government for its reimbursement.

This money, sir, was chiefly expended in equipping, subsisting, and transporting these volunteers. A regular account was made out and audited, showing the mode and manner in which the money was expended; and the account has been approved by the municipal authorities of Reading and of Berks, and I have the vouchers here, duly certified, so as to satisfy any gentleman of the truth of the facts here alleged. Now, sir, not one dollar of this money has ever been refunded to this day. The case has been submitted long since to the Secretary of War; but, with the exception of a small sum for traveling expenses, &c., he declines to pass the account, for want of sufficient legal authority. It has been submitted to the Committee on Claims of this House, and the fact of the expenditure for the purposes designated proved beyond a doubt; but there is no earthly hope of that committee being able to make a report on it of any kind for want of time; so that this process amounts to a denial of justice. I wish to say to the gentleman from Virginia, who has just addressed the committee, [Mr. MILLSON,] that his approval of the payment of these claims, but insisting on their passing through the Committee on Claims, and then coming up before the two Houses of Congress on the Private Calendar, is almost tantamount to a refusal. My constituents know they have paid $2,000 for the use of the volunteers in the Mexican war—a war declared by this Government—and that, after a lapse of six years, this Government has not refunded one dollar of it. They do not inquire into the mode in which Congress does its business; they look to the result.

There can be no dispute about the correctness of the vouchers. The claim cannot be paid under the joint resolution of 1847, and I know of no other mode than that of a direct appropriation by Congress. It is for this reason that I have moved this amendment to the civil and diplomatic bill, and hope it may prevail. Sir, it is impossible that I should discuss the question of a citizen-soldier in a five minutes speech; but I will merely remark, that, while the patriotism of our citizens is unbounded, and the hardy sons of this glorious country stand ready at her call, it is rather humiliating to see the Government reluctantly doling out of a plethoric Treasury the little pittance required for their subsistence, equipment, and transportation.

Mr. GORMAN. I am opposed to this amendment, and if any gentleman upon this floor can get up here and make out a case, by showing how money can get out of the Treasury of his county without the treasurer or auditor having vouchers as to where it went, he can do something that I never heard of before. Why, sir, the State of Indiana raised nearly six thousand men for that war, and one State has received $20,000 for raising a single regiment, while all the six regiments from the State of Indiana have not cost the Government to the amount of $12,000.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to say, that we are ready to show vouchers for the distribution of every dollar of this money.

Mr. GORMAN. If the gentleman is ready to show vouchers for the payment of this money, all he has got to do is to go to the Treasury Department, and those vouchers will be allowed. There is a law saying, that wherever money has been appropriated for the payment of troops mustered into service, upon producing vouchers that the money has been paid, and that it was necessary, it shall be refunded. Indeed, they have been very lax on the question of necessity. Claims have been allowed by this Government, even in cases where free, voluntary barbecues have been given to companies as a compliment to the soldiers.

Now, if a dollar has gone out of the treasury of any State of this Union, the auditor or treasurer of that State must know where it went, and if he has not got the vouchers he cannot account for it to his own State. We have passed a law saying, that upon presentation of the vouchers of the treasurer of any State, money which has been paid out on account of this war, shall be refunded, and twenty times over has the question been coming up in the Treasury Department, whether the officers shall give additional latitude in these payments. Our Government, on account of this Mexican war, in regard to forty things I could name, has been leech and bled, and is being leech and bled day after day, by unjust, unholy, and iniquitous claims.

Sir, I have had presented to me for consideration in the Committee on Military Affairs, claims from my own State; I have made inquiries how money could get out of the treasury of the State without a voucher, and I find that it cannot. It could not get out of the treasury of the gentleman's county without vouchers. Your auditor must have vouchers, or he could not settle his accounts. If he has vouchers, and can settle his own accounts, then he can get the claim before this Government. Our law is broad enough and comprehensive enough, and all that is necessary is to produce your vouchers.

The question being upon the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania,

Mr. JONES called for tellers; but they were not ordered.

And the question being put upon the amendment to the amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. NABERS offered the following as an amendment to the amendment:

For refunding the amount of money expended by the late Governor of Mississippi in calling out volunteers for the Mexican war, under the President's requisition, one thousand dollars, together with six per cent interest on that sum: Provided, Sufficient evidence is presented to satisfy the Secretary of War that the money was actually expended in the service of the United States.

Mr. N. said: Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy the five minutes allotted to me under the rule, in explaining the reasons why I have offered that amendment. But I wish, in the first place, to vindicate myself in offering this amendment, from the charge made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] that we would bleed the Treasury, and from the charge of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MYLSON,] that we would reflect upon the Constitution. Sir, I would not myself do either the one or the other; and why, let me ask, do not gentlemen, in looking at the Constitution, look at the whole document?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi must confine his remarks to the subject-matter of his amendment.

Mr. NABERS. Well, sir, I was just going to say that there is a clause in the Constitution which gives this Congress power to pay the debts of the United States. If gentlemen will look to the beginning of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, they will find that power is there given to us to pay the debts of the United States. Well, sir, the United States owes the State of Mississippi $1,000, or about that sum. I find that some gentlemen around me are disposed to controvert the orthodoxy of my constitutional argument, and I will therefore quote the paragraph of the Constitution on which I rely. It is in these words:

"Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

Well, sir, let me explain that the money expended by the State of Mississippi during the Mexican war was expended during the administration of one of my colleagues, now a member upon this floor. But it may be asked, why has not the entire amount been refunded to us? Simply because the rules and regulations of the Department construed the law to death under which we were entitled to this payment. [Laughter.] They construed the life out of the law, so that we were unable to get it. We simply ask in this amendment that if we can prove—as we can do—that this money was actually expended during the Mexican war, and expended for the benefit of the United States, then they shall pay it back; and sir, as a Representative of Mississippi upon this floor, I should scorn to receive it unless we could demonstrate beyond a shadow of doubt that we had expended the money as we say we have. I will not promise to produce a receipt for every pound of beef, and every blanket, and every article of that sort that was furnished to our volunteers, for it is often the case that conclusive proof upon these subjects is beyond our reach.

I will not detain the committee longer. I ask that a vote may be taken upon my amendment. I know that the money has been expended by the State of Mississippi, and that it has been expended for the benefit of the United States. I assure every member of this committee that such is the fact. It is for them to say whether the money shall be refunded to us.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the gentleman from Mississippi desires to reenact the law precisely as it stands. I understand that he wants the Government of the United States to pay to the State of Mississippi what that State has expended for the benefit of the United States, and six per cent. interest, provided they will prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that it has been expended for that purpose. That is the precise language of the law as it now stands. I will read it:

"Provided, however, That proof shall be made to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War of the amount thus expended, and that the same was necessary and proper for the troops aforesaid."

But I am not opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi any more than I am the whole principle. While I might be willing to vote for a modification of the law upon this subject, if it were put in a shape in which it could be discussed and examined into, I do protest against putting it into an appropriation bill, where, of all other places in the world, it has the least business, and into which it is with the least propriety attempted to be put. For what have we just appropriated money? Why, to pay to Michigan and North Carolina certain claims, when there is a law already in existence making appropriation for the payment of such claims. The law itself makes a permanent and existing appropriation for every claim of this sort that is allowed by the Department, and the object of this legislation is not to make an appropriation, and therefore it has no business in this appropriation bill. The second section of the law says:

"And that an amount sufficient to refund said expenses so incurred be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Gentlemen are not seeking an appropriation of money at all. They are seeking to get claims passed through the War Department which do not come up to the proof required by law and by the regulations of the Department. The law says that the Secretary of War shall be satisfied that this money was expended for organizing, subsisting, or transporting troops. Gentlemen come forward with claims for money which was not so expended, and ask the Secretary of War to pay them, and because he will not do it, we are applied to to allow the claims without one particle of information, and in opposition to the law and to the regulations of the War Department. By your action here to-day and yesterday you are taking away every restriction that was put upon these settlements by the War Department.

But, sir, there is another thing to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. These amendments all say that interest of six per cent. shall be paid upon these claims. Now, that is more than has been done for other States whose claims have been allowed. The law says that where the State, corporation, or individual, advancing the money, has been receiving interest on that money, and has lost the interest by advancing it, in that case interest shall be paid. But here, irrespective of the principle which has controlled other States, and without regard to whether interest has been lost or not, you say that interest shall be paid at the rate of six per cent., when, in truth, the principle of the law upon which this proceeding is founded, is entirely different from that.

But the great question, Mr. Chairman, is this: has this money been applied properly, or has it been misapplied? The Secretary of War is required to pay the claim if you satisfy him that the money has been expended in organizing, subsisting, or transporting troops; but not, if he is satisfied that it has been expended in parade and show, and has been wasted. Now, by these amendments you are destroying the restrictions which have been thrown around the action of the War Department.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question then recurred upon Mr. COBB's amendment.

Mr. COBB. I hope the committee will let Alabama have this small appropriation.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ORR. I now propose to offer a similar amendment, though I hope it will meet with a better fate. I offer the following:

To refund to the State of South Carolina the amount of money advanced, and transportation furnished, to volunteers from that State during the late war with Mexico, the sum of $30,000, with interest at the rate of six per centum per annum, from the first day of March, 1847, until paid.

This amendment is in the exact phraseology of the amendment offered a few minutes ago by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] which was adopted by the committee. The money provided for in my amendment was expended by the State of South Carolina in fitting out the Palmetto regiment for the Mexican war. The difficulty, so far as the vouchers for that regiment are concerned, grows out of the fact that the colonel of the regiment, and lieutenant colonel, both fell at the battle of Cherubusco. But, independent of that, after having passed the amendments to refund the money so expended by the States of Michigan and North Carolina, as a matter of justice, I suppose the committee would hardly hesitate to pass the amendment I have offered for the State of South Carolina.

One word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] as to the inexpediency and impropriety of these appropriations by the General Government, to pay appropriations made by the States. I beg that gentleman to remember, that these appropriations, asked to be made here, are for the several States of this Union which made advances; and I ask that gentleman, or any other gentleman, if he supposes the constituted authorities of any State of this Union would come to the Treasury of the United States, and perpetrate a fraud upon it, for the purpose of obtaining such a sum as that from its coffers? I suspect not. It is not like an appropriation to a private individual, upon the faith of a private individual, where fraud may be committed. The claims are from sovereign States of this Union. They are for money expended in fitting out troops, and preparing them for the field, in order to meet promptly the call made by the General Government for those troops. I say it is just and fair; that the money, thus expended, should be refunded by the General Government. Is it right, that you should refuse to refund the money thus appropriated by the several States, in this manner, because, perchance, those States may not have saved the vouchers, which the Secretary of War has required to be produced before the claims shall be paid? Is that just? Is it right? Is it proper?

But some of the States have expended much more money than others. That is to be expected. It is nothing more than would necessarily happen from the circumstances of the case. Some States might raise a regiment for $5,000, while it would cost another $10,000. In the hurry of the moment, when the whole country was in a fever of excitement—when it was of the utmost importance that the troops should be at the seat of war at the earliest possible moment—many of the States lavished out money with a liberal hand to their troops; and because they have done so—because they acted with alacrity in the defense of the country, in order that the troops might be sent in time to protect the country effectually—is that to be used as an argument why they should be compelled to pay the money thus expended themselves? Is it to be said to us, "You have thrown away recklessly and profligately this money, and therefore we will not pay it?" I hope the committee will adopt this amendment.

Mr. DUNHAM. It is no doubt true that the money now asked for by the States to be refunded them was paid out by those States; but I desire to know if it was understood by those States, when the money was paid out, that it would ever be refunded to them by the United States Government? Much of this money has been paid out by officers who may have preferred claims against the different States for the money they had expended in raising the troops. They might have urged in defense of their claims, that the money would be repaid by the Government of the United States. But I have no idea that these claims were allowed by the States with the expectation that the money was to come from the General Government. I have no idea that the legislators of those States ever entertained such a belief for a single moment.

Mr. ORR. I wish to say that the objection the gentleman from Indiana makes, that this money was paid out by the officers in raising troops who have come afterwards with claims to the different States, does not apply to my State, or to my amendment. The sum of $20,000 was appropriated directly by my State for this object, and not to pay the claims of speculators.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Has the State of South Carolina ever asked that this money should be refunded, or did she expect it at the time she appropriated it?

Mr. ORR. I do not know whether the State of South Carolina ever asked that this money should be refunded her or not, but, as a Representative from that State, I ask that it shall be done. If that State has not come here at your doors with petitions, is that a reason why she should not have justice done her? Is that to be the argument of the gentleman why the amendment should not be adopted?

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire, with the consent of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] who still holds the floor, to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] one question. Did not at least a large part of the money which was appropriated at this time by the State of South Carolina go to the troops themselves? Was it not distributed amongst the regiment for the personal comfort of the troops?

Mr. ORR. When that money was voted, it was not, as I understand, to be divided amongst the troops at all. It was for the comfort of the soldiers of the regiment.

Mr. DUNHAM. There was another matter for which this money was expended. We all know that there was a spirit of rivalry through the States for a prompt compliance with the requisitions of the Government. It was a praiseworthy feeling; but at the time when these appropriations were made by the different State authorities, they were made for the purpose of encouraging this spirit of rivalry, and for the purpose of getting a proper quota of troops into the field as soon as possible; but it was never expected, when the money was advanced by the State authorities, that the General Government would pay it back again. It is very evident that they had no such expectation, from the fact that they never even took vouchers from the individuals to whom the money was advanced. I think the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina should not be adopted.

The question now being upon Mr. Orr's amendment, the House was divided, and 27 rose in the affirmative.

Mr. ORR demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. MILLSON and LANDRY were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 78.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE offered the following amendment:

To carry into effect the act approved September 28, 1850, for the purchase of a cemetery near the city of Mexico, and the interment therein of the remains of the American officers and soldiers who fell in battle, or otherwise, in or near the city of Mexico, the sum of $3,000, which, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended for this purpose, under the direction of the President of the United States. And the interment of citizens of the United States, who have heretofore died, or who may hereafter die in Mexico, may be made in said cemetery, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the President of the United States.

Mr. B. said: I suppose there will be no objection to the passage of that amendment. It will require but a very short explanation. A year or two ago Congress appropriated $10,000, which was then supposed to be necessary to purchase a cemetery in or near the city of Mexico, for the interment of the officers and soldiers of the American army who fell in battle, or otherwise died in or near that city. That sum, however, was found not to be sufficient by about $3,000. In the deficiency bill which passed this House some time ago, there was an appropriation of $1,480 34. In looking over the papers, however, and in accordance with the recommendation of the President of the United States in his message, which I hold in my hand, the Senate passed a bill appropriating $3,000 for completing the cemetery, and removing the remains of the officers and soldiers to it. The papers which I now hold in my hand show the facts, but I have not time, nor is it necessary, to go into them. This sum is probably about the additional amount which is needed. It is recommended by the President, has passed the Senate in the form of a separate bill, which has been laid upon your tables. I have taken the substance of this bill and put it into the form of the amendment which is now before the committee. I have adopted this course because there would be no hope of reaching that bill during the present session.

The question was then put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMART offered the following amendment:

And provided that no person at the head of either of the Departments, or of any of the Executive bureaus of the Government of the United States, no Senator or Representative in Congress, clerk in any of the Departments, or any officer or employee of either House of Congress, shall directly or indirectly, during the time they may hold such office, prosecute any claim against the Government of the United States, before the Executive Departments, Executive bureaus, or Congress, for any fee or reward. And if any person aforesaid shall prosecute any claim as aforesaid, he shall forfeit and pay a fine of $2,000, and also the amount of the fee charged for his services, one half to the informer and the other half to the Government, to be recovered by action of debt before any court of the United States.

Mr. S. said: Mr. Chairman, I will detain the House but a moment in explaining this amendment. At the first of the session I submitted a proposition embracing the same principle as this amendment. But I will state for the information of the House, that the principle has been sanctioned during the present session by the Judiciary Committee of this House, and that a similar proposition, though not in the same language, has passed the Senate. I will also state that the judges of the Supreme Court, as the committee are aware, are prohibited from practicing as counsellors or attorneys in the courts of the United States; and that there is now also existing upon the statute book, a prohibition upon the members of this House in relation to Congress, providing that no member shall make a contract, and the provision is enforced by a penalty of $4,000.

These are the precedents I offer, Mr. Chairman, to justify me in offering this amendment. I think the adoption of this proposition is becoming much more necessary than are the prohibitions I have alluded to, and I trust there will be no opposition to the amendment. I have drawn up the proposition with great care, and I think it will be found to answer the purpose.

Mr. MILLSON. I have no objection to the objects contemplated in that amendment, and I have always controlled my own personal action by the principles involved in it; but I rose simply to raise a point of order as to the amendment.

Mr. SMART. I think it is in order.

Mr. MILLSON. It is not a proposition in order to this appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not in order, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. KING, of New York, offered the following amendment:

There shall be allowed and paid to each of the following persons: Charles H. Sherman, Lewis E. Jackson, Henry Taylor, Frederick Morris, and John Davis, mariners, sent into the port of New York and detained there as witnesses for the United States, $1 25 for each and every day necessarily occupied on the voyage and arriving at New York; and the judge of the district of the United States in which such witnesses have been detained to testify, shall allow and cause the same to be paid, the same as other witnesses' fees are paid.

Mr. KING said: I will say briefly, in explanation of this amendment, that it is universally the custom to allow to sailors sent in from foreign ports, to testify in cases of mutiny and difficulties at sea, these fees. The general law does not allow witnesses' fees to be paid until the subpoena has been served. These witnesses were sent in, a portion of them from Rio Janeiro, and some of them from China. Under these circumstances, upon their reaching the port of New York they were subpoenaed, and they would, by law, be entitled to fees only from that time, which would evidently be unjust.

The Committee on the Judiciary unanimously recommended the allowance to be made.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. KING, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON, under the instructions of the Committee of Ways and Means, offered the following amendment to the clause in relation to the penitentiary of the District of Columbia:

After the word "hundred" insert "and sixty."

The clause will then read—

"For the support and maintenance of said penitentiary, $1,560."

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BOWIE moved to strike out the word "ten," in line nine hundred and three, and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

The clause will then read as follows:

"For the support, clothing, and medical treatment of insane paupers of the District of Columbia, at such places as the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, deem proper, $20,000."

Mr. B. said: The amount contained in this section, as reported from the Committee, is not sufficient for the purposes for which it is intended, because heretofore the insane paupers of the District of Columbia have been treated at the insane hospital of Maryland, at the city of Baltimore, at an average expenditure of $200 apiece.

The superintendent of the hospital of Maryland has given information to the health officers of this city, that in consequence of the great increase of that class of patients in the State of Maryland, it is impossible for him any longer to receive and treat the patients from this District. In consequence of this, it becomes necessary for the superintendent of the infirmary of the District to provide accommodations for the insane paupers of the District, within the District. I am informed by him that it will be necessary to have a sum amounting to $20,000, in consequence of the increased expense, there being now no insane hospital in the District, and there being a great increase of that character of patients. He estimates that there are now at least seventy-five persons of that class within the District, including those now under treatment in the hospital at Baltimore, and who will have to be returned to the District, and therefore he requests that this appropriation shall be granted for that purpose.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I have understood from the marshal of this District, that he had it in contemplation to make some arrangement with the director of the insane hospital of the city of Philadelphia; but I am not informed sufficiently to say whether that arrangement has been entered into or not; but if it has been, there could be no better place for the insane of the District, and it is accessible to Washington by railroad.

Mr. BOWIE. I founded my motion upon information given me by Dr. Miller, of this city.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am satisfied that there is no necessity for this amendment, and I am equally satisfied that it is not expected by citizens of this District, who seem, at least to me, to be interested in the subject. I do not mean to controvert what has been said by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Bowie;] but those citizens who have talked with me upon this subject—and the marshal of the District is one—were satisfied with $10,000. That is all that was estimated for, and the committee have put that sum in the bill. Now, I am opposed to raising the amount, and especially as no committee of the House has examined the subject, and said that such appropriation ought to be made.

Mr. STANLY. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] is altogether mistaken.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not mistaken in giving the facts I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Bowie, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I move to increase the appropriation of the same clause $5,000.

The facts stated by my colleague [Mr. Bowie] are perfectly correct. It is not a matter in which the people of the District are alone interested. This District is so convenient to Baltimore, that when the authorities are obliged to send these poor creatures away, they send them at once to the Maryland hospital at Baltimore; but they will not and cannot be now received there; and we cannot make an appropriation to erect an insane hospital here, or any other building, because there is no existing law authorizing the erection of such an institution. We must increase the amount of this appropriation, in view of the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McLANAHAN,] for the expense of sending these insane persons from the District to Baltimore is comparatively small. Now, they must go to other institutions—they must be sent to Philadelphia, and perhaps some of them beyond, to places where you can find suitable institutions. This will require an increased expenditure. Formerly you had only to make an appropriation to provide for taking care of them in the Maryland hospital, and to provide for the carrying of them thither; but now that state of things is at an end. This description of unfortunate individuals is so largely increased within the limits of Maryland that that State has not accommodations for its own insane; and it will be cruelly on the part of this committee if we leave these poor people without the means of being transported to New York, Philadelphia, or elsewhere, where institutions can be found for their reception.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the gentleman is mistaken again. The arrangement of which my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] has spoken, will be amply carried out with this appropriation, and the only additional expense—take the gentleman's own statement—if we cannot get them provided for in Baltimore, will be their transportation from that point to Pennsylvania.

This is the usual appropriation. It has heretofore been ample, and there has been no complaint on the subject. It does seem to me that, under the arrangement spoken of by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, this sum will be ample to meet all additional expense.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know how many insane persons from the District are in the Maryland hospital?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know.

Mr. WALSH. I undertake to say there are almost a sufficient number to exhaust this appropriation.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman himself know how many there are?

Mr. WALSH. There are fifty; and at $200 apiece this whole appropriation will be exhausted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rely upon the incorrect-ness of the gentleman's position, from the fact that the officers who have this subject in charge disagree with him as to the amount. They have not asked us for any more, and when they made the estimates, and at the time this bill was being prepared, I presume they knew of the number of insane from the District in the Maryland hospital; and if so, why was not this subject of an insufficient appropriation brought to the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means, or to the attention of some other committee, that it might be investigated.

The fact that they only estimated for $10,000; the fact that they have not called for an additional appropriation from any committee of this House; and the fact that they knew that this subject was before the Committee of Ways and Means, satisfy me conclusively that the gentlemen are mistaken, and that this appropriation is right.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. WALSH, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STANLY. I move to strike out the $10,000, and in lieu thereof to insert $19,000. If the committee precisely understood this question, there would not be a single dissenting voice to the appropriation. This bill was reported last February. The estimates were made at that time, and the Committee of Ways and Means acted upon the information then before it. There was published in the Intelligencer, a few days ago, a letter dated July 15th, 1852. It came from a very high and respectable source, and with the permission of the committee, I will read the following extract:

"The General Government, with proper liberality, has for some years past allowed between six and seven thousand dollars for the support of these unfortunate persons, and, as above stated, the greater part of them are in Maryland hospital, near Baltimore. This institution is, however, so crowded, and the demand on the part of the insane who more properly belong to Maryland so great for admission, that it has been resolved by the managers of the above-named institution, to exclude for the future all such patients coming from the District of Columbia, notice having been given to the marshal to remove those now under care on or before the 1st of January, 1853.

The number of insane has greatly increased within the last few years, and there are now between sixty and seventy to be provided for. How are they to be provided for? Congress must take care of them, or they will be turned at large upon the community. They must be confined somewhere. I have a variety of facts which I should be very glad to lay before the committee, but which it is impossible to do in my limited time of five minutes. I call attention to the following letter, from a highly respectable physician in this city:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 14, 1852.

SIR: I find on a perusal of mine of 24th ultimo, I omitted some very urgent and strong reasons upon the particular subject of the note—I mean the establishment of a lunatic asylum to be founded by the Government in the Metropolis of the Union.

The practice and experience of the medical faculty here have demonstrated to them that a very large proportion of the insane in this District and city are either foreigners or non-residents—those, in short, who come to the seat of Government, some to prosecute claims, and others to procure clerical or other employment. Among so many of this class, a large number must of necessity be disappointed; and coming here with high expectations of success, when poverty, vexatious delays, and "hope deferred" overtake them, it unfortunately happens that the reason of some becomes more or less deranged, and humanity requires all the relief which can be afforded.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THO. MILLER.

There are about seventy at the hospital at Baltimore from the District, instead of twenty-five or thirty, and there are about twenty or thirty at large in the community. What is to be done by $15,000, $20,000, or $30,000? We ought to thank God that we are able to relieve the distresses of one human being. I trust there will become suitable provision made until we can establish an insane hospital here. I hope there will be no objection to my proposition.

The question was put, and the amendment of Mr. STANLY was agreed to.

Mr. STANLY. I offer the following amendment. I am afraid it will be ruled out of order, but I desire the subject brought to the attention of the committee:

For the purchase of a site, and for the erection of a suitable building for the proper accommodation of insane persons, $110,000; the site to be selected, and the money to be expended under the direction of the President of the United States in the execution of such plans as he may adopt.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is that amendment in order? It is for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building. The universal practice has been that such amendments are not in order in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is not in order.

The Clerk then read as follows:

"For clerk hire, stationery, rent, fuel, and contingencies in the completion of the census of 1850, $50,000."

Mr. HEBARD. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether, in the estimate for that $50,000, there is included the expenses of the Superintendent of the Census Board whilst in Europe?

Mr. HOUSTON. The expenses of the European tour of the Superintendent are not included here. That is now a matter of contest before the Department, which I hope will always be decided against him. I have no particular fancy for the keeping in of this $50,000. The estimate of the Department was for $150,000, which the Committee of Ways and Means reduced to $50,000. As I have before said, I should not regret to see this $50,000 stricken out, and the census matter brought to its proper basis.

Mr. HEBARD. I thank the gentleman for the information, which it was my intention to have placed before the committee.

Mr. FICKLIN. I offer the following amendment to this section:

Provided, That the salaries and emoluments of the Superintendent of the Census Board and the clerks employed in that service, shall cease from and after the first day of September next, and no portion of this fund shall under any pretext be paid to them for services rendered after that day; nor shall any portion of it be used in paying for the publication, or preparing for publication, any history of the United States, or of the several States of the Union, now being prepared by the said Superintendent, or his clerks, or other employees.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, the time has arrived in the prosecution of the taking and publication of the census, and the various subjects connected with it, when the Congress of the United States should know what is intended to be done. I am not now prepared to state exactly what the making up of the census tables cost in 1840, but I have been told that it cost $37,000. I have been informed that the making up of the census for 1850, up to the present time, has cost over $200,000; and we are now told by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that $150,000 additional have been asked for by the Department. That committee have only reported for the appropriation of $50,000, and they report that, not because they recommend it, but because the Census Board is in existence, and demands some appropriation for the prosecution of its ordinary routine of business.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will allow me, I would suggest, if his object be to stop the progress of this thing, that he had better move to strike out the entire appropriation. On the first of this month, there was an available balance for their bureau purposes, of $70,000 in the Treasury.

Mr. FICKLIN. I do not know which would be the better course. I propose to give them until the first of September to wind up their business, and to restrict all persons connected with this Census Bureau from making any contract with relation to the publication, or preparation for publication, of histories of the several States of the Union. They have shown a specimen of that work to us. I think myself that book-making is not a part of the business of the Census Bureau. I wish to place a quietus upon their book-making. I desire to prevent them making contracts, involving this Government in heavy, and almost countless expenditures.

Mr. GENTRY. I do not know whether the idea suggested by my honorable friend from Illinois be a practicable one or not, unless this Congress and this Government shall dispend with the matter of taking the census altogether; and I believe the Constitution positively enjoins that. If he is determined a book shall not be made, the matter is at an end. How is the world to know anything about the taking of the census, unless you publish the statistics, and facts contemplated by the taking of that census?

Mr. FICKLIN. I do not object to the publication of statistical information of the enumeration of the inhabitants of this country; but I object to the making of histories of the several States of the Union by the $1,000 clerks.

Mr. GENTRY. That is a change of the issue. It is not that he objects to making the book, but he insists upon prescribing what shall be the contents of the book. That is always the question when a book is to be made. I do not undertake to say whether the plan of taking the census was a wise one or not; but we all know that it was a perfectly comprehensive and all-embracing one. I am not prepared to give any opinion as to whether this historical branch of the business should be published or not. I do not think this is the right place to deal with the question. I think it is questionable, if we have made a plan of executing this thing originally, whether it would not be the worst economy to turn back now and go through with it again. If large sums have been expended, and if items have been embraced in this report that it would have been better to have left out, now to stop and suppress the publication of the book, involves the absolute waste of all of the money already expended. We are to consider whether it is economy to print it now, notwithstanding there may be some things in it valueless, upon the presumption that there is much in it eminently valuable, which will be looked into by those who shall in future days explore the events of this age, to study the character of people at this epoch of time, and to compare it with the state of things which shall exist when we shall be in eternity longer than Adam has been. [Laughter.]

Looking to this book in every light, I am under the belief that those who shall live when I have been in eternity longer than Adam, would find it a curious and interesting document. [Renewed laughter.] I feel quite unwilling to suppress anything in it. Let us send it down to posterity, and let it be forever, in all future ages of time, one of the curiosities which attach to this particular age. Suppose we do spend a few dollars in publishing this thing, collected at so much trouble and cost, it will not ruin this Government, nor be a heavy burden upon posterity. This will be an interesting document, and I am not sure but what the history of the country is as important as anything else.

The question was taken, and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. VENABLE. I move to strike out the amendment entirely, because I am informed by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that they have already in their hands $70,000 with which to finish the work they were appointed to do. I believed, from the indications in the early part of the session, that a project had been formed to keep this Board for another decade, and have them ready for the next census. [Laughter.] From the specimen which has been laid before us of the history of Maryland, I am satisfied that if all the other histories which were to be arranged for the several States of the Union had no more merit than that specimen, they were a libel upon history, without possessing the interest of romance. I would sooner myself have Robinson Crusoe divided into chapters and annexed to certain portions of the work, because it is really and decidedly better reading. [Laughter.] I voted for the amendment of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. FICKLIN], and that having failed, I am for striking out the $50,000, because I desire that this Census Board should come to an end. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means tells us that they have $70,000 already in hand to pay all that has been done. According to the project which has been presented to us, the census of the United States will be in some seven or eight volumes, and I do not suppose that one man in fifty thousand would read the statistics which will be contained in them. The necessary statistics—those which the people really want, and which were published by order of this House, at a cost of some ten or twelve cents apiece—contained all the information necessary and valuable to us. The Senate, in looking over this matter, have agreed to reduce them down to a single volume, which will contain all that the people will read; and for this reason I am willing, at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to see the $50,000 stricken out; for I wish that this incubus in the shape of a Census Board to cease, and receive nothing further from the public Treasury.

Mr. CARTER. I am opposed to this amendment, and I am opposed to it, among other reasons, for this: that the gentlemen who are making an attack upon this Census Board, and the conduct of this Census Board, do not know exactly what they themselves are at. If they ask me to vote against continuing the appropriations for the production and publication of the census by ample and proper means, and for the payment of the Board, Superintendent, and all, if they are necessary to that work, I can say to them I shall not do it with my vote. I voted for the taking of that census with the view of collecting the information which was sought by it. I shall vote for the publication of that information; and this talk about publishing books, or our want of authority to do it, will not intimidate me from doing it. I have heard it said throughout the different stages of the discussion upon the subject of the census, that the facts were not reliable. This was the talk at the time the census was ordered. They are the most reliable statistics, in my judgment, that you can procure, and they are procured under higher sanctions of truth than any other class of statistical information that you can obtain. That information has been obtained, and it wants publication; and this talk, coming in just before the expiration of the labors of that board, appears to me totally unwise and wholly out of season. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. FICKLIN. The gentleman says that these shores are about to close. When, in the name of common sense, will they close?

Mr. CARTER. When the work is done. [Laughter.]

The question was then taken on Mr. VENABLE's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The following clause of the bill was then read:

"For running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, $120,000."

Mr. DUNHAM. I offer the following amendment to that clause:

For arrearages incurred during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852, for running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, $25,000.

I will make a brief explanation of this amendment, and before doing so, I ask that a letter from the Secretary of the Interior may be read.

The letter was read by the Clerk, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, August 6, 1852.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 3d instant, I have the honor to state the amount of claims, charges, or accounts properly chargeable to the appropriation for running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which are now on file in this Department, or of which I have any knowledge at present, is about $25,000.

I am, sir, with much respect, your obedient servant,
ALEX. H. STUART, Secretary.

Hon. GEORGE S. HUSTON,
Chairman Committee Ways and Means, H. R.

In the deficiency bill which passed a few weeks since, an appropriation was made which was thought to be sufficient to cover the expenses of the past year in running that boundary line. It proves to be inadequate. There are claims already filed in the Department equal to the amount which is proposed by this amendment, $25,000. In this bill we have an appropriation for the current year. The Committee of Ways and Means reduced this amount as much as they thought it was safe to do for the expenses of the current year. It is therefore necessary, in the opinion of the committee, in order to pay these claims which are already due against the Government, that this amendment should be adopted.

The question was then taken on Mr. DUNHAM's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WOODWARD. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That the boundary line between the two Republics, westward from the Rio Grande, shall be the one designated by the decree of the Mexican Congress, organizing the State of Chihuahua and the Department of New Mexico, and establishing the coterminous boundary between the same: that is to say, the line shall run due west from the village of Paso del Norte, leaving the said village and its proper jurisdiction to the State of Chihuahua of the Mexican Republic.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Is that amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment is in order. Propositions similar to this were entertained upon the deficiency bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. When the question of order was made at that time, the amendment was from the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WOODWARD] to be in order.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman, I was disinclined to embrace this occasion for introducing the matter contained in my amendment. But no other occasion is likely to present itself, and I think it quite out of the question that so important a matter as the settlement of our boundary with Mexico should be conducted at the discretion of a single branch of the Government, when it is known that the policy of that Department is leading to a result contrary to what has been expected by the whole country, and, as I maintain, directly repugnant to the unequivocal language of our treaty with Mexico. It would be vain, however, in the few moments allowed me, to attempt an argument which it would take hours to do full justice to; and I shall be compelled to limit myself to two or three points which lie at the bottom of the question.

The grand error of the commissioners appointed to "mark" and "designate" the line consists in their supposing that the map of Disturnell, named in the treaty, is the sole object of reference for the determination of the southern boundary of New Mexico. A greater mistake than this could not be committed. The material and ultimate reference is to the "various acts of the Congress" of Mexico, organizing the Department of New Mexico and the State of Chihuahua, and defining their boundaries by means of material marks on the earth's surface. The map of Disturnell is referred to as having been constructed in conformity with the new geographical arrangement under those acts or decrees. These decrees are older than the map of Disturnell. They made no reference to this map, or any map, but the map was constructed with reference to them, and aimed to give the latitude and longitude of points and lines already established by the decrees, and established with no reference to latitude or longitude. Disturnell, contemplating the coterminous boundary of Chihuahua and New Mexico, it being the northern boundary of the former and the southern boundary of the latter, predicates of it that it is of a certain latitude, and the false predicate of the geographer is adopted by your commissioners as a substitute for the line itself. For a period of time anterior to the making of the map, this line, authoritatively described and established; had existed and been conformed to as the jurisdictional boundary between Chihuahua and New Mexico; and it was never imagined in Mexico that the false predicate of a geographer could shift the line. The whole period of the existence of the line as an ascertained and recognized boundary extended from 1824 to the date of the treaty, a period of about twenty-four years. During this whole period it was never supposed that the relative rights of Chihuahua and New Mexico depended upon the correctness of the astronomic demarcations of Disturnell, made after the rights had vested. Disturnell adopted the longitudes and latitudes of Melish's map, always suspected to be inexact, and shown to be so by Fremont five years before the treaty. Errors of longitude were found to be gross.

If at any time previous to our conquest a dispute had arisen between Chihuahua and New Mexico as to the true position of this line, a proposition to settle the dispute by a reference to the astronomic determinations of Disturnell's map would have been scouted and hooted at. And yet what were then the rights of New Mexico relative to Chihuahua are now the rights of the United States relative to the Mexican Republic. I affirm that the elements which would have determined such a dispute between Chihuahua and New Mexico are identically those which should now determine the relative rights of the United States and Mexico.

If gentlemen will but bear in mind that the decrees of the Mexican Congress designating and establishing this boundary are older than the map of Disturnell, and that they make no reference to any maps whatever, or to astronomic indications, but wholly to visible marks on the earth, or to topographical conditions; and if they will remember also, that the map of Disturnell aimed to conform to those decrees, and was, in fact, guided by them, making, however, an erroneous astronomic predicate as to the earth-line prescribed by the decrees, it seems to me that the whole truth of the case must flash upon their minds with resistless force.

I deny that the treaty refers to the map, except by way of referring to the decrees in conformity with which the map was constructed. But it may be asked, why refer to a map at all? I answer, that when one nation transfers a domain to another, it is not unusual to make reference to some map, the best to be had, just as when an individual conveys a parcel of land reference is had to a plat. But all are agreed as to the proper use and effect of a plat in a question of boundary. Material marks, whether natural or artificial, control course and distance. Now, course, by means of a compass, and distance, by means of a chain, can be reduced to mathematical precision; and if natural marks can control two indications, each capable of such mathematical precision, how much more should they be admitted to control the result of astronomic observations for determining the relation between the center of the sun and a spot on the earth's surface, the two points being more than ninety-six millions of miles apart? But in our treaty with Mexico there was a very special reason which made it indispensable to refer to a map, and this I shall proceed to explain.

It is a great mistake to assume that there is any contradiction between the map of Melish and that of Disturnell, and that the different demarcations set down by them indicate uncertainty as to the division of the country. There was uncertainty in some particulars, but the difference between Melish and Disturnell does not illustrate it. Two systems of geography have existed in Mexico. One prevailed while it was subject to the Spanish monarchy, the other was established by the Congress of Mexico after the country had become an independent Republic. The maps of Melish and others were designed to represent one of these systems, that of Disturnell the other. In establishing the new system, the Mexican Congress aimed to divide the country into districts, suitable, in point of form and size, for new States; and the lines and dimensions indicated by Melish were, in a great measure, disregarded. The New Mexico of Humboldt and Melish was a very different thing from the New Mexico of Disturnell. The southern boundary of the New Mexico of Melish set out at the village of Paso del Norte, but so as to throw that village on the side of New Mexico. Running thence, in a southwesterly direction, it took in a large portion of what is now the State of Chihuahua. At a certain point it turned in a northerly direction, pursuing the eastern base of the Annahuac range of mountains, throwing those mountains on the side of California. The southern boundary of the New Mexico of Disturnell also set out at the village of Paso del Norte, but in such manner as to place that village on the side of Chihuahua. Running due west, it crossed the Annahuac range, and terminated at the western base; and thence pursued the western base in a northerly direction, taking in, as part of New Mexico, the Annahuac mountains, which before had been excluded.

Now, it is a fact, and a very remarkable fact, that in regard to the disputed portion of the boundary, the authors of the treaty purposely declined to prescribe an arbitrary, unknown line, and did expressly select and adopt a line already known to history and science. But, as has just been shown, there were more lines than one known to history and science; and all will, therefore, at once perceive how important it was that the treaty should declare which one was contemplated, and so the treaty does, in the following explicit terms:

"The southern and western limits of New Mexico, mentioned in this article, are those laid down in the map entitled 'Map of the United Mexican States,' as organized and defined by various acts of the Congress of said Republic," &c.

Disturnell adopted the latitudes and longitudes of the old map, and errors in these particulars can no more disadjust the Mexican States as organized and defined by the acts of Congress of that Republic, than the discovery of error in the astronomic determination of the United States could change the lines that now separate the several States.

The importance of making reference to the map in the manner done in the treaty, will appear by recurring to the annexation of Texas. Texas, as a division of the Spanish possessions, was a very different thing from Texas, as a department of the Mexican Republic. The Republic of Texas bore the same relation to the old Spanish territory of that name that the State of Louisiana bears, retrospectively, to the old French province of that name. And, in seceding from the Mexican confederacy, she was clearly entitled to no other limits than those which had been assigned her as a department, adding whatever she had acquired by conquest. When the resolutions of annexation were under discussion in the Senate, Colonel Benton urged the importance of settling, beforehand, "which Texas" we proposed to admit—that of Humboldt or that of Disturnell. But as Texas claimed, by a sort of constructive conquest, to be enlarged to the old Spanish limits, and as it was the well-known policy of our Government, by fair means, to extinguish the Mexican title east of the Rio Grande, Colonel Benton's proposition was not much regarded. It so turned out, however, that we got into a war with Mexico, the disputed boundary being the cause or the pretext; I do not say which.

This simple statement will forcibly suggest why a proper precaution was used in annexing New Mexico, and will also make it apparent that the map of Disturnell was referred to, not to give precision to boundaries, but to identify the New Mexico contemplated by the treaty.

As to the western boundary of New Mexico, if there be no marks by which a definite line can be fixed upon, there are certainly topographical conditions alluded to in the treaty that would enable us to find an approximate line. By reading the treaty, it will appear that its authors expected this boundary to cut the head-waters of the Gila; they considered it, therefore, as lying considerably west of the Annahuac ridge. But suppose there be no marks whatever, then course and distance from the initial point must govern.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that my amendment, though in order, is hardly appropriate to the occasion; but I felt bound to embrace the opportunity of expressing my sense of the unwarrantable conduct of your commissioners.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina; but before doing so I desire to ask the Chair whether what I now send to the Clerk's desk is in order as an amendment to the amendment?

The Clerk read the proposed amendment to the amendment, as follows:

And that negotiations be entered into with Great Britain for altering the treaty of 1783, as to the boundary lines between the United States, New Brunswick, and the Canadas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that it is in order.

Mr. BROOKS. I did not suppose that it was strictly in order, nor do I suppose that this change of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, as proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, is in order. It is now the 7th of August. The civil and diplomatic bill is up and under the five minutes rule, and we are now asked to enter into the establishment of a boundary line between the United States and Mexico—a subject upon which commissioners have been appointed by the United States and Mexico, and which it is impossible for any man in this House to comprehend without a pretty good knowledge of astronomy, a fair study of it, and a pretty full examination of American and Mexican geography, and of the old Spanish history of Mexico. The gentleman from South Carolina asks us now, at this period of the dog-days, to enter into this discussion, and settle what are the boundary lines between the United States and Mexico, when we have appointed commissioners, and by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, left to them, as the gentleman confesses, the designation of those lines. Now, I say that, in the first place, this is an improper time to settle such a question; in the second place, that if it was the proper time, we could not do it in five minutes' discussion; and in the third place, that we have not the power to do it. The treaty, as I said when this subject was up before, settles that question, and as that treaty is, so this House must follow. I need hardly enlarge upon the argument that I made then. It strikes me, that no more inappropriate time, and no more inappropriate place could be selected for the discussion of this subject; and if it is to go on, there will be no end to the civil and diplomatic bill, for it involves great and serious questions. We who hope to bring the discussions on this bill to a close to-day, shall hardly be able to do it, but shall be under the necessity of devoting the Sabbath to the profound studies which I have suggested for the consideration of members, in order to be here on Monday morning prepared for a proper investigation of this very complicated subject.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Woodward's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD offered the following amendment:

Provided, That the initial point on the Rio Grande, of the boundary between the United States and Mexico, shall not be fixed north of the point laid down on the map accompanying the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and made a part thereof, and shall thence run westwardly along the whole southern boundary of New Mexico, as provided by said treaty and map; and from the west end of said line to a branch of the Gila river as prescribed by said treaty.

Mr. H. said: That amendment provides that we shall adhere to the treaty. It is substantially the provision offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] when this subject was before the House some days ago. In my estimation, the position which he then took was true, that wherever the treaty fixed the boundary, there it was, and it was not in the power of the Executive officers of this Government to change that boundary; and it is for the simple and clear reason that to those officers is given only power to mark and to ascertain the boundary, and designate it. That is the language of the treaty. Now, I desire to know if it is the intention of gentlemen upon the other side of the House to give up thirty-four miles of territory there, in the direct face of the treaty? Why are they not willing to say that the treaty shall be adhered to, and that the line of it shall in no place, and in no particular be departed from? It strikes me as extraordinary that there should be any resistance to a proposition of this sort, when it is clear that the Government ought to stand by the treaty, to adhere to the treaty, and to fix the line as the treaty has fixed it, whatever may be the malpractices of the officers who have undertaken to disturb the treaty boundary and to fix it differently.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I concur fully with the gentleman from Texas in the general position that he assumes—that we should surrender no portion of the territory embraced in the treaty. The whole difficulty, as I understand it, grows out of the question where the boundary line is. Now, I believe I agree with the gentleman from Texas as to where the true line is. I do not think we disagree at all about that.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not say in this amendment where it is. I only say that they shall adhere to the treaty.

Mr. STEPHENS. Well, I should have no objection to put that in the bill, if it would do any good; but I see no good that it can possibly accomplish.

Mr. CARTTER. I ask the gentleman if we have not declared that once already this session?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes; we have already done it, and therefore I am opposed to this amendment, and hope the committee will vote it down. We have already affirmed the principle. I do not believe, however, that the House can accomplish anything, either in extending the line to any particular point that I might think right, or in extending it to that which gentlemen who differ with me may think right.

Mr. HOWARD. I will state the difficulty we shall be in, if we vote this appropriation without some such declaration as I propose. This is a new and distinct appropriation of $25,000 for running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico; and if we do not qualify this appropriation as we did the other, the officers will claim it as a ratification of the line which they have run.

Mr. STEPHENS. The officers have already past that point, as I understand it.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; at the last advice the matter was still in dispute. It was not signed by the surveyor, whose signature is necessary.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not think any expression of opinion on the part of this House can have any influence at all upon these commissioners. They were sent there to ascertain the true line according to the treaty. That is what they were sent there for. That is their commission. They may differ from us as to what is the true line, but any expression of opinion we may utter here upon the subject, will not control them. The treaty itself provides for the manner in which that line shall be ascertained. A map is appended to the treaty, and made a part of it, and nothing that we can do here will control the action of the commissioners.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to state, in this connection, that this appropriation of $25,000 is not a new appropriation for the current year, but that it is for a deficiency, and for work already done?

Mr. STEPHENS. I repeat again that I think it is entirely unnecessary to make any such amendment as this to the bill. I will not detain the committee longer. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Howard's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. CARTTER moved to strike out the word "five," in line nine hundred and eleven, and to insert "twelve" in lieu thereof, so as to make the clause read as follows:

For compensation of the librarian of the Patent Office, twelve hundred dollars.

Mr. C. said: At the request of the Commissioner of Patents, and a concurrence of judgment on the part of the Committee on Patents, I have been instructed by that committee to offer an amendment, to change that appropriation from five to twelve hundred dollars. The object of it is to elevate the character of the librarian. It is ascertained that he may be a useful officer, to aid in the examinations that are going on in relation to patents.

Mr. DUNHAM. You propose, then, to make it a separate and distinct office?

Mr. CARTTER. It is already a separate and distinct office.

Mr. DUNHAM. I understand that the duties of librarian are performed by another officer.

Mr. CARTTER. Well, I propose to give the librarian $1,200 a year. It is an appropriation of the patent fund; it is not taken from the general Treasury. The amendment is offered at the request of the chief of the bureau, and I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee of Ways and Means omitted to say out of what fund this money should be paid. I suppose the chairman of the Committee on Patents will allow me to offer this amendment, to come in at the end of line nine hundred and eleven: "To be paid out of the patent fund."

Mr. CARTTER. I will accept that as a part of my amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee on Patents have charge of that particular fund, and the raising of this salary is a matter that the Committee of Ways and Means have not looked into.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to oppose that amendment, because the sum is not large enough; by which I mean to say, that while I shall vote for the amendment—

Mr. CARTTER. Will the gentleman allow me to state to him that it is the sum suggested by the Commissioner of Patents?

Mr. STANTON. Well, then, I suppose I must submit to it, although I consider the sum too small.

The question was then taken on Mr. CARTTER's amendment as modified, and it was agreed to.

Mr. VENABLE offered the following amendment:

For the purpose of erecting a pedestal on Lafayette Square, for the equestrian statue of Andrew Jackson, on such plan as may be approved by the artist of that work, $5,000.

Mr. V. said: The equestrian statue of General Jackson, which is being erected in this city, I understand is now completed, and a suitable pedestal ought to be provided for it. I have lately seen it myself, and it is not only creditable to the artist, but it is a magnificent work. I hope there will be no difficulty in making the appropriation necessary for the erection of a pedestal.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON, under instructions of the Committee of Ways and Means, offered the following amendment:

For freight and transportation of the group of statuary contracted for with Horatio Greenough, from Leighon to Washington, and for placing it upon a pedestal in front of the eastern portico of the Capitol, a sum not exceeding $7,000.

Mr. H. said: I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury showing that it is now ready.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON, under instructions of the same committee, offered the following amendment:

To make good the interest on the investment of stocks of the State of Arkansas, held in trust by the Secretary of the Treasury, to be reimbursed out of the interest when collected, $5,400.

Mr. H. said: The amendment explains itself. I have nothing to say, unless the committee wish explanation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON, under instructions of the same committee, offered the following amendment:

For the construction and equipment of not less than six revenue cutters, the sum of $90,000, the same sum to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. H. said: I do not care about making any explanation of this, unless the committee wish it.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON, under instructions of the same committee, offered the following amendment:

For the redemption of seventeen loan office certificates, numbered 153, 312, 6895, 6896, 8897, 6898, 6899, 6900, 6901, 6902, 9175, 9257, 9283, 9293, 9294, and 12333, which have been presented at the Treasury, at the specie value, and with interest, as computed by the Register of the Treasury: Provided, Satisfactory evidence be produced to the Secretary of the Treasury, that the persons who have presented the same certificate for payment are the bona fide holders of the same, $4,175 42.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, offered the following amendment:

For purchase and payment of the building at the corner of F street north and Seventeenth street west, in the city of Washington, held by William H. Winder, and now in the occupancy of the United States, $200,001: Provided, Said William H. Winder shall make to the United States a good and sufficient title in fee-simple with general warranty, free from all liens and incumbrances to said building and premises on which the same is situated; such title to be approved and accepted by the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury before payment.

Mr. J. said: This is the same amendment, with the exception of the addition of the sum of one dollar, as that yesterday offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] under the unanimous instructions of the Committee of Ways and Means. I am induced again to offer it, from conversation I have had this morning with some gentleman, who expressed their opinions more favorably to it than they did on yesterday. I hope the amendment may be adopted. It will be economy for the Government to purchase the building and stop the payment of rent.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to amend the amendment by striking out one dollar. I take this occasion to say that my views have undergone a change upon the propriety of purchasing this building by the Government at this time. I am satisfied that this building will have to go into market. I am told that some private reasons induced gentlemen who were in possession of the facts, from withholding this statement on yesterday. But it is told to me that this building will have to go into market, and I am satisfied that it will at an early day. The man who now owns it cannot continue to hold it. Then the question arises, if this building is to be exposed for sale, you have got to go into market and compete with other bidders, and if some private individual purchases it at a less price, you cannot continue to occupy it without his consent, and you may be turned out.

There are other views connected with this case, of which I was not aware on yesterday, of the inducements which were held out to Mr. Winder to put up this building, by Secretaries who had no power to contract, but who stood in need of such a building. I am satisfied, from an investigation of this matter since yesterday, which I had never given it before, that the building cost Mr. Winder more than $200,000. For these reasons I hope the committee will reconsider their vote of yesterday in relation to this matter, and pass the amendment.

Mr. GENTRY. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia. I prefer the original amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] My attention has been invited to the fact, by the friends of the individual interested, who say that from circumstances connected with the erection of this building great injustice was likely to be done Mr. Winder, and they believe that if I were disposed to look into this matter as a just man disposed to do right, I could not fail to come to the conclusion that he was entitled to some consideration by this Congress. I have looked into it, and I believe we ought to purchase his building. The reasons which induced the gentleman, or, at least, some of them who voted against this amendment yesterday—

Mr. McMULLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask one question?

Mr. GENTRY. I cannot yield.

Mr. McMULLIN. Then I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware that he has departed from the rules of order.

Mr. McMULLIN. I think the gentleman is advocating the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moved to strike out of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, one dollar, so as to make the appropriation $200,000. The gentleman is opposing that amendment.

Mr. GENTRY. I hope the gentleman does not think that it was from any feeling of discourtesy that I declined to yield the floor.

Mr. McMULLIN. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. GENTRY. The pet idea of gentlemen who opposed this amendment is for the Government to build offices upon a large scale for its own use. Now, I say to those gentlemen that it is palpable to my mind that it will inflict a serious injury, not to say an absolute wrong, upon Mr. Winder, who, as was stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] was induced to erect this building for the use of the Government. Now, if the Government were to erect buildings for its own use, so as to supersede the use of this, and thus leave it upon Mr. Winder's hands, he will be unable to rent it. As to the policy of the Government renting this building permanently, no argument will be necessary to convince any gentleman that it is not the true policy of the Government, for in a few years you pay more money in rent than is needed for the Government to build its own offices. But this edifice was built by individual enterprise, with the encouragement upon the part of certain officers of this Government that it should be used by the Government for public offices. It has been so used, and I think it cannot be dispensed with, unless you build some other in lieu of it. Now, every principle of justice, it seems to me, requires that the Government should purchase Mr. Winder's building, and pay him a fair price for it. I hope the House is not prepared to inflict so immense an injury as I am convinced they would inflict upon Mr. Winder by refusing to purchase the building. There is no just man, in my opinion, who will make himself acquainted with the facts, who will not believe that it is right to adopt this amendment.

Mr. McMULLIN. Is it in order to offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, at this time. The gentleman can speak in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] if he desires.

Mr. McMULLIN. Well, sir, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and I will confine my remarks to that amendment. While I have as much confidence in the judgment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] as I have in the judgment of most men, yet like him my attention has been called to the investigation of this subject. I was there and examined this building myself, and if the gentleman from Tennessee, and those who now advocate the passage of this amendment, will go and examine for themselves, they will find from the time they leave the avenue that very large cracks are distinctly visible in the whole building. If you will enter it and turn to the right, you will find upon examination that the bottom floor has given way in different places. My attention was called to that fact this morning by one of the officers of the Government.

Now, sir, I ask the gentleman from Tennessee, and my colleague, [Mr. BAYLY,] who traveled out of his way, as it seemed to me, on yesterday to attack my views upon this question, by what authority this Government can be compelled to purchase this building because of any understanding which may have been entered into, without authority, upon the part of an officer of this Government with Mr. Winder? I ask what right Secretary Marcy, or Secretary Walker, or Secretary anybody else have to enter into any such arrangement?

But I want to call the attention of this committee to another fact. It has been stated that this building ought to be purchased upon the ground of economy. I beg gentlemen to remember that when this building was erected, according to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] the iron alone cost $60,000. Now, I tell that gentleman that the same quantity of iron could be purchased to-day for $30,000. Mr. Winder himself will admit that the price of iron has fallen one half since the time of the building of this edifice. But leaving this objection out of view, the building is out of place. The Government need a building near the Patent Office, or near the General Post Office, or in some place more convenient.

Go and ask many of the officers who occupy that building, and they will tell you that they have repeatedly, and upon different occasions, left the building for fear it would fall.

Sir, we have the reports of architects in this city—the architect Mills, and somebody else—in relation to this building, but if gentlemen will go and examine that building for themselves before they vote for this appropriation, and if they possess the judgment which I am willing to accord to them, they will be bound to come to the conclusion that the building is not safe.

But why, I ask, press this matter with such hot haste, when the Committee on Public Buildings recommend the purchase of this building for $280,000, but the economical Committee of Ways and Means have agreed to recommend, and have recommended the purchase for $200,000? Now, sir, gentlemen need not tell me that there is danger that this building will go into the hands of speculators, and that the Government will have more to pay for it than they do now. There is no danger of that sort. Let the speculator, whoever he may be, purchase it, and he will be quite as ready to rent it to the Government as the Government will be to lease it. I must express my surprise, as well as my regret, that the Committee of Ways and Means, who have been right upon most questions, should have thought proper to recommend the purchase of this building.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. STEPHENS to the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, moved to strike out $50,000, leaving the amount at $150,000.

Mr. J. said: I know, Mr. Chairman, that when an amendment is proposed to a bill like this—the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill—by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or by any one of the members of that committee, which amendment is indorsed by the committee, that the character of that committee has considerable influence before this House. But yet I think this committee ought to act and think for itself. It is true the recommendation of that committee should have great weight, and be entitled to consideration from this committee. But notwithstanding that committee makes a recommendation upon this occasion, I beg leave to dissent, and oppose the purchase of that building; and even if it be purchased, I think it ought to be obtained for a less amount than is proposed by the committee. The argument is presented here that if the Government fail to purchase this building at the present time, that it must go under the hammer, and if the Government fails to become the purchaser, it must pass into the hands of an individual, who will exact a high and extravagant rent from the Government for its use.

Now, let me ask this committee, and ask them as practical men, what is that building worth to anybody except the Government? Have they any use for it? Can they appropriate it to any purpose? The Government is the only purchaser they have, and if they cannot sell it to the Government they cannot sell it at all, unless they sell it at rates ruinous to a great extent. The Government is the only purchaser they will find, even if they place it under the hammer to be sold to the highest bidder.

But when we come to examine this matter a little further, we see there is a struggle between a set of brokers—a set of Shylocks—in this city. This individual, they say, has been engaged by Government officers to construct this building, and consequently the Government ought to purchase

it. Now, if we are to sanction and indorse every encouragement a Secretary of the Treasury or of War, may give to an individual, where would be the end of it?

If this individual has been encouraged to build a house, and he fails to realize the profits he expected, are we on that account to pay for it? It is his own fault. If we are to purchase this building because some Government officer has given encouragement to build it, why, here is Corcoran & Riggs's building, occupied by the Secretary of the Interior, which we must purchase, because, as it will be said, some officer of the Government has encouraged Corcoran & Riggs to expend a large amount in that building.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I would say that the building of Corcoran & Riggs is not fire-proof, and no one would recommend the purchase of such a building.

Mr. JOHNSON. What do they care whether it is fire-proof or not, if the Government will buy it? If the building is safe, and everything secure, they will say it will answer the purpose of the Government as well as any other.

Mr. MEADE. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and in advocating the original proposition, I will take occasion to allude to the remarks of my colleague [Mr. McMULLIN] in the course of his speech.

This is a question, sir, addressed to us as the guardians of the interests of the country, and as such, it is purely one of dollars and cents. This building is offered to us at $200,000, which will yield, at six per cent., $12,000 per annum. We are now paying for the rent of this building, the interest upon more than $300,000, if I am correctly informed. We are occupying that building with our offices, and if we did not want it, we should not be occupying it at this time. Therefore it is necessary; and if we do not rent it, it will be necessary to build one like it. And the question is, if we build one sufficient to accommodate the offices now occupying it, can we build one that will reflect credit upon the Government, for as small a sum?

Mr. Chairman, when it is considered that all our public buildings are constructed upon the fire-proof plan, with either marble or granite, and that they are built at the Government contract price, and when we know that the stone, after being carved three feet by two, requires about twelve or fifteen men to draw it upon a barrow some fifty or a hundred yards, at a pace of some ten miles the minute [laughter]—I know I am speaking hyperbolically, [laughter,] but every one who hears me, knows to what I allude—and when we see the process by which our buildings go up, and the way in which the Government is treated in one way or the other, by the contractors, or by those who are under the contractors, I am justified in drawing the inference that a building like that would cost us from $300,000 to $400,000. We all know that a private individual, in building for himself a house such as would cost the Government $400,000, would build it for not much more than one half of that amount.

If that building were put up to the highest bidder, and there were capitalists present who were desirous of investing $300,000, they would jump at the opportunity of buying this house with the view of renting it at six per cent. upon the purchase.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I contend, as a matter of economy, that it is our policy to give $200,000 for a building for which we are paying $18,000 per annum.

A VOICE. Twenty-one thousand dollars.

Mr. MEADE. I choose to say $18,000, because we will have to pay insurance, &c. I would ask my colleague [Mr. McMULLIN] if he has devoted any portion of his time to architecture?

Mr. McMULLIN. As much as my colleague. [Laughter.]

Mr. MEADE. I have been informed that this House is built as substantially, as safely, and as much fire-proof, as any that the Government has put up in the city. We must buy this building or build another; and I do not believe we can build another of the very same materials and of the same dimensions for less than $300,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. As this is a test question, and I suppose our minds are made up, I call for tellers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suggest to my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON] the propriety of modifying his amendment, by moving to strike out the "$200,000" instead of "$50,000," and that will bring us to a test vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will so modify my amendment.

Tellers were then called for and ordered; and Messrs. LANDRY and HART were appointed.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 59.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] having prevailed, "$200,000" is stricken out, and $1 remains.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I propose to strike out "$1," and in lieu thereof to insert $225,000.

Mr. HEBARD. The question was to appropriate "$200,001." That was amended by striking out "$200,000." Now, I submit whether it is in order to amend by inserting another sum?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides, that although the motion to strike out prevailed, it is still in order to amend the pending proposition.

Mr. STANTON. I move to insert, then, $200,002. It is well understood that the Government is now paying $21,000 annually as rent for this building. Some gentlemen say that that is too much, but I wish those gentlemen to understand that the proprietor of this building, so far as the rent is concerned, has the Government in his power; or, in other words, there is such a demand for the building that it is worth the rent the Government pays. He has a lease for five years at that rate, and there is no other building which can be rented suitable for the purposes of the Government for that or any larger sum, because there is no other fire-proof building in the city. The Government is obliged to pay that rent for five years—and I maintain for ten years—for this building, because this is the only suitable building that can be rented in the city. Twenty-one thousand dollars is the interest on $350,000. Then, as has been repeatedly argued, upon the matter of dollars and cents, it is proper economy on the part of the Government to purchase the building at $200,000. Again, sir, I maintain the proposition, and I appeal to members upon the Committee of Public Buildings, that there is not a public building in this city affording the same amount of room as this, any more convenient, any more secure from fire, any more substantial in all of its parts and proportions, that has not cost three times as much; and I maintain that if ever the Government will put up a building affording the same convenience, and equally secure, that it will cost three times as much as this one. Any building you may put up to supply the place of that will cost at least $600,000. This is all that it is necessary for me to say. The Government may purchase this, or it may not; but it is obliged to use it, and it will pay $200,000 over again before it can furnish a building for its own use.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understand the proposition now to be to insert, in almost its precise terms, the original amendment. It is always the habit in the House, when there is a speculation upon hand—

Mr. STANTON. This is a speculation on the part of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that. The Government always speculates very largely—over the left shoulder. [Laughter.] When it is intended to practice a speculation, not to say a fraud, upon the Government, you can find, on the part of many of this committee, a disposition to get up a panic, that if you do not do so and so, some enormous event is to happen hereafter. If the Government does not now give $200,000 for this Winder's Building, it will be compelled to erect another at a cost of $600,000! It will be better for the Government to pay $20,000 or $21,000 per annum for this building as long as it stands, than even to purchase it at $200,000. What will the repairs, the heating, and the taxes upon that building cost? Will it not be more than ten per cent.? Does not everybody know it? And we have the chance of its falling down half a dozen times in the course of twenty years. How are we to prevent the roof from being blown off? When temporary buildings all around it resisted the elements, and stood firm, this same fire-proof building, which cannot resist the slightest squall, had its roof blown across the street. The Government is to be involved in great danger, unless it pays $200,000 for that building—is it? You had better pay $21,000 a year for that structure than for its repairs. Suppose he has a lease upon the Government for five years, at a rent of $21,000 a year—he is bound to keep the building in repair, and pay taxes upon it. The Government is making money by not owning the building. If it falls down, the loss is the individual's. It is a rickety structure; and when a wind comes up, every clerk and head of a bureau is out in the street, expecting the building to fall in. This we know to be so. And my colleague to talk about economy and retrenchment! I do not think he knows how to make that kind of figures; for I have never known a proposition coming before the House for an increase of expenditures, and encouraging prodigality and wasteful extravagance of the public money, that I have not seen my colleague—with due deference to him—upon that side of the question. [Laughter.] I think the Government would make money even to pay fifteen per cent. upon the cost of this building.

Mr. STANTON. Such a charge as the gentleman has made ought to be substantiated by facts. I pronounce it without foundation in fact.

Mr. JOHNSON. I refer to the history of the country for facts, and I challenge the gentleman to repudiate it.

Tellers were demanded and ordered; and Messrs. APPLETON, of Maine, and BOCKWOLD were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the amendment of Mr. STANTON was rejected—the tellers having reported—ayes 55, noes 74.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, then, with the consent of the committee, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I hold in my hand a very popular amendment, which I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer. It is as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to deliver to each of the members and Delegates of the present Congress, who have not already received them, such books as have been furnished to members of the Twenty-eighth, Twenty-ninth, Thirtieth, and Thirty-first Congresses, which were ordered by resolution of the House July 26th, 1832, $115,800:

Provided, Such purchases and expenditures shall be made under the direction of the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives, and that a report in detail shall be made to Congress, at its next session, of the mode and manner of purchase, and where the books were obtained.

The House voted themselves books without making any appropriation. The Committee of Ways and Means, in pursuance of that vote, have reported this necessary appropriation that the books may be got and paid for.

Mr. RIDDLE. Is it customary to have the proviso with the resolution?

Mr. BROOKS. I believe the proviso sufficiently explains itself. I voted against the books. I am opposed to the whole proposition, but feel bound to vote for the appropriation. The Committee of Ways and Means, by the proviso which is appended to the resolution, intend, if possible, to ascertain whether editions of these books are exhausted, whence they come, and whether any further circulation is obtained of them among the people. They have deemed it their duty to inquire into the manner of the purchase, or, at least, to submit that amendment to the consideration of the committee.

Mr. POLK. I move to strike out the proviso of the amendment, which provides that the books shall be purchased under the control of the Committee of Accounts.

I consider, Mr. Chairman, although this amendment emanates from the Committee of Ways and Means, that it is a direct reflection upon the Clerk of this House. When preceding Congresses ordered these books to be published, and furnished them to new members, it has usually been under the direction of the Clerk. I should like to know, sir, what act of the present Clerk has subjected him to this constructive suspicion upon the part of this committee? I stand here to maintain the character of that Clerk, and defend him against those reflections, let them be direct or indirect; and I believe that the high appreciation in which this House holds that officer will protect him from such un-generous and illiberal intimations as the proviso to this amendment carries with it.

And I would like to know, Mr. Chairman, where is the propriety of this action? Has this Committee on Accounts more honor, more integrity, more fairness than the Clerk? No, sir! Are they to supervise his conduct as if he was unworthy of the most implicit confidence? I, for one, will not silently permit the infliction of so gross an injury as the proviso to this amendment implies. I cannot believe that such was the intention of the gentleman from New York; but it is liable to such an injurious construction, and should therefore be stricken out. I would ask another question. Where are we to get these books by this process? Can they be obtained this session? No, sir. When will they come? It may be one, or two, or three Congresses hence, before the members of the present Congress will get the books, if the purchase is subjected to the slow process of supervision by the Committee on Accounts. Indeed, sir, there is no necessity for the proviso to the amendment, as the existing law already provides that the Clerk shall make a detailed report of the expenditure of all funds intrusted to his care; and I therefore ask the House to strike out the proviso.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know that I shall oppose the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK.] In voting for maintaining that proviso I do not intend to cast any reflection upon the present Clerk of this House.

Mr. HOUSTON. The committee do not.

Mr. WALSH. Nor did the committee, I suppose; but it is perfectly manifest that the legislation which Congress has passed has not been carried out. Gales & Seaton originally published these books, under the direction of Congress, and justice requires that so long as they have copies of the works upon hand they should be taken from them. A practice has grown up here—not under the cognizance of the present Clerk, for I am as ready to indorse his honor as the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK.]—and we cannot shut our eyes to the fact by which these books get into the market, and are sold by some persons,—I will not say by whom—and come back to be distributed again. This is not only a fraud upon the legislation of Congress, but a direct injury to the gentlemen who have printed these books; and I would prefer a proviso that Gales & Seaton should be allowed to supply books as far as it is in their power to do it.

Mr. HOUSTON. This proviso will accomplish the same result.

Mr. WALSH. These gentlemen were invited by the legislation of Congress to expend their labor in this way. They are men who live by their profession. They have gone to the expense of publishing these books, and certainly Congress ought to fulfill the implied pledge of taking these books from them so long as they have them upon hand; and I take it for granted, without any particular examination, that the object of the proviso is to enforce that so far as these printers can supply what Congress intended.

Mr. POLK. I understand it has been the custom of the Clerk to do it, and I presume it will be done in this case.

Mr. WALSH. Of course there can be no reflection intended upon this Clerk, for he has never heretofore been called upon to make any purchase of these books.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask the gentleman from Maryland to allow the 102d rule of the House to be read.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly, sir.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Accounts to superintend and control the expenditures of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives; also, to audit and settle all accounts which may be charged thereon; and, also, to audit the accounts of the members for their travel to and from the seat of Government, and their attendance in the House."

Mr. JONES. The appropriation to provide books for the members of the last Congress was made out of the contingent fund, and was thus under the control of the Committee on Accounts, under the provision of that 102d rule. This proviso is to enable the Clerk to buy them without carrying the amount necessary to do it into the contingent fund, consequently the proviso which is there amended was not intended as any reflection upon the Clerk of the House.

The question being upon Mr. POLK's amendment,

Mr. HART demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER and St. MARTIN were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 56.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUNCAN. I move, sir, to amend the amendment by reducing it $30,000; so that it will read $85,800.

I make this motion with a view to submit to the House a few remarks upon this subject of the distribution of books, and to define my own position in regard to it, which I fear was misunderstood by the House from the motion I made the other day. I will begin by saying, in order to avoid any questions being put to me by gentlemen, that I received these books when distributed at the last Congress. Whether I voted for the distribution or not I am utterly unable to say; but I believe the vote was carried then, as it was the other day, without a division, and under the previous question; and I say further, sir, that I have these books at home in my office, where I intend to keep them until I see fit to present them to some literary institution.

I do not object to the distribution of books to members; the copies of the laws, and all books that are in the possession of the House. I have always voted to print and distribute books of exploration and reconnaissance, for the development of the geography and resources of the country, and also the works left by the fathers of the Constitution, illustrating our political history. I am in favor of the distribution of such books; but, sir, I do object to the form in which this matter has been presented to the House from year to year. It is constantly accumulating. The resolution here passed, is to distribute the same books as were distributed to the members of several preceding Congresses, and in that way the pile swells every year. It is like a snow-ball, rolled upon fresh-fallen snow. Now the books distributed last year were rated as purchased, by a paper that I have before me, at $724. Subsequently to that, a variety of works were printed by order of the last Congress, which of course will be included in the distribution this year, swelling the amount up to $800. Where is this to stop?

It seems to me that it is difficult, upon any principle of economy or right legislation, to justify this continually appropriating and accumulating the distribution of books. So far as books are out of print, I think they ought to be omitted from the distribution, and that is the case with relation to Gales & Seaton's edition of the American State Papers, estimated here to cost $235. Now, in moving to strike out $30,000 from the appropriation, I have scarcely come up to the sum which the distribution of this set of American State Papers alone costs, and I venture to say at the same time that they are of comparatively very little value, and will be of comparatively very little value, to the majority of the members of this House. There is another reason: A gentleman stated in his place, in 1850, on this floor, on the authority of a report of the Clerk of the House, that there were but fifteen hundred copies of that edition printed, and that there had been at the time more than fifteen hundred copies distributed by the House of Representatives, to say nothing of those distributed by the Senate. I say, sir, therefore, that you do not add to the number of the copies in the country by continuing to distribute books which are out of print, and that it ought to cease. I say, further, that I believe it to be impossible to supply the members of this House with copies of that work, and that the attempt to do so will involve an evasion of the resolution adopted by the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I will detain the committee but a few moments. When this question was up the other day, I endeavored to obtain the floor to express my views upon this subject. I believe that it may have been proper at the time these books were first ordered to be printed, to print and distribute them, in order that we might, in this way, circulate copies of these valuable works throughout the country. Indeed, this is the only way in which they could be circulated. And I believe that a continuation of the practice may have been called for by the wants of the country up to this present Congress. That, I will not undertake to say, but I wished to say, the other day, that if there were any of these works out of print, we ought not to appropriate money for the purpose of purchasing them. If there are those that are in print, and can be distributed, they might be distributed, but I believe that this thing must stop sometime, and I am willing that it should stop now.

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman, I believe, is not speaking to the amendment. He is not speaking against the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. The gentleman from New York will see the point I am making, if he will hear me.

Mr. DEAN. It is too late in the day. The gentleman is only defining his position.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not rule the gentleman out of order. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. I have but one word more to say. While I agree with much that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DUNCAN] has said upon this subject, I would have taken it better from some member whose conduct upon this subject had always been consistent. A lecture from some one who had heretofore opposed the appropriation would have more effect upon the House; especially if he had voted against the appropriation when he was interested.

Now, sir, the other day I should have voted against the resolution, but my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] thought it necessary to preclude any new member from voting, by reading one of the rules. While I agreed that they should be the judges of their own acts here, I did not see the propriety of thrusting the rule in the faces of new members, and I therefore did not vote at all. Now, I believe that members should be permitted to act as their sense of propriety will dictate to them, and be responsible to their constituents; and if they act wrong, let their constituents hold them to strict accountability. I thought it was not in good taste for my friend from Massachusetts—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I move that the committee rise. It is evident we shall not get through this bill to day.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment to the amendment, and being put, it was rejected.

Mr. FITCH. I offer the following proviso, with no intention of debating it, but I think the committee will see at once the propriety of adopting it:

Provided, That the accounts for the purchase of said books be audited, as usual, by the Committee on Accounts.

The question was taken on Mr. FITCH's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I submit the following amendment to the amendment:

Provided, That reports shall be made in detail at the commencement of the next session of Congress of the mode and manner of purchase of the books, and whence they are obtained.

Several MEMBERS. There is no objection to that.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, if there is no objection, I have not a word to say. I only wish to disclaim any disposition to attack the Clerk of the House. It never entered into my mind.

The question was put upon the amendment to the amendment, and the Chairman announced that he was unable to determine the vote, owing to the confusion that existed in the Hall.

Mr. BROOKS. I have a right to advocate my amendment.

[Cries of "Too late!" "Too late!"]

Mr. BROOKS. Ah, but there is opposition to it.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, after a division is commenced, the gentleman has no right to debate his amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. Have not I a right to my five minutes? If I have not, I shall offer the amendment again in another form. Five minutes I will have, for I am entitled to it under the rule. It never entered into my mind to make a suggestion that could in any way convey an insinuation against the Clerk of this House. I have further to say, that in voting books for members of Congress for their own use, I have no objection when it is done bona fide. I think it should be done. The public owe to us that we should be well informed, and that we should have all the means of information which our own history has given us, and transmitted us by our fathers as matter of public record. My objection is not to the books, but the mode and manner of distributing them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a fact known to this country, that members of Congress sell their books, which have cost $700 or $800, for $100 or $125; and if this House will appoint a committee to make an investigation of my statement, I shall be ready to establish it. Such a fact as that is discreditable to Congress, disgraceful to every member, and calculated to injure this body and degrade it in the eyes of the people, and the House ought to use every means in its power to stop it.

Mr. McNAIR. I will ask the gentleman a question: Whether any new members have sold their books? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. They have not got any yet. I think that new members ought to be entitled to books which are already in print; but as for spending $100,000 every two years, to purchase books over and over again, is a thing which the country will not sustain when the facts go before them; and the character of the House of Representatives will be injured by it. I am mortified myself in being brought into this battle of books. I never allow myself to demagogue. I repeat that I will vote books to every new member who is entitled to them; and if the House wishes these members to have these new books in good faith, let them adopt this proposition, and there will be no objection to it on the part of the people. The House itself cannot trifle with the popular feeling of the country. It is not easy for us to hold our places upon this floor, and trifle with that popular feeling. It is not easy to add an additional per diem to our pay, directly or indirectly, in this way. The best thing we can do for ourselves is, to preserve our own character and our own honor, not only of the minority, but the majority.

If what I have said is incorrect, the report in detail furnished to the next Congress by the Clerk of the House will enable the public to judge whether these accusations are true or not.

Mr. HART. I merely wish to ask the gentleman, if it is not customary for the Clerk to furnish a report in detail to the House, from whom he has made his purchases? If it is customary to do that, why pass this proviso?

Mr. POLK. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is afraid that the new members might squander their books.

Mr. DEAN. I am opposed to the amendment of my colleague [Mr. Brooks] to the original amendment. I am opposed to it for the simple reason that at any rate, whatever may be his motives, and whatever he may disclaim as to any intention of casting censure upon our Clerk, or putting a spy upon his actions, it may be so interpreted.

Mr. FOWLER. As I presented the resolution for the purchase of these books, it is perhaps due to myself to call the attention of the House to the facts contained in that resolution. I wish it to be understood that I prepared that resolution with care and caution. It provides that the purchase of the books shall be made by the Clerk. It provides, also, that the same books shall be purchased which previous members have received. It provides, moreover, that the purchase shall not be made unless there are books in print sufficient to supply the members. These are facts which it is important in this discussion shall be kept in mind. They seem to be overlooked by several gentlemen, and I think by my friend from New York, [Mr. DEAN.]

Mr. DEAN. I do not propose here to make a Buncombe speech, as I think some gentlemen have done. I wish merely to say that I did not vote for this resolution; but the resolution having been adopted by the House, it is perhaps our duty to make the appropriation; go through with it, vote upon it now, and not censure our Clerk, or any officer of this House, particularly, for any political purpose.

Mr. GENTRY. Saturday evenings, in Tennessee, we always keep as holidays. I move that the committee rise.

The question was then taken, and the committee refused to rise.

The question being upon Mr. Brooks's amendment,

Mr. POLK demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER, and CAMPBELL of Illinois were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, offered the following amendment:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay Force and Rives for one hundred copies of the eighth volume of American Archives, or Documentary History of the United States, for new members of the Twenty-eighth Congress; one hundred and one copies of the same volume for new members of the Twenty-ninth Congress; one hundred and sixteen copies of the same volume for new members of the House of the Thirtieth Congress; and one hundred and thirty-four copies of the same volume for new members of the House of the Thirty-first Congress—in all, four hundred and fifty-one volumes, at $13 90.6 per copy—in addition to $649 36, an unexpended balance of a former appropriation, $5,631 25.

This amendment is offered under the instruction of the Committee of Ways and Means. The Clerk reports that these books have been delivered by Force and Rives, the persons who publish them, and with whom different Clerks made contracts for their delivery. The amendment explains itself.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I move that the committee rise.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question was then taken upon Mr. JONES's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have another amendment, embracing several items, from the Committee of Ways and Means. It is the last one I have.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay for reporting and publishing two thousand eight hundred columns of the proceedings of the present session of the House of Representatives in the Daily Globe, at $7 50 per column, $21,000.

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay a balance due for reporting and publishing proceedings of the House, second session Thirty-first Congress, at the rate of $7 50 per column, in the Daily Globe, $649 50.

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay for twenty-four copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix of the first session Thirty-second Congress, for each member and Delegate of the House, $34,272, and for binding the same, being twenty-two thousand seven hundred and fifty-two volumes, in strong and substantial half binding, with Russia leather backs and corners, at a rate not exceeding sixty cents per volume, $13,651 20: Provided, The foregoing expenditures to be made by the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall be under the control and superintendence of the Committee on Accounts.

The first item of $21,000 is to pay for reporting the proceedings of this House, at $7 50 per column, in the Daily Globe. The next item is for a deficiency in the same for the last session.

The question was then taken upon Mr. JONES's amendment and it was agreed to.

Mr. CARTTER. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents, with the advice, and at the request of the Patent Bureau, to offer an amendment, to come in after lines nine hundred and ten and nine hundred and eleven, which read, "for compensation of the librarian of the Patent Office, $500."

The amendment is as follows:

For books for the library of the Patent Office, to be paid out of the patent fund, $1,500. For fitting up the library of the Patent Office, to be paid out of the patent fund, $2,000.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I offer the following amendment:

For the salary of the clerk of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, $1,500.

That officer was created at the last session of Congress, under a resolution of the House, and he was allowed four dollars per day for his services. At the close of the session a resolution was passed continuing him in office for the year, and at the regular pay received by the other clerks of the House. That resolution expires, and unless the appropriation is put into this bill, he gets no salary. It is not provided for by the Committee of Ways and Means. I ask that the House will adopt this amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. The subject was brought up in the Committee of Ways and Means this morning. I understand from gentlemen who have examined the subject, that the clerk is now paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. STANTON. That is certainly a mistake.

Mr. HOUSTON. As I understand it, he is now paid out of the contingent fund. There is no necessity of adopting this amendment.

Mr. STANTON. The Journal shows that the office was created under a resolution of the House at the last session.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am informed by a gentleman near me, that this would increase his salary to $3,000, and make it equal to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. STANTON. I say that it does not. The resolution of last Congress makes it $1,500.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I move that the committee rise; and upon that motion I ask for tellers.

Tellers were called for and ordered; and Messrs. CHAPMAN and HIBBARD were appointed. The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes not counted.

So the committee agreed to rise.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 196, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30th, 1853, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask leave to report the following bill, that it may be printed, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, viz:

A bill making appropriations for certain fortifications in the United States, for the year ending June, 1853.

Mr. ORR. I object.

Mr. LOCKHART. On the 3d Monday in May the Committee on Territories made a report which was laid upon the table, and understood to be ordered to be printed. The Clerk informs me that the order was not made. I desire to have such order now, and the entry made, so that it may be printed.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, it will be so ordered.

On motion by Mr. FOWLER, the House then adjourned till Monday next at eleven o'clock, a. m.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, August 9, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the acting Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a report of the Register of the Treasury, with a statement showing the amount of trust funds in the Treasury at the close of the last four fiscal years, and a comparative statement of the balances, per the annual printed accounts, of the receipts and expenditures, and those stated in the reports of finance for the years ending 30th June, 1849-'50, and '51; which, on motion by Mr. BRIGHT, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report of the Secretary of War, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, calling for estimates of the amounts that can be advantageously expended in the construction of certain fortifications during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1853; which was, on motion by Mr. SHIELDS, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SUPERINTENDENT OF THE CENSUS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a letter written to me by the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to a debate that took place the other day. In justice to him and to myself, I ask the Senate to allow the letter to be read.

The Secretary accordingly read the following letter:

WASHINGTON, August 6, 1852.

SIR: I have this moment seen the report of the debate in the Senate on the 4th instant, in regard to the compensation of the Superintendent of the Census, in which you are represented as saying that the amendment to the apportionment bill was prepared at the Department of the Interior. In this you are mistaken. I addressed a letter to you, which was read in the Senate, suggesting the propriety of additional legislation to remove all difficulties in regard to his compensation, by fixing it at $3,000, but I prepared no amendment, nor did I suggest any form of effecting that object. My order to the disbursing agent was to pay Mr. Kennedy $3,000, in the double capacity of Secretary and Superintending Clerk. My letter to you also excludes the idea of allowing two salaries, as it suggests the propriety of putting him on the same footing with the other heads of Bureaus. If, therefore, you mean when you say "that the amendment was prepared at the Department of the Interior," that it was prepared by me, or under my authority, or that I am in any way responsible for its form, I beg leave to say most respectfully that you are in error, as I neither prepared, authorized, nor sanctioned the amendment in the form it stands, nor do I know who prepared it.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ALEX. H. H. STUART.

Hon. A. P. BUTLER.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the authority upon which I made the statement in the Senate that that amendment was prepared at the Department of the Interior was derived from the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. DOWNS.] I suppose he is still under the impression that it was prepared at that Department, though not by Mr. Stuart. Justice to Mr. Stuart requires me to say—not only from the letter which has been read, but from other sources—that this amendment was never brought to his notice, and was prepared without his knowledge. Whether he should be held responsible for it or not is a different question. But justice also requires me to say that it did not originate with the committee, but that it was prepared by somebody else, and adopted by the committee. I am not perhaps at liberty to say who prepared it. I suppose, however, there is no doubt that it was prepared at the Census Bureau, and at the instance of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BRADBURY,] as well as I can learn. So that the responsibility, if any, should be shared by the head of the Census Bureau and the Senator from Maine. The bill was sent to him, and no doubt he took it as it was prepared, with a view on his part of fixing the salary of the Superintendent of the Census Bureau at $3,000 a year. That was, no doubt, his impression, and if it was Mr. Kennedy's understanding also, there was nothing wrong in the transaction. But I suppose it was prepared at the Census Bureau, and adopted by Mr. BRADBURY. I believe these are the facts.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. STOCKTON presented the memorial of J. P. Pirsson, praying the Government to purchase his patent condenser for supplying the boilers of marine engines with fresh water; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FISH presented a petition of inhabitants of Wayne county, New York, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Great Sodus Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the memorial of Charles Callaghan, for himself and others, praying the United States to purchase the $600,000 of United States Treasury Department certificates of Spanish indemnity; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, three petitions of citizens of New York, praying the extension of Uri Emmons's patent for a planing machine; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. WALKER. I have a resolution, amounting to a memorial, passed at a meeting of the Mechanics' Mutual Protection Society of New York, asking the passage of the homestead bill. I am requested to present it to the Senate, and do so; but as the bill in reference to which the memorial is sent has been reported upon by the committee, I move that the memorial be ordered to be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER presented a memorial of residents of the counties of Fairfax and Alexandria, Virginia, praying an appropriation for the repair of the Long Bridge; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of Joseph M. Hernandez, praying to be indemnified for damages sustained by his plantation in Florida in consequence of its occupation as a military post, &c., submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his further relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred a resolution of the Senate, directing the committee to inquire whether any legislation is necessary or expedient to exempt vessels driven by stress of weather, and anchoring in any of our ports, from the ordinary detentions and requisitions of the custom-house, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. SOULE, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial of Auguste Métafé, asking Congress to allow him compensation for services rendered in the custom-house at New Orleans, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred a memorial of importers of wines, brandies, &c., at New Orleans, praying an increase of the number of gaugers of that port, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill authorizing the collector of the port of New Orleans, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, to appoint three head gaugers; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred a memorial of citizens of Louisiana, residing on the Mississippi river opposite New Orleans, praying that the port of New Orleans be extended to their side of the river bank, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill extending the limits of the port of New Orleans; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be authorized to employ a clerk for the residue of this session, whose compensation shall be the same as that of clerks of other committees of the Senate.

There is an accumulation of business just now before that committee which renders it important that it should have a clerk. I therefore ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have the resolution considered at this time.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and agreed to.

THE LOBOS ISLANDS.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all such correspondence as may have taken place between the United States and Peru regarding the Lobos Islands; and also a copy of such instructions as may have been given to the officer in command of the American squadron, on the subject of vessels loading with guano at those islands—so far as the same, in his judgment, shall be compatible with the public interests.

EXPENSES OF THE SEVENTH CENSUS.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate a statement of all the expenditures for, and on account of the Seventh Census, specifying the following items, to wit:

Amount paid to marshals and assistant marshals for taking census, collecting statistics, &c.

Amount paid for clerk hire in Census Office.

Amount paid for stationery for Census Office.

Amount paid for office rent for Census Office, and to whom paid.

Amount paid for fuel and stove rent, and to whom paid.

Amount paid for furniture for Census Office.

Amount paid for repairs or alterations of the house or houses occupied for the Census Office, and to whom paid.

Amount paid for books, pamphlets, papers, and periodicals, for the use of the Census Office.

Amount paid for freight or transportation to Adams & Co., or other persons, for the use of Census Office, and on what account.

Amount paid for contingent expenses of the Census Office.

Amount paid for arranging and translating European statistics, and to whom paid.

Amount paid for the expenses of the visit of the Superintending Clerk of the Census to Europe; and copies, verbatim, of the vouchers for said expenses furnished by the said clerk.

And resolved further, That said Secretary be directed to state to the Senate the appropriation out of which the expenses of said visit to Europe were paid, and the authority of law for this payment.

As this is a mere resolution of inquiry, as the subject embraced in it is likely to have a bearing upon legislation before the close of the session, and as there is but a short time between this and the close of the session, I ask the Senate to consider the resolution at this time.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

PENSION AGENTS.

On motion by Mr. BORLAND, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 2d instant; and, having been amended, it was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the names of the several agents employed by the Department other than officers of the United States for the payment of interest on the public debt, and of those appointed by the Secretary of the Interior for the payment of pensions since the 4th of March, 1849, together with a statement of the last settled accounts of each of such agents, with date thereof, showing the amount due to or from the United States.

Resolved further, That the said Secretary report what length of time unclaimed dividends of interest are allowed to remain in the hands of agents after the same are due and payable, and how often said agents are required to render their accounts; and what security, if any, is required for the faithful performance of the trusts confided to them.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to furnish the Secretary of the Treasury with the names of each and every pension agent appointed by the Department of the Interior, since the 4th of March, 1849, to enable the said Secretary of the Treasury to respond fully to the preceding resolution.

CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

On motion by Mr. BRODHEAD, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, reported by him on Friday last from the Committee on Claims:

Resolved, That the clerk to the Committee on Claims be continued, at the usual rate of compensation, to be employed during the recesses of the Senate in completing and keeping up the index and digest of the reports of the committee authorized by the resolution of March, 1851; and in discharging such other duties as the committee may require.

At the suggestion of Mr. PRATT, the resolution was modified by the substitution of the word "recess" for the word "recesses;" and it was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

On motion by Mr. STOCKTON, the bill "amendatory of the several acts regulating the appraisal of imported merchandise, and the more effectually to prevent frauds on the revenue, and for other purposes," was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

DEATH OF HON. ROBERT RANTOUL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. HAYES, its Chief Clerk, communicating to the Senate information of the death of the Hon. ROBERT RANTOUL, jr., a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Massachusetts, and the proceedings of the House thereon.

The resolutions of the House of Representatives were read.

Mr. SUMNER said: Mr. President, by formal message of the House of Representatives, we now learn that one of our associates in the public councils has died. Only a few brief days—I had almost said hours—have passed since he was in his accustomed seat. Now he is gone from us for ever. He was my colleague and friend, and yet, so sudden has been this change, that no tidings of his illness even had reached me, before I learned that he was already beyond the reach of mortal aid or consolation, and that the shadows of the grave had already descended upon him. He died here in Washington, late on Saturday evening, August 7th; and his earthly remains, accompanied by the bereaved companion of his life, with a committee of the other House, are now far on the way to Massachusetts, there to mingle dust to dust with his native soil.

The occasion does not permit me to speak at length of the character or services of Mr. RANTOUL. A few words will suffice; nor will the language of eulogy be required.

He was born August 13th, 1805, at Beverly, in the county of Essex, the home of Nathan Dane, author of the immortal ordinance by which freedom was made a perpetual heirloom in the broad region of the Northwest. Here, under happy auspices of family and neighborhood, he commenced life. Here his excellent father, honored for his public services, venerable also with years and flowing silver locks, yet lives to mourn his last surviving son. The sad fortune of Burke is renewed. He who should have been as posterity, is now to this father in the place of ancestor.

Mr. RANTOUL was early a member of the Legislature of Massachusetts, and there won his first fame. For many years he occupied a place on the Board of Education in that State. He was also, for a time, Collector of the Port of Boston, and afterwards Attorney of the United States for Massachusetts. During a brief period he held a seat in this body. Finally, in 1851, by the choice of his native district, remarkable for its intelligence and public spirit, he became a Representative in the other branch of the National Legislature. In all these spheres he performed most acceptable service. And the future promised opportunities of a higher character, to which his abilities, industry, and fidelity would have amply responded. Massachusetts has many arrows in her well-stocked quiver; but few could she so ill spare at this moment as the servant we now mourn.

By original fitness, by study, knowledge, and various experience, he was formed for public service. But he was no stranger to other pursuits. Early devoted to the profession of the law, he followed it with assiduity and success. In the antiquities of our jurisprudence, few were more learned. His arguments at the bar were thorough; nor was his intellectual promptness in all emergencies of a trial easily surpassed. Literature, neglected by many, under the pressure of professional life, was always cultivated by him. His taste for books was enduring. He was a constant student. Amidst his manifold labors, professional and public, he cherished the honorable aspiration of adding to the historical productions of his country. A work on the history of France, wherein the annals and character of this great nation should be portrayed by an American pen, had occupied much of his thoughts. I know not if any part was ever matured for publication.

The practice of the law, while it sharpens the intellect, is too apt to cramp the faculties within the narrow limits of form, and to restrain the genial currents of the soul. It had no such influence on him. He was a Reformer. In the warfare with Evil he was enlisted early and openly as a soldier for life. As such, he did not hesitate to encounter opposition, to bear obloquy, and to brave enmity. His conscience, pure as goodness, sustained him in every trial—even that sharpest of all, the desertion of friends. And yet, while earnest in his cause, his zeal was tempered beyond that of the common reformer. He knew well the difference between the ideal and the actual, and sought, by practical means, in harmony with the existing public sentiment, to promote the interests which he had at heart. He saw clearly that reform could not prevail at once, in an hour, or in a day, but that it would be the slow and certain result of constant labor, testimony, and faith. Determined and tranquil in his own convictions, he had the grace to respect the convictions of others. Recognizing in the social and political system the essential elements of stability and progress, he discerned at once the office of the conservative and the reformer. But he saw also that a blind conservatism was not less destructive than a blind reform. By the mingled caution, moderation, and earnestness of his labors, he seemed often to blend two characters in one, and to be at the same time a reforming conservative and a conservative reformer.

I might speak of his devotion to public improvements of all kinds, particularly of the system of railroads. But here he was on the popular side. There were other causes where his struggle was keener and more meritorious. At a moment when his services were much needed he was the faithful supporter of common schools, the peculiar glory of New England. By word and example he sustained the cause of temperance. Some of his most devoted labors, commencing in the Legislature of Massachusetts, were for the abolition of capital punishment. Perhaps no person since that consummate jurist, Edward Livingston, has done so much by reports, articles, letters, and speeches to commend this reform to the country. With its final triumph, in the progress of civilization, his name will be indissolubly connected. There is another cause, that commanded his early sympathies and some of his latest best endeavors, to which, had life been spared, he would have given the splendid maturity of his powers. Posterity cannot forget this; but I am forbidden by the occasion to name it here. Sir, in the long line of portraits on the walls of the ducal palace of Venice, commemorating its Doges, a single panel, where a portrait should have been, is shrouded by a dark curtain. But this darkened blank, in that place, attracts the beholder more than any picture. Let such a curtain fall to-day upon this theme.

In becoming harmony with these noble causes was the purity of his private life. Here he was blameless. In manners he was modest, simple, and retiring. In conversation he was disposed to listen rather than to speak, though all were well pleased when he broke silence, and in apt language declared his glowing thoughts. But in the public assembly, before the people, or in the legislative hall, he was bold and triumphant. As a debater he rarely met his peer. Fluent, earnest, rapid, sharp, incisive, his words at times came forth like a flashing cimeter. Few could stand against him. He always understood his subject; and then, clear, logical, and determined, seeing his point before him, pressed forward with unrelenting power. His speeches on formal occasions were enriched by study, and contain passages of beauty. But he was most truly at home in dealing with practical questions arising from the actual exigencies of life.

Few had studied public affairs more minutely or intelligently. As a constant and effective member of the Democratic party, he had become conspicuous by championship of its doctrines on the currency and free trade. These he often discussed; and from the amplitude of his knowledge, and his overflowing familiarity with facts, statistics and the principles of political economy, poured upon them a luminous flood. But there was no topic within the wide range of our national concerns which did not occupy his thoughts. The resources and needs of the West were all known to him; and Western interests were near his heart. As the pioneer, resting from his daily labors, learns the death of RANTOUL, he will feel a personal grief. The fishermen on the distant eastern coast, many of whom are dwellers in his district, will sympathize with the pioneer. As these hardy children of the sea, returning in their small craft from their late adventures, hear the sad tidings, they too will feel that they have lost a friend. And well they may. During his last fitful hours of life, while reason still struggled against disease, he was anxious for their welfare. The speech which, in their behalf, he had hoped soon to make on the floor of Congress, was then chasing through his mind. Finally, in broken utterances he gave to them some of his latest earthly thoughts.

The death of such a man, so suddenly, in mid-career, is well calculated to arrest attention, and to furnish admonition. From the love of family, the attachment of friends, and the regard of fellow-citizens, he has been removed. Leaving behind the cares of life, the concerns of State, and the wretched strifes of party, he has ascended to those mansions where there is no strife, or concern, or care. At last he stands face to face in His presence whose service is perfect freedom. He has gone before. You and I, sir, and all of us, must follow soon. God grant that we may go with equal consciousness of duty done.

I beg leave to offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, unanimously, That the Senate mourns the death of Hon. ROBERT RANTOUL, Jr., late a member of the House of Representatives, from Massachusetts, and tenders to his relatives a sincere sympathy in this afflictive bereavement.

Resolved, As a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions were adopted, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 9, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

Mr. MANN said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to perform the melancholy service of announcing the death of the honorable ROBERT RANTOUL, Jr., late a member of the Massachusetts delegation in this House, who expired at his lodgings, in this city, on Saturday evening last, at half-past ten o'clock.

Mr. RANTOUL's illness was very brief; his death, until a short time before he breathed his last, wholly unexpected. He was in his seat here on Tuesday last, and though the death-mark of his disease was then upon him, yet he walked home as usual, foreboding no ill. No prophetic glimpse was vouchsafed to him that his final hour was so near at hand. When he returned home, and shut the door of his dwelling, he little thought he had looked upon this fair and beautiful outward world for the last time; when he retired to his chamber he little dreamed that he should never walk forth from it again; but the stern enemy pursued him; and now the narrower door and the closer apartment of the coffin and the tomb have hidden him from us forever.

The disease of which Mr. RANTOUL died was erysipelas—often, as in this case, a terrible form of death, for it disturbs and deranges the operations of the mind before it subdues the body. The malady had not made great advances with him before it attacked his brain, accompanied by the usual consequences of an inflammation and derangement of that organ. Death seems armed with sufficient terrors when we can meet it with unclouded intellect, and with a heart resigned to the will of God; but certainly those terrors are inconceivably magnified when, as one of the concomitants of the disease, the mind loses its erectness and equipoise, and the laws of its action and motion are suspended; when the thoughts and memories and the images of external objects which the senses convey to the brain are mingled in wild confusion together, and the soul has no home but to wander up and down amid this chaos. How different from that state of peace, and joy, and trust, in which every man hopes to meet the final hour; and does not every truly sane man take measures for the realization of his hopes?

Yet Mr. RANTOUL, even amid the agonies of his disease, had lucid intervals. There were convictions in his mind so deep-seated, and affections in his heart so strong, as to stand unmoved by any tempest of delirium. On being telegraphed respecting the illness of her husband, his devoted and excellent lady, then in Massachusetts, hastened to his succor. She arrived here at six o'clock on the morning of the day he died. Instantly her voice wooed back consciousness and reason. He seized her hand in his, and held it till he breathed his last. Even when his mind wandered, this grasp of affection was unclenched. Death only relaxed it.

The swelling of the disease had closed his eyes, and it was beyond the power of muscular contraction to open them. He desired to have them opened by mechanical means, that he might once more behold the features and the face whence, for more than twenty years, the light of love had shone down into his heart. Thank God, sir, that, amid all the alienations and strifes and hostilities which seem sometimes to flow out of the human bosom as though it were their natural fountain, there are also affections, sympathies, tendernesses, and loves which are inseparable from it; allied to it by a more congenial affinity; and which we always may find there, "close as green to the verdant leaf or color to the rose."

Mr. RANTOUL was born in Beverly, Massachusetts, August, 1805. Had he lived until next Friday he would then be forty-seven years old. He entered Harvard University at the age of eighteen, and was graduated in 1826. He studied law at first with Mr. John Pickering, of Salem, who exemplified in his profession the largest meaning of the word law. He did not consider the law as an arbitrary or artificial scheme of forms and precedents, but as a great system of justice and truth, of God-ordained principles, on which alone, and by which alone, human society and human welfare can be upheld and advanced; nor as an art or device by which to get a living, but as a science by which to guide all life. After Mr. Pickering's removal to Boston, Mr. RANTOUL was in the office of the Hon. Leverett Saltonstall, who was once a member of this House. He was admitted to the bar in 1829.

Mr. RANTOUL soon became a man of mark. In 1834 he was elected to the Massachusetts House of Representatives, from the town of Gloucester, where he then resided; and from that time till his death he filled many public offices, both of a political and of an honorary nature. In 1843 he was made collector of the port of Boston. In 1845 he was appointed United States district attorney for Massachusetts, the responsible duties of which office he performed in a very able manner for about four years. In 1851 he was elected a Senator of the United States by the Legislature of Massachusetts, to complete an unexpired term; and he was chosen, by a very large majority of the people among whom he had always lived, and who knew him best, to the seat in this House now so suddenly and so mournfully made vacant.

But Mr. RANTOUL found time, and possessed taste and aptitude, for other services besides those of a strictly political or professional character. His natural instincts and moral culture led him to engage in worthier and nobler occupations. He was, certainly for very many years, and I believe during all the active part of his life, an earnest, devoted temperance man, a temperance advocate and lecturer, leaving home and the emoluments of his profession to visit and even traverse distant parts of the State to preach the gospel of this great reformation. To him, among others, is Massachusetts indebted for her present advanced position in this world-renovating enterprise—an enterprise which, if successful, will enlarge the imprisoned angels of joy whose home is the fireside and the domestic altar, while it will send to penal chains and darkness the demons who have so long usurped their place.

Mr. RANTOUL adhered to this cause steadfastly, "through evil report;" for, in its early, and even its maturer days, it had no "good report." He resisted the solicitations of the abandoned to abandon this great reform, and rejected the unholy honors with which they tempted him to disloyalty. Who would now exchange his consciousness for theirs!

In 1837, Mr. RANTOUL was appointed by Governor Everett and his Council one of the original members of the Massachusetts Board of Education. This office he held for six years, and until it expired by its own limitation. He was an active and most intelligent member of the Board. He was a wise counsellor and a faithful friend of that cause, then impugned and contested, but now so deeply seated in the affections of the people that it would be as difficult to obliterate it from our social polity as to expunge the judiciary itself. While a member of the Board, Mr. RANTOUL wrote a very able article on the subject of education for the number of the North American Review published October, 1838.

Mr. RANTOUL devoted vast attention and research to the still vexed question of capital punishment; and perhaps it may be said that no man is fitted fully to discuss this theme without reading what he has written.

In the course of his life, Mr. RANTOUL has addressed many literary societies, made political speeches almost innumerable, and has been engaged in legal causes of great magnitude and difficulty; and one thing may be affirmed of all his public performances: he never fell below the occasion, never disappointed the expectations of his most sanguine friends. No greater misfortune can befall a man than to be elevated to a post to which his talents or attainments are unequal. The same man who has been respected and honored in a subordinate sphere may become ridiculous and contemptible in a higher one, to which injudicious friends may advance him. Though it may be the same man, yet we judge of his size by the height of the pedestal on which he stands. He may seem of full stature when near the ground, but dwindle to a pigmy on the top of a column. Hence every promotion has its risk. Mr. RANTOUL encountered all such risks, and not only escaped but always triumphed. Each successive increase in the height of his pedestal only showed his large proportions to better advantage.

Though mainly dependent upon his own exertions for a livelihood, yet Mr. RANTOUL had time for study, and means for libraries and other auxiliaries of eminence, because he never had any time-consuming or mind-weakening vices. He kept himself clean and pure from the miserable personal indulgences of the epicure and the bon vivant, which eat away time and consume means, and set so many a young man back in the race of life, and though often more attractive than alarming at first, generally develop and mature into full-grown and hideous vices afterwards. In abstinence, in industry, in system, he was a pattern for young men. He lengthened life by beginning to perform its duties early.

Mr. RANTOUL's mind was singularly keen and acute. Yet he did not use his keenness and acumen as they are so often used, to cut and pierce at random, but to strike the joint and trace out the marrow of whatever subject he dissected. The working of his faculties was rather judicial than forensic. Logic predominated over rhetoric.

Words were his counters, not his coin. The spectator was less struck by the glitter of his battle-axe than by the precision of its blow. He was of two kindly a nature to generate much satire; yet against oppression and fraud he could be severe. Either consciously or unconsciously, he recognized the great truth that no moral being can see virtue and vice as they are, and the eternal antagonism between them, and love the former without hating the latter. He who thinks it his duty to look complacently upon wrong mistakes torpidity of conscience for charity.

Mr. RANTOUL's attainments were all in harmony with his original cast of mind—not showy, but solid; not gathered for ostentation, but for use. There was depth enough in his stream of thought to make a score of brawling rivulets. In promiscuous company, while the conversation roamed and floated over the levities of literature or the frivolities of history, I have known him to sit by the hour almost dumb; but when the conversation struck into the depth and heart of things, when it discussed the great events that join and articulate the history and fortunes of mankind, then suddenly it became his turn to shine; and he would set forth his principles, and march up his close battalion of facts and arguments for their support, till the rash disputant who encountered him would require a library of books and months of time to study up to his positions.

So far as my knowledge extends, I am not aware that any imputation of personal dishonor or dishonesty ever rested for an hour upon his name; which, for a man so extensively engaged in business and in politics as he was, is the highest certificate of his being that "noblest work of God," an honest man. For years I knew him well, and saw him frequently; and, though differing from him on many points, yet I have said to his opponents a thousand times, and I now say it to the world, I believed him to be honest and sincere. A political man should not be condemned without some great, irrefragable, luminous proof of his blameworthiness; and surely no such can be alleged against Mr. RANTOUL.

But, sir, I will not pursue these remarks, each sentence of which is a fresh remembrancer of our loss. In the vigor of his manhood; his disciplined faculties all ready and eager for effort; his stores of knowledge wonderfully full; his fame already bright and high, though not yet culminated, he has been suddenly stricken down. I do not say that this proclaims to us the vanity and worthlessness of life; for that is a doctrine I do not believe; but do not its admonitions strike us with a voice "loud on the heart as thunder on the ear," proclaiming that it is only those acts of duty and benevolence which survive the actor, and whose effects go on widening and deepening in an unending progression of beneficence after we have departed, that can give true dignity and beauty and nobleness to our transitory existence upon earth? If, as I believe, death is but an event in life, our Book of Judgment, our rewards and penalties in another world, may at least partly consist in our beholding the consequences, then fated and inexorable, of our former conduct.

While remembering the widow and the orphan sons of the deceased, there is a venerable form in that group of family mourners who must not be forgotten. Mr. Rantoul the senior, is a gentleman of more than three score and ten years, of great worth and excellence of private character; for many years a member of one branch or the other of our State Legislature, and universally respected. Of his eight children, six have now gone before him. Our friend, my colleague, was his only surviving son. In such a case truly it may be said, " 'tis the survivor dies." A lone and solitary parent, bereft of his children, has been compared to an aged tree, stripped of its foliage and its limbs, and casting its shade by its trunk, and not by its branches—

"Trunco, non frondibus efficit umbram."

Oh, may the Spirit of God descend with healing, when this last arrow pierces that aged heart!

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House has received with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Honorable ROBERT RANTOUL, jr., a member of this House from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That this House tenders to the family of the deceased the expression of its sympathy on this affecting event; and, as a testimony of respect for his memory, the members and officers of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the family of the deceased, and also to the Senate.

Resolved, That, as a further testimony of respect for the deceased, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, in seconding the resolutions just read, as my feelings prompt me, I trust the House will indulge me while I add a few words to what has been so appropriately and eloquently said by my honorable colleague, who has just taken his seat.

Death, always an impressive messenger, has in this instance stricken down the man strong in intellect, high in career, buoyant in hope, noble in purpose. The arm upon which parental love relied for support with a parent's confidence is palsied in death; the heart which the purest conjugal affection hath long shared has ceased to beat; the voice to which filial reverence was accustomed to listen will no more be heard. "This is the last of earth!" The sorrow that springs from such a visitation of Providence is too deep for description.

In the death of such a son and such a Representative as the Hon. ROBERT RANTOUL, jr., the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has suffered a loss which will be long and deeply felt. The home and domestic circle which this sudden and severe affliction has made desolate, share, I am sure, our sincerest sympathies.

The body of our respected associate is given back to dust; his spirit is returned to Him who gave it. Let us who linger behind for a brief season, be admonished and instructed by this impressive dispensation. May the hand of Providence, thus visible in the midst of us, direct us all to a more faithful discharge of the responsible duties imposed upon us; and may His Spirit lead each of us to a firmer and purer faith in Him who ever liveth, who is the resurrection and the life, and who hath said, "he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die."

I offer the following, in connection with the resolutions already presented:

Whereas the family of Mr. RANTOUL having determined to proceed yesterday to Massachusetts with his remains for interment, and the Speaker of this House having designated a committee to accompany them—

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to pay from the contingent fund of this House, and place at the disposal of said committee for the funeral expenses of the Hon. Mr. RANTOUL, a sum equal to that usually expended in such cases, to be ascertained and drawn for by the committee.

Mr. McLANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, the mournful announcement that has just been made by the honorable member from the State of Massachusetts of the death of Mr. RANTOUL, one of his colleagues, will, I trust, warrant me in making a few remarks on this sad occasion.

How sudden, how unexpected to all of us was this event! But a very few days ago he occupied, as he has done during this session, the seat that is now vacant at my side; but a very few days ago he went forth from this Hall never more to return, for even then the shadow of the wing of the angel of death rested upon him. His active and energetic spirit has taken its departure from earth, and the grave has added to its mouldering trophies the remains of a distinguished man.

Sir, this sudden, sad, startling event is suggestive to all. Its language of warning, admonition, and direction to each one of us is, "Be ye also ready."

I never had any personal acquaintance with Mr. RANTOUL until I met him in this Hall, nearly nine months ago. And although there was a wide difference in some of our political principles and opinions, both in regard to constitutional law and national policy, our personal intercourse has always been most agreeable. The wisdom of the philosopher, the toleration of the Christian, and the politeness of the gentleman ever seemed to dictate and control his conduct towards all who entertained sentiments not in accordance with his own; and it was therefore that his intercourse with the members of this House, generally, was of the most pleasing character.

Mr. RANTOUL is well known to have been all his lifetime a most sedulous student. Possessing a mind naturally prone to investigation, with uncommon power of analysis—a metaphysical subtlety to discriminate, and an iron memory to retain whatever he acquired—it is not to be wondered at that he possessed, what he so justly deserved, an enviable reputation for his extensive and varied learning. His knowledge of jurisprudence gave him a position at the American bar of which the most ambitious aspirant might well be proud. His intimate and critical acquaintance with history, especially with the history of more modern times; his accurate and minute knowledge of the science of political economy and of statistics, rendered him at once an interesting and instructive companion. Sir, the just fame which Mr. RANTOUL's indefatigable industry achieved for him, both as a scholar and a lawyer, is calculated to open up the well-springs of hope and promise in the hearts of our young men who pant ambitiously for such distinction. I have reason to believe that his life, in the delicate and tender relations of a husband and father, was perfectly irreproachable. Whatever loss others have sustained by his death, there are those surviving in his own family circle to whom that loss is irreparable. When death removes a husband and a father, ruptures those affections, and tears asunder those ties which form the primal bonds of society, his work of desolation seems almost complete. Who is there that would not sympathize with the wail of the widow and the cry of the orphan? And yet how utterly unavailable is all human sympathy! May the blessings of Him who alone can give consolation rest upon their desolate hearts.

Mr. MACE. Mr. Speaker, I request the indulgence of the House for a few moments, to add a brief tribute to the memory of the deceased. Prior to the present session of Congress, I had no acquaintance with Mr. RANTOUL, but from reputation. It was my good fortune to form his favorable acquaintance early in the session, and being seated near him, and associated with him as a member of the Committee on Claims, that acquaintance resulted in a mutual friendship, which continued uninterrupted until his last illness. As a companion, he was rationally social in an eminent degree; modest and retiring, yet, on proper occasions, ready to inform, instruct, and enlighten upon subjects of morals, science, politics, and other useful matters, in all of which his mind was well stored. As a legislator, he took a large and liberal view of all questions affecting the interest and well-being of the nation, and was not tied down to his district or State. The generosity and kindness of his nature were manifest in all his acts; he had a strong leaning in favor of the individual and collective rights of the masses, who are unable to compete with wealth and power. By his death the House has lost one of its most distinguished and honored members, and his companions here have lost one that they will long remember with keen and melancholy sorrow. The event admonishes all of us to be "also ready."

Mr. CLARK. I desire that my voice should be heard upon this occasion; and perhaps the best reason which can be given for it is, that I am a son of Massachusetts. This is a sad occasion, which opens again before us the narrow, cold, and repulsive tenement—and it is appointed for each one of us; and it is all the more sad, as the arrows fly thick around, sparing neither the humble nor the exalted. The Destroyer comes and cuts down one in the noontide of life, ere yet time and circumstances had enabled him to develop his powers and acquire a name. He comes again, and takes from the pinnacle of the temple him of far-reaching fame, made up of a long life of noble aspirations and immortal achievements. Again he comes, and tears away another who had power but He who holds the destiny of men in his hands did not suffer it.

"To climb the steep where Fame's proud temple shines afar;"

There is a mournful consolation in a long premonition of the approach of that hour on which eternity is hung. So eager, so absorbed are most men in the interests which lie nearest to them, that they defer the consideration of those which belong to a sure but mystic eternity, unless admonished that they are at hand. To our associate and brother Death came with a stealthy step, and aimed his fatal shaft in ambush. It may be that he was not unmindful of such an encounter and such a result. If so, it was well. If it shall be so with us it will be well.

My acquaintance with Mr. RANTOUL was not extensive or confidential. I can speak of him only as a public man, as a man who has made his mark and established his character by those mental efforts so characterized by great knowledge, acute discrimination, and exalted abilities. I shall say nothing of his party connections or his political opinions; for these he was responsible, not to us, but to those who clothed him with authority and sent him here. His voice in this Hall of legislation was but the voice of nearly one hundred thousand freemen speaking through him under a sense of the inappreciable right of freedom of speech. That his views upon certain great questions of national import did not accord with those entertained by most of us here, is no doubt true. But who shall call in question his sincerity of heart and purpose? The truth of his opinions will be tested by the unerring judgment of public sentiment and future history; the same tribunal which will judge us all.

His views upon some subjects were eminently characterized by expansiveness, liberality, and progress. No man here had more correct, safe, and national views of our commercial relations with other nations than he had; none more extensive and accurate knowledge of the public domain, and the purposes to which it might be legitimately and profitably applied. And, however his opinions upon any subject might have differed from others here, he was always ready to sustain them with reasons worthy the consideration of the strongest and the best. In him the antagonist of skill and power might have found a foeman worthy of his steel.

But it is no part of my purpose to dwell upon any phase of his public character, but rather to improve the moment in a moral point of view. But yesterday the man of vigor, of hope, of virtuous ambition, and cheering prospects, was among us and of us. We heard his voice in the stern debate, contending for the right as he understood it; to-day his vigor is as the withered grass, his hope as the light which has expired; his ambition is chilled, and his prospects are beyond the boundary of mortal vision. "No flattery now can soothe the dull, cold ear of death."

Who shall refuse to stand admonished by the lesson before him? Who will forget that "life is a short uncertain day;" and who will shut his eyes to the accumulated responsibilities which lie beyond it?

It is not wrong to strive for the splendors of honor and reputation; but their elements should be made up of truth, justice, and charity; and all that is acquired in violation of these will be, like the memory of the wicked, "to rot." Day by day we are called to the discharge of arduous duty, which is sometimes mingled with anxiety and strife. Should not our feelings be chastened as we behold the consummation of life in one, while yet the great works which he had projected were but half completed? Should we not remember that our dwelling-place is in the dust?

Life has been compared to an ever-flowing stream, and most fitly. It bears us, in our waking and our sleeping hours, down its current, and out upon that wide expanse from which there is no reflux course. And how rapidly each one of us may be nearing the great bend which shall disclose it in wonder to his vision, none can tell; but to him who has nobly done all his duty it can be matter of but little concern.

"There Faith lifts up her cheerful eye
To brighter prospects given,
And views the tempest passing by,
The evening shadows quickly fly,
And all's serene in Heaven."

The question was taken upon the several resolutions, and they were unanimously adopted.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 10, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

After which the reverend gentleman announced, with the permission of the President, the death of a child of the Hon. W. M. GWIN, Senator from California, and invited the members of the Senate to attend the funeral this afternoon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate calling for information in relation to the revenue collected by James Collier, late collector of the customs at San Francisco; which was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

Also, a report of the Secretary of the Interior, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate calling for information in relation to the public lands in the State of Louisiana; which was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented a petition of the clerks in the Washington city post office, praying to be allowed extra compensation; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CHASE presented three petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying that the bill commonly known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, presented a petition of ladies of Memphis, Tennessee, praying that the grounds and buildings formerly used as a public arsenal, may be granted to the "Widows and Orphans' Asylum of Memphis;" which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MALLORY presented the petition of John G. Camp, late marshal of Florida, praying that the accounting officers of the Treasury may be directed to settle his accounts on the principles which now govern marshals' accounts in like cases; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOUCEY presented resolutions of the Legislature of Connecticut, approving of the acts of the last Congress known as the "compromise measures;" which were read, and ordered to be laid upon the table and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of James P. Delacour, only son of James Delacour, praying to be allowed bounty land for the services of his father in the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SHAWNEE INDIANS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have been requested to present to the Senate the memorial of Blackhoof, Joseph Parks, Sar-ke-se-moe, and Spy Buck, delegates from the Shawnee nation of Indians. In this petition, which is lengthy, they set forth their relations to the United States, and refer especially to the prosecution of the claim which has been under the consideration of the Senate. They also show that in consequence of delays in obtaining their claim, upon advice, it was found necessary to employ an agent; that they accordingly employed Mr. Richard W. Thompson to assist them in the prosecution of their claim. They set forth the contract entered into with him, and the manner in which that engagement took place. Having stated all this, they proceed to state that they do not think that they could accept a patent for a hundred thousand acres of land within the bounds of the fifty miles square granted to their brethren, the Missouri Shawnees, without doing them injustice; that they are not willing to do them injustice by excluding them from any portion of the land to which they are entitled by the treaty of 1825. They conclude this long petition by asking Congress to consider the whole circumstances of the case, and, if they please, to make them a pecuniary compensation instead of a compensation in land.

They further state, that as they represent the whole nation, and as Mr. Thompson is the attorney of the nation, they will agree to give a receipt in full for all claims they may have against the United States growing out of the treaty of 1831. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I trust that that committee will give it their careful consideration before the Indian appropriation bill is finally disposed of, and endeavor to settle the controversy now existing, if possible.

Mr. WALKER. During the debate on a previous day, on the item of appropriation concerning these Indians, I said that if the amendment then under consideration was defeated, I would offer a section proposing to set apart the 100,000 acres of land appropriated to the Ohio Shawnees by the treaty of 1831. I have drawn this section in compliance with my pledge at that time:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be partitioned and set apart to those Indians heretofore known as the Ohio Shawnees in severally the 100,000 acres of land stipulated in their favor by the treaty of 1831; the said 100,000 acres of land to be partitioned and set apart within the fifty miles square granted to the Missouri Shawnees by or in virtue of the treaty with them of 1825.

I intended to offer this amendment at the proper time, but as I understand the memorial just read, these Shawnees do not desire to have the land set apart for them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will repeat that they state that if the 100,000 acres is set apart to them in severally, under the treaty of 1831, they conceive that it will be doing injustice to the Missouri Shawnees, whom they regard as having a right to occupy any portion of that fifty miles square, and they are apprehensive that the Missouri Shawnees will regard these Ohio Shawnees—for I believe these persons who are here are of the Ohio tribe—as attempting to provide for their portion of the tribe improperly; and they say, in their petition, that such an act would destroy the peace and harmony existing among them at home. They are not, therefore, willing to do anything which would bring upon them the odium of that charge, and disturb the harmony now happily existing between all portions of the nation, as now amalgamated by the union of the two portions of the tribe. That is as I understand the matter.

Mr. WALKER. It then amounts to an objection on the part of the Ohio Shawnees, to have a partition of 100,000 acres set off to them. The reasons on which that objection is based, may be very good; I am inclined to think they are. But that only strengthens the conviction that rested upon my mind during the debate the other day, that they would not consent to have the 100,000 acres set off to them within the fifty miles square. In other words, they do not want the treaty carried out specifically, but they want money in lieu of it. The reason for that, I said, was very obvious, which was that interested agents might get their share of the money; whereas if land was given, they could not get anything.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The petition shows that this agent was not employed until their claim was rejected, and they had received advice that an agent was necessary to enable them to succeed in securing the claim.

Mr. WALKER. That is usually the case. The petition was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ATCHISON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Samuel Brenton, praying that a claim allowed to T. A. H. Edwards, and erroneously paid to James McKay, may be investigated, and relief afforded to the lawful owners of said claim, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and papers; which was agreed to.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of the executors of Henry Eckford, deceased, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FISH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the several memorials of citizens of Erie county, Pennsylvania, and the resolutions of the Legislature of that State, in favor of the establishment of a navy-yard and dry-dock on the lake frontier, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

He also submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Otway H. Berryman, praying to be allowed the amount of money paid by him in the adjustment of his accounts as purser, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of R. M. Heath, the agent of the State of Virginia, praying that certain moneys expended by that State in organizing the Virginia regiment of volunteers for the Mexican war be refunded, submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of the agent of the State of Georgia, praying that the accounting officers of the Treasury Department may be authorized to allow and pay all accounts intended to be provided for by the act of Congress of 11th August, 1842, "providing for the settlement of the claims of Georgia for the services of her militia, &c., when it shall be made to appear that the State has allowed and paid the same," submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment in each case, which he intends to offer to the bill to appropriate money for the support of the Army, when it comes up for consideration.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Printing, which was directed to inquire into the expediency of printing an additional number of the papers which accompanied the President's message in relation to the fisheries, submitted a report in favor of printing two thousand additional copies thereof; which was agreed to.

THE FALLS OF THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred a bill to provide more effectually for overcoming the obstruction to the navigation of the Ohio river at the Falls thereof, have had the subject under consideration, and at the same time have taken into consideration various petitions and memorials from different points of the United States to the same effect, and have directed me to make a report in writing, and ask that the bill which was referred to them be laid upon the table, and to report two bills upon the petitions referred to them. I move that the bill which was referred to the committee be laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that a bill was referred to the committee, and they report it back and move that it lie upon the table. There were petitions of a similar character before the committee in answer to which they report two bills, which bills will have their first reading.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is it not unusual to report back a bill, and lay it upon the table immediately?

The PRESIDENT. The object is to get the bill out of the way, in order to take up the bills which are reported in answer to the prayer of the petitioners.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will state that the committee had a bill referred to them, the object of which was to overcome obstructions at the Falls of the Ohio river. They had also referred to them various petitions and memorials from different parts of the United States having the same object in view. The committee, after examining the whole subject, have directed me to prepare a report giving the reasons pro and con why they arrive at the conclusion that the bill referred to them should be ordered to lie upon the table, and at the same time introduce two new bills, one having for its object the transfer of the Louisville and Portland canal to the State of Kentucky, the other for the purpose of establishing a canal on the Indiana shore. Now, I apprehend it is entirely proper to ask that the bill which was referred to the committee be ordered to lie upon the table, with the view of taking up the bills which are reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator makes two separate reports. The first is, that the bill which was referred to the committee be laid upon the table. That is the first question. The next is upon the petitions, in answer to which they report two bills. They will be taken up in their order, and read a first time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why not report the bill back, and let it go on the regular orders?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot say; but the report of the committee is to lay the bill which was referred to the committee upon the table.

The bill was ordered to lie upon the table.

The following bills, reported from the committee, were then severally read a first time, and passed to a second reading:

A bill for the construction of a national arsenal, armory, and foundry, at the Falls of the Ohio river, in connection with a public canal for the use of the army and navy, trade and commerce, and for the supply of water power for manufacturing ordinance and arms for the use of the United States; and

A bill for the relinquishment to the State of Kentucky of the stock held by the United States in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, with a view of making that canal free to navigation and commerce.

The report was ordered to be printed.

TRANSFER DRAFTS, ETC.

Mr. WELLER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, a statement of the amount of each and every transfer draft issued since the 1st of January, 1850, on any of the depositaries in favor of other depositaries, or the Treasurer of the United States at Washington; specifying the date of each of such drafts, and the dates at which they were respectively payable and paid, to the depositaries in whose favor they were drawn. Also, the mode by which said transfers were made, stating particularly whether made in charge of officers of the United States, or by private individuals, corporate banks, private bankers, or brokers, with their respective names, or in any other manner, and the expense of making each, together with copies of all correspondence or instructions in relation to each of such drafts. Also, a statement of each and every order issued since January 1, 1850, (other than transfer drafts or treasurer's checks or warrants,) and by whom issued, on collectors or receivers, whether depositaries or not, requiring them, or any of them, to pay over money in their hands to any depositary, or to any other officer of the United States, or to any person or persons or corporations not creditors of the United States, with the date and amount of each of such orders, when payable, to whom and when paid; and by whom such orders were respectively collected, with the expense of collecting each; also, copies of all correspondence or instructions in relation to such orders. Also, a statement showing the amount and date of each of such transfer drafts or orders, if any, which were not paid at maturity, or are now due and unpaid; on whom drawn, in whose favor, with the name or names of the person or persons employed to make such transfers, or collect such orders. And if any such be unpaid, although due, what measures have been adopted to secure the amounts so unpaid. Also, if any security, and what, was given to insure the prompt payment into the Treasury, or to any depositary, of every such transfer draft or order, when made, or collected by others than officers of the United States.

CADWALADER WALLACE.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, the bill for the relief of Cadwalader Wallace was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to provide that the President of the United States shall be authorized and required to cause to be ascertained what lands are held and owned by Cadwalader Wallace, in that part of the Virginia military reservation which lies between Ludlow's and Roberts's lines, and south of the Greenville treaty line, in the State of Ohio, upon locations made between those lines, in conformity to the laws of Virginia, since the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Doddridge's lessee against Thompson and Wright, under and in virtue of Virginia military warrants issued for services in the Virginia line on continental establishment; and that he also cause to be ascertained what amount of money was received into the Treasury from the sale of the same lands by the United States, and that he thereupon shall pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Cadwalader Wallace, the money so received from the sale of said lands, so as aforesaid held and owned by the said Cadwalader Wallace: Provided, That before such payment shall be made, the said Cadwalader Wallace shall relinquish, by deed or deeds of conveyance to the United States, in such manner as the President shall direct, his title to said lands.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 11, 1852.

NEW SERIES.....No. 135.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senate will listen to me one minute, I will explain the whole of this matter. It is known that Virginia reserved a tract of country in the State of Ohio to satisfy her bounties promised the officers and soldiers of the Revolution. A man by the name of Ludlow was sent out at an early period to run the line. He did run it, but run it wrong, as the Supreme Court determined.

After that, a man by the name of Roberts was sent out to run the line. He ran it some miles west of the line which Ludlow had run. Mr. Wallace located his land between the two lines. The Supreme Court determined that the western line is the true one. In the mean time, however, the Government of the United States had sold out these lands to private individuals, and put the money in the Treasury. Now, the proposition is to pay the money which the Government has received to Mr. Wallace, upon his relinquishment of the claim to this land, which the Supreme Court determined was subject to the warrants. There is the whole case.

I think myself that Mr. Wallace is entitled to the interest upon the money; but deferring to the judgment of the Committee on Public Lands, who refused to pay interest, I will not move an amendment to the bill, as I thought I would. He has been applying for this money for a long time—ever since I have been a member of the Senate, and how much longer before that in the other House, I do not remember. The bill simply proposes to ascertain the quantity of land to which he was entitled, and to pay him the money, the Government having sold it pending this contest.

Mr. CASS. I would ask the honorable Senator if Congress did not pass an act some years ago, making provision for the payment of General McArthur, under similar circumstances?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under the same circumstances precisely. General McArthur located his warrants between these two lines; and the Government paid him a great deal more than this bill will give Mr. Wallace.

Mr. CASS. That case I think was brought before the Supreme Court, which decided in favor of the applicant, and upon that the act was passed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir, the gentleman's recollection of the case is correct.

Mr. SHIELDS. If I understand the case, there was a dispute about the lines, as stated by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. Mr. Wallace claimed the right to locate his warrants on that land.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Between the two lines.

Mr. CASS. I can state the facts in the case. The claim arises from the original Virginia grant, at the cession of the Northwest Territory, which reserved for the satisfaction of warrants granted by Virginia to her officers and soldiers in the revolutionary war, the country between the Scioto and Little Miami rivers. The reservation was made when the topography of the country was not understood. The Little Miami is much the smaller stream. The Scioto runs in a northwesterly direction, and almost encircles the Miami. Israel Ludlow, whom I knew very well, went from what he considered the head spring of the Little Miami, to the head spring of the Scioto, which took an entirely different direction from what Virginia originally contemplated; and in doing that, the claimants under the Virginia grant claimed that he went too far east—that he did not strike the head spring of the Scioto river, and consequently that he took off a considerable tract that belonged to the original grant; and I suppose it was upon that the case turned before the Supreme Court. They decided that this mistake occurred. I suppose it was upon that point that the question turned; but if I recollect aright, General McArthur's claim had been asserted and determined by the courts. I will ask the honorable Senator in what way Mr. Wallace's claim originated?

Mr. SHIELDS. That is the point I wish to inquire into. I have a perfect recollection of having examined this case formerly, when connected with the General Land Office; and my recollection of the distinction between the two cases was, that General McArthur made his location within the time allowed by law; whereas the other applicant neglected to make his in that time; and after the land had become the property of others, he made a location, or tried to make a location, if my recollection is correct; which was set aside. Now, what I wish to ascertain is, what amount of money, what relief is to be given to this claimant, who, if my recollection be right, notwithstanding the difference of the surveys, neglected to make his location when the law authorized him to do so? What is the amount of money he is to receive?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is $40,000, or $50,000, or $60,000. I cannot be more specific. It is a pretty considerable claim.

Mr. SHIELDS. My view of the case, when I examined it, was this—I recollect I examined it carefully at the time, though I forget the circumstances now—that the claimant was entitled to that amount of land in some other portion of the country. But I was opposed to allowing him money for it, or to allow the value of the land he claimed when he wanted to make his entry; for the land had improved in value, perhaps a hundred fold. Had he made his location at the proper time, the land was only of ordinary value. But it came into the hands of others, and the country around was improved. He then came forward and claimed the land which had been enhanced in value to an enormous amount. When it was my duty to examine the claim—I am not able now to go into the circumstances—the conclusion to which I came was, that he was entitled to the same quantity of public land anywhere else; but as to giving him the amount of money that is claimed, I cannot agree to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will simply state, that Mr. McArthur got land elsewhere, according to the value of his land which had been taken between the two lines. This man is very willing and anxious to receive the same measure of justice which was meted out to Mr. McArthur; but the committee refused to give land according to the value of that between the two lines. They said he might have the money which the Government got from the sale of his land. In regard to the location—it has been subject to location up to within the last two years; and a bill is now before the Senate—it has not yet passed—authorizing the time for the locating of the land to be further extended; so that there is no objection on that score. It has been time and again extended, and the time only expired about two years ago—I do not recollect precisely how long ago; but there is a bill now before this body for its further extension. Mr. McArthur got land elsewhere, according to the value of his land which the Government had appropriated; and in that way he got four or five acres for one. This individual was willing to have taken that; but the committee refused to give it. I thought that he ought to have had interest on the money which the Government had pocketed, from the time he claimed it; for the Government was in default from that time, and not till then. But the committee concluded that he was entitled to the money which the Government actually received, and nothing more; and that is what the bill proposes to give him.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow, for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope there will be no more discussion upon the bill, but that we may vote upon it now.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, "making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30th, 1853."

Mr. ATCHISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer several amendments. The first is to insert the following:

Sioux of the Mississippi.

For fulfilling treaties with the Sioux of the Mississippi, to wit:

Payment to the chiefs of the See-see toan and Wah-pay-toan bands of the Dakota or Sioux Indians, to enable them to settle their affairs, comply with their present just engagements, for expenses of removal of said bands from the lands ceded, and for subsistence of themselves for one year thereafter, per first clause of fourth article of treaty of 23d of July, 1851, ratified by the Senate of the United States on the 23d of June, 1852.....$275,000 or this amount, to be laid out under the direction of the President, for the establishment of manual labor schools, the erection of mills and blacksmith shops, opening farms, fencing and breaking land, and for such other beneficial objects as may be deemed most conducive to the prosperity and happiness of said Indians, per second clause of the same article and treaty.....30,000

For interest, at the rate of five per centum, on the sum of $1,360,000, per same article and treaty..68,000

For interest, at the rate of five per centum, on the sum of $112,000, to be added to the trust fund provided for in the fourth article, being the amount allowed in lieu of the reservation set apart in the third article, containing 1,120,000 acres, at ten cents per acre, per Senate's amendment to the aforesaid treaty.....5,600

For payment to the chiefs of the Med-ay-wa-kan-toan and Wah-pay-koo-tah bands of the Dakota or Sioux Indians, to enable them to settle their affairs, and to comply with their present just engagements, for expenses of removal of the said Indians from the lands ceded, and for subsistence for themselves for one year thereafter, per first clause of fourth article of treaty of 5th August, 1851, ratified by the Senate of the United States, on the 23d June, 1852.....220,000

For this amount to be laid out under the direction of the President, for the establishment of manual labor schools, the erection of mills and blacksmith shops, opening farms, fencing and breaking land, and for such other beneficial objects as may be deemed most conducive to the prosperity and happiness of said Indians, per second clause of the same article and treaty.....30,000

For interest, at the rate of five per centum, on the sum of $1,160,000, per same clause, article, and treaty.....58,000

Amounting in the aggregate to.....$590,050
Provided, That no portion of the money appropriated for the purposes aforesaid shall be applied until said Indians shall express their assent to the treaty as amended by the Senate.

Mr. President, it will be observed that every item contained in the amendment which I have proposed is to fulfill a treaty stipulation. It is for the purpose of carrying out the treaty lately ratified by the Senate between the United States and the Sioux of the Upper Mississippi. The Senate made certain amendments to that treaty which the Sioux Indians have not yet assented to. I have inserted in the amendment a proviso, requiring that they shall give their assent to the amendments of the Senate before the appropriations shall be used.

Mr. HUNTER. I would ask the Senator from Missouri if this constitutes one amendment, and if it is to carry out the treaty with the Sioux which has been recently ratified by the Senate? Are all these provisions to fulfill stipulations in that treaty?

Mr. ATCHISON. I have said that they are.

Mr. HUNTER. What is the total amount?

Mr. ATCHISON. Six hundred and ninety thousand and fifty dollars.

Mr. HUNTER. I have no doubt that the Committee on Indian Affairs have examined this matter, and as I have not examined it, I shall be governed by their action.

Mr. ATCHISON. This is a conditional appropriation. If the Sioux Indians assent to the treaty as made by the Senate, this money is to be used to comply with the provisions of the treaty. These estimates were sent to me from the Department of the Interior. I have examined them, and compared them with the treaty, and I have inserted, of my own accord, a proviso that not one dollar of the money is to be used until the assent of the Indians shall be obtained to the Senate's amendment, to the treaty.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATCHISON. The next amendment which I wish to offer, is to insert the following:

For presents to the Camanches and Kiawas, and other Indians on the Arkansas river, and to enable the President to treat with said Indians, $20,000.

I have a communication from the Department of the Interior on this subject, but I will briefly state the reasons for the amendment, so that it will perhaps be unnecessary to read the communication. The Camanches, in very large numbers, and the Kiawas, are now, and they have been for some time past, on the Arkansas river, and certain presents are expected by them. They say they have been promised presents by Mr. Fitzpatrick, the Indian agent at the head of the Arkansas river. For the purpose of keeping the peace, and permitting trade and travel to go on uninterruptedly on the great route from the United States to New Mexico, it is deemed necessary that this appropriation should be made in order to give these presents to the Indians. I admit that it is a tribute paid for the purpose of keeping the peace; but if we can purchase peace at the expense of presents to the amount of $20,000 with these tribes of Indians upon this route, we shall do well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATCHISON. The next amendment which I wish to offer, is to insert—

For the Omaha Indians, $25,000—$5,000 thereof to be expended annually under the direction of the President for the relief and improvement of said Indians.

I have a communication from the Department on this subject, the substance of which I will state. These Omaha Indians own territory above the Council Bluffs, not far from the town called Kaneshville, on the north side of the Platte river. Directly through their country passes all the emigration to California and Oregon, by the northern route. There came on a delegation last winter making complaints to the President; they say they are a small band, perhaps three or four hundred in number, all told; that they are not strong enough to go upon the plains and subsist themselves by buffalo hunting; that they rely upon the small quantity of corn and potatoes, and other vegetables which they raise, and the game in their country for subsistence—principally upon the latter, and that now, since this immense emigration to California and Oregon has set in, passing directly through their country, it has driven the game out of it; that the emigrants destroy their timber and use their grass. They ask some compensation for this. They allege that they have always been upon friendly terms with the United States; that they have scrupulously complied with all the treaties which they have made with the Government; and that the Government has violated those treaties by permitting this emigration to pass through their country. They ask the Government to give them some compensation for five years, until they can open farms and subsist themselves by agriculture. The committee were of opinion that their demand was reasonable, and, therefore recommended the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. Is there a proviso, that the payment of this money shall cease at the end of five years?

Mr. ATCHISON. There is only $25,000 appropriated—$5,000 are to be expended annually; so that it must cease at the end of five years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATCHISON. The next amendment which I have to propose, is based upon estimates made by the Superintendent of Indian Affairs. It is to insert:

For expenses of the California superintendency, to wit:
Salary of the Superintendent..... $4,000
Salary of clerk to the Superintendent..... 2,500
Office rent, stationery, fuel, lights, and postage on official letters..... 7,500
Messengers..... 2,500
Interpreters..... 3,000
Contingent expenses, including the traveling expenses of agents in their districts..... 12,500
Presents and provisions for Indians visiting the Superintendency..... 3,000
Traveling expenses of the Superintendent and the necessary attendants on visits of inspection, including the purchase of animals and camp equipage..... 5,000

Furniture for Superintendent's office..... 1,000
One iron safe for Superintendent's office..... 1,000
Flags for distribution among the tribes..... 500
$42,500

Mr. President, there are two items in this amendment for which I think the estimates are very high, and which I shall propose to amend. Let me go over the estimates. The first is $4,000 for salary of the Superintendent. That is the salary provided by law. The next is $2,500 for the salary of his clerk. That also is the salary provided by law. The next item is for office-rent, stationery, fuel, lights, and postage on official letters, $7,500. My impression is, that this item is very extravagant. I cannot see how the sum can possibly be expended. I consulted with the Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER,] in relation to it, and he was of the opinion, if I understood him right, that, although rent was extravagantly high in California, compared with house-rent here, or anywhere on the eastern portion of this continent—yet $3,500 would be sufficient for this purpose. At all events, that appropriation can now be made, and if it should turn out to be insufficient, a larger appropriation may be made at the next session of Congress. I move to amend the amendment by striking out in this item, "$7,500," and inserting "$3,500."

The next item is $2,500 for messengers. If these messengers be used for the purpose for which the Superintendent proposes to use them, as expresses to send from one portion of the country to the other in his communications with different agents and different tribes of Indians, I think it may be well enough, and that the sum is not unreasonable; but if the messengers are merely to be about the office, I think the amount is very unreasonable; but he has written a letter, in which he explains the matter. The next item is for $3,000 for interpreters. That, I suppose, is as small a sum as they can possibly get along with in California. The next item is $12,500 for contingent expenses, including the traveling expenses of the agents in their districts. I do not know what these contingent expenses are, but I have a statement here of what he supposes them to be. Let that pass. The next is for traveling expenses of Superintendent and necessary attendants on visits of inspection, including the purchase of animals and camp equipage, $5,000. I suppose that will be reasonable. At all events, if the money is not expended, the Superintendent, being an honest man, will carry the balance to the credit of the United States. The next item is $1,000 for furniture for the Superintendent's office. The Senate had this question before them when the deficiency bill was under consideration, and then, I believe, it was ruled that $300 would supply the Superintendent's office with furniture; but I propose to amend this item by inserting "$500" instead of "$1,000." The next item is $1,000 for an iron safe. I am not acquainted as to that, but I suppose a good safe would cost that amount by the time it could be got to California. The next item is $500 for flags for distribution among the Indian tribes. I suppose that is not more than enough. If any Senator requires a further explanation, I will send to the Chair the estimates made by the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, which may be read.

Mr. WELLER. I doubt very much whether $3,500, which the Senator from Missouri proposes as an amendment to the item for office-rent, stationery, fuel, lights, and postage, will answer the purpose designed. I understood the Senator from Missouri originally to intend merely to reduce the amount of rent, and I informed him in conversation that the rent of a proper office would not cost more than $3,000; but I understand him now to propose to reduce the whole item, including rent, stationery, fuel, lights, and postage, to $3,500. I do not know that that will answer the purpose, though I am very confident that an office can be obtained in California, even in San Francisco, at $200 or $250 per month; but I shall interpose no objection to the amendments of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BELL. I wish to offer the following amendment:

For supplying a deficiency in the appropriations heretofore made for removing the Choctaw Indians, as estimated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $37,412.

The PRESIDENT. Is that in conformity with estimates?

Mr. BELL. Precisely in conformity to the estimates furnished. I know that when this subject was up before, a question was made as to the reception of this claim as an amendment to an appropriation bill, upon the allegation that it was a private claim. I present it now in a shape which I think is conformable sufficiently and in substance to the rule, and I hope there will be no objection to it. This amendment provides for the claim of William B. Hart. His name is not mentioned, because he is really not the beneficiary. The interest in the claim is held by a number of persons, assignees of the parties concerned, because I believe, without any exception, all concerned are bankrupted by the transaction. It is a distribution, according to some equitable principles, among the whole of them; and the Department recommends this appropriation as a consideration for the interference of the Government in the removal. This is a question which has been considered during two preceding sessions, and has received the sanction of the Senate. The Committee on Indian Affairs were unanimous upon the subject. The committee prepared a report upon the subject some two years ago. The claim had been pending before the Indian Office for many years, and that Office had recommended it to Congress. The Department of the Interior has made an estimate for the payment of this sum, and it is included in the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, sent in at the present session of Congress, and stands as a part of the annual estimates of the Indian Department for the present year.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will read the rule, and the Senate can decide whether the amendment is in order. Rule 30 is:

"No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments; and no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, although the same may have been previously sanctioned by the Senate."

It is for the Senate to decide whether or not this is a private claim.

Mr. HUNTER. I believe that on a previous occasion the Senate decided that this was a private claim, when it was offered as an amendment to the deficiency bill. It seems to me that it is a private claim. I think it very desirable that we should give some construction to this rule, which would make it efficient for the purpose designed. It seems to me that all appropriations should be considered as for private claims, except those that are in pursuance of some law, or of some treaty, or for the current service of the year. The general appropriation bills should be devoted to those objects—to carry out existing laws and treaties, and to provide for the current service of the year. You have, however, to make allowances to individuals, commissioners, ministers, charges, &c., for whom there is no previous appropriation. It seems to me very desirable that all other matters containing appropriations, should be excluded from general appropriation bills. It is necessary in many points of view. I hold that it will enable the Senate to act more understandingly upon the appropriation bills, if they are confined to provisions for existing laws and treaties, and for the current service of the year. Another reason is, that it seems to be the fairest mode of legislation between the two Houses of Congress. Why is it that gentlemen wish to get private bills upon the general appropriation bill? In order to force those private bills upon the consideration of the other House. Gentlemen say that it is useless to pass private bills here, because they are not considered in the other House. It seems to me that it is not quite fair, as between the two Houses, to use the appropriation bills for the purpose of forcing particular and favored cases on the consideration of one House or the other, and make them either pass those claims or reject the general appropriation bills. It is in some measure making them legislate under duress in relation to these things.

But the great reason, it seems to me, why this rule should be strictly construed, and why it should be absolute, is, that it will enable us, to ward the close of the session, to understand the appropriation bills, and do no mischief when we pass upon them—that we may know what we are acting upon. But if claims of this sort are brought up, how are we to know? We are dependent entirely upon those gentlemen who present, or it may be upon those committees who present them and who have considered them, to be informed in relation to their merits. There would not be time between now and the day fixed for the adjournment to consider these appropriation bills if we once relax the rule and allow private claims to come in, because we shall then have to consider all these claims.

I defer very much to the judgment of the Senator from Tennessee; I have great respect for his opinions upon these questions, but I have not examined this claim; I do not know its merits. If the Senate determine that it is in order as an amendment to this bill, we shall have to be informed upon the merits of the claim. It will be our duty to look into it. And when shall we end this bill if we once open this door? There are a great many other private claims in relation to our Indian affairs, and if we once open the door I do not know when we shall end the bill. It is now over a fortnight since the bill was reported to the Senate, and if we open it to claims of this sort, we may expect to be engaged upon it for another week.

Mr. BELL. I put this on the ground that it is a public claim, and have shaped my amendment accordingly. I understand that there is an estimate for this amount in the annual report of the Department of the Interior, as expenditures incurred under appropriations formerly made to enable the Government of the United States to remove the Choctaw Indians from the State of Mississippi to the west of the Mississippi river, in accordance with the general policy of the Government. The appropriations made were insufficient by this amount to carry out the intentions of the Government.

I wish Senators to recollect that the main ground on which this claim rests is, that there is an estimate and recommendation by the Department that Congress should make this appropriation; that estimate contains the items of the amount for which an appropriation is demanded. I know that it is said this is a private claim; but how was that cognomen given to it? The Government, instead of employing an agent, and placing funds in his hands to go to the Mississippi and collect the wandering Indians, together with those who were settled in towns, and remove them by his own exertions, thought the most politic course would be to employ a certain number of gentlemen who professed to have much influence among these Indians, some residing in the State of Mississippi, and particularly connected with or engaged in business with the Choctaws, to remove them. A contract was entered into with these gentlemen, subject to pretty stringent provisions. The business was undertaken, and would probably have been completed successfully for the sum appropriated by the Government, but for the interference of the Government itself. The standing laws and policy of the Government thwarted the contractors and rendered the expense double what had been originally contemplated. The contractors were compelled to effect the removal under every disadvantage; they did so, and made a claim on the Government for the excess of expenditure.

The Government recognized the claim as a just one, which had arisen purely in consequence of the interference of the Government itself. It may be asked how the Government interfered? The principal charge under that head is, that they altered the law which had been made for the payment of a large indemnity under the act of 1842; and instead of paying certain land scrip, according to that act, they actually decided that they would not pay it at all, but that it should be funded; and this, after nearly half the Indians had been removed. The contractors appealed to the Government, claiming indemnification for their losses; and the Government said: "We recognize the justice and equity of your claim; we made the contract under certain circumstances, when laws of such and such a character were existing; we interposed obstacles to the execution of your contract, in the first place by not issuing the scrip which should have been paid east of the Missisissippi in due time, in consequence of Congress withholding and funding one half of the whole quantity of scrip; we recognize your claim to indemnity on that ground."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is very unwilling to interfere with the Senator.

Mr. BELL. I protest, Mr. President, that I am in order in showing that this is not a private claim; that it is a public claim; that it is a claim arising out of the execution of the public policy of the Government in relation to the removal of these Indians. The law appropriated a sum for that purpose, which would have been sufficient if the Government had not altered the law. The Government have recognized the justice of this claim, on the ground of the interposition of the Government itself. I fully recognize the propriety of the rule of the Senate to which reference has been made. I do not know that I would propose to alter it, for I admit that it would not do for every Senator to rise and make amendments to a general appropriation bill in the nature of private claims. All must see that the rule is founded in wisdom, and that it would greatly embarrass the business of the Senate—indeed, that we could not progress with business—if every gentleman were permitted to introduce amendments of a private character. This claim, however, has undergone a regular examination by a committee of this body. It has been estimated for by the Department; it has been recommended as a portion of the annual appropriation, and does not, it seems to me, at all come under the head of private claims. At all events, I appeal to the Senator from Virginia if it is not frequently very difficult to discriminate between what may be called a public and what a private claim.

The general rule is a sound one: that these appropriation bills ought not to be incumbered with anything but appropriations made under existing laws and treaties, and for the current expenses of the year. Then the Committee on Finance would have nothing to do but to look over the estimates of the Department and see that the laws are complied with, and that the appropriations do not exceed what is recommended. In such a case nothing can creep into such bills that ought not to be there, and that all which is estimated is provided for. I admit all that. I admit that according to our general theory as well as our practice, we ought to be confined strictly to that. But then this is not at all in the nature of a private claim, but is emphatically a public claim arising out of the action of the Government itself. We had here an amendment which was discussed for several days in relation to the Shawnee tribe of Indians in Ohio. And what kind of claim was that? It is not a claim for the whole tribe of Shawnee Indians, but for the Ohio portion of them only. And what kind of a claim was it? It was for a money indemnity—for what? Why, for the specific violation of the terms of a former treaty. We were not carrying out that treaty, but it was designed that Congress should go into the consideration of this matter as fully and exclusively as if it were a claim in pursuance of both law and treaty. Yet that claim certainly did not come under the rule providing that nothing but appropriations for the current expenses of the year or in pursuance of law or treaty should be included in these bills. The appropriation for the Shawnees was not for the carrying out of a law or a treaty, but it was in the very face of the treaty itself; and yet that matter was discussed for three or four days. I merely mention this as an illustration of the difficulty of discriminating between public and private claims; and I think this which I now present is as public as the other. It is for the fulfillment of the established policy of the Government. We undertook to remove these Indians, and that, too, by a method which it was in the discretion of the Executive to adopt; and hence it has got the character of a private claim, because those who undertook this service were thwarted by the Government, in the first place by the Government not issuing scrip in due time, and in the second place by a change in the law itself.

If the honorable Senator from Virginia will look at all the items of that bill, I think he will find several which, if you construe this rule with strictness, cannot be made to appear to be appropriations under existing laws or under treaties. I hope that, under all the circumstances of the case, the honorable Senator from Virginia will not urge his objections in this instance. I trust that at least he will consider this as a doubtful case, and one that should be considered as a public one according to the existing laws.

This claim comes specifically and directly under one provision made by the rule—that is, that it has been estimated for by the Department. I stated before that this matter was formerly before Congress; that it is not a new claim. For that reason I thought it would not require any particular discussion or investigation by the Senate, and that we could easily get along with it. I hope that under all the circumstances this case will not be discriminated from others where it is doubtful if the appropriation asked for is one coming under the strict construction of the rule.

Mr. HUNTER. If this amendment had come up as a particular measure on its own merits, I should not have a word to say. The Senate committee and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] have examined this subject, and are better acquainted with it than I can be; but it is my duty to guard the appropriation bill, and preserve the rule which we have adopted, if possible. It seems to me—though I very much regret to feel constrained to oppose the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee—that if we admit this as a public claim, we shall have many others which will follow it. The Senator says that it is no more to be regarded as a private claim than that which was discussed for three or four days in relation to the Shawnee Indians. I admit that; but that Senator must remember that that provision was put in by the House of Representatives, and that the committee of the Senate proposed to strike it out. It is true that there are some items in that bill which came from the House of Representatives which would not have been placed in the bill under our rule; but they have not the same rule which we have in regard to claims of this kind, and it is our business not to guard the action of the House of Representatives, but our own action.

The Senator from Tennessee says it does not come under the rule, because there is an estimate made from the Department for it. The Senator knows how such estimates are obtained; that it is the habit to hunt up claims of this kind, and then obtain an estimate for them, and that is one reason why we get along so slowly with appropriation bills. The rule requires that no claim shall be considered in connection with a general appropriation bill which has not been estimated for in pursuance of some existing law or existing treaty, or to provide for the current expenses of the year. Is this an estimate in pursuance of any existing law or treaty? No, sir. Is it to provide for current expense? No, sir. It is a claim founded upon a mere equitable consideration, and one which strikes me as being somewhat doubtful. It is a claim founded upon the allegation that the United States failed to discharge its duty in some respects, and therefore became liable for the losses of these contractors, sustained in removing these Indians. If anything can constitute a private claim, it seems to me that it is this. It is not to carry out any law or treaty. I think if we depart from the rule under these circumstances, we shall be called upon to do the same thing in many other instances. I fear that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs will be guided by the decision of this question. If we exclude this claim, I think he will not move the passage of certain other amendments. If we do away with the rule in this instance, I shall consider the whole opened to all which are meritorious, and which have come to us from a committee. If this is received, I fear that the Senator from Missouri will present all the claims from his committee which he considers meritorious.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has read the rule. When the deficiency bill was before us, the same question was raised, and it was determined by the Senate that it was a private claim. It is now for the Senate to say whether it is a private claim when offered in connection with the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BELL. I wish to state that at a preceding session we decided that it was not a private claim. It was incorporated in a general appropriation bill, so that there have been decisions on both sides.

Mr. WALKER. This question seems to be involved in some doubt; but at the same time, upon reflection, I am pretty clearly satisfied that this is a private claim. It is acknowledged that it is a proposition to make good a loss sustained in consequence of a bad contract. The Senator from Tennessee says that the bad contract arose in consequence of a failure on the part of the Government to fulfill its duty. That may be so; but have we not had a parallel case precisely, with which we have had something to do for some time? Take, for instance, the late case of the printer who undertook to do the printing of Congress. He found that he had sustained a loss, and he came here and asked to have his loss made up to him, alleging, as in this case, that the loss was in consequence of a change resulting from an act of Congress. That we at once conceded was a private claim, and we should have so conceded forever, however often it might have been estimated for by any Department. This is the same thing in principle; it is the loss of an individual, resulting, if you please, from the action of the Government; yet it is a loss of an individual, and constitutes strictly a private claim.

The PRESIDENT. When such a question has been once decided to be a private claim, the Chair chooses to put the question to the Senate whether, under the rule, this is such a claim as should be received.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have listened to the discussion this morning, I believe, without any bias of feeling, and as the Senate has decided in both ways heretofore, as the justice of the claim appears to be admitted, and as it appears to have been estimated for by the Department, I am unable to draw that distinction which would exclude a just claimant from obtaining his just rights. If there is any technical rule which would exclude him, I am inclined to set it aside. I shall vote for the payment of this claim.

Mr. CASS. I wish merely to say one or two words, for the purpose of observing that a fair construction of the rule would admit this claim, more especially, it seems to me, as, under the circumstances, there is no question about its justice. The claim arises out of a deficiency in the appropriation to remove the Choctaws west of the Mississippi; that deficiency was reported to the Government, and an appropriation for the purpose of covering it is asked for. I do not see why we should not vote for its payment as in any other case of deficiency. It is said that it is a private claim, but the fact that the money goes to A or B does not render it a private claim; on the contrary, I am strongly inclined to believe that it is one of those cases which may fairly be considered as public claims.

Mr. HUNTER. I think the position assumed by me has not been properly understood. The Department does not estimate for this claim as a deficiency in the appropriation bill, but it reports on it as a good claim which should be satisfied, in equity.

Mr. CASS. I thought the Department had regularly estimated for it. I understood the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL.] to say so.

Mr. BELL. I did not understand the remark made by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER.]

Mr. HUNTER. I said that the estimate which has come from the Department does not put the claim in the shape of a deficiency to an appropriation bill, but is intended solely to inform the Congress that it is a good one. The claim is founded on the equity, not on the terms, of the contract.

Mr. BELL. I understand in the report of the Indian Department it will be found in the regular estimates.

Mr. CASS. Will the honorable Senator from Tennessee allow me to ask if the Department has asked for this allowance?

Mr. BELL. They have.

Mr. HUNTER. Here is the report. It begins in this way:

"Mr. BELL made the following report:

"The Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of William B. Hart, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report."

That report is the one which the Indian Department now reproduces.

Mr. BELL. That is done for the purpose of showing the ground on which they make the estimate. If the Senator will go on, he will see the estimate itself.

Mr. HUNTER. They estimate only in this way: they say that they think this party is entitled to this claim; and, being entitled to it, it will amount to so much. But it is not an estimate for a deficiency in any appropriation, that I can perceive.

Mr. BELL. The passage from which the honorable Senator read, is in an appendix explanatory of the estimate. I would like the Senate to understand that this is in the estimate. It reads thus:

"For payment to William B. Hart, assignee of contractors for the removal of Choctaw Indians from the States of Mississippi and Alabama, a balance of a claim on account of said removals, heretofore reported to be due by this office, and an appropriation for the payment of which passed the Senate of the United States at the last session of Congress, $37,422 12."

It is therefore regularly estimated for.

Mr. HUNTER. I would ask the honorable Senator from Tennessee whether this is not a new practice of the Indian Department? Usually they confine themselves to what is necessary in the expenditures of the current year; but in this case they report on the claim as being good, and estimate for it accordingly. I think it does not come within that class of cases to which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] referred. And it is to that that I desire to call his particular attention.

Mr. BELL. There are many claims of the same kind where there have been omissions heretofore. Whether this is a new policy on the part of the Department I am unable to say; but I am inclined to think it is as old as the Government itself. There are cases, not, perhaps, like this in every particular, but in many of their features. They go back where there were recommendations years ago, and they state the circumstances under which it is done. I do not wish to do anything in violation of the spirit of the rule, but I think this is a case which you cannot discriminate from a public claim. It is true it goes to an individual, as appropriations do in nine tenths of cases. The individuals are known before the appropriations are made. Officers of the Government are individuals in the same sense, and yet you appropriate for them. But I will not further detain the Senate.

The question was then taken as to whether the amendment could be received under the rule, and a division being called for, there were—ayes 20, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MASON. I did not intend to say anything upon this subject, as I seldom interfere with matters of this kind when they are before the Senate. I am always much more willing to listen, that I may have my judgment guided by the information which is presented by others. But as the votes of the Senate are to be recorded, I will give, in a few words, the reasons why I consider this claim as not coming within the rule. I consider this rule to have been adopted with a view to guard against improvident legislation, and that it is wise and safe, as I understand it, because it is intended to prevent appropriations which have not been based upon the public legislation of the country. There are few claims upon the Government which are not private claims; but the private claims intended to be excluded by the rule, are demands upon the Government, the nature and character of which have not passed under the review of actual legislation. An equitable demand under a contract, as the chairman of the Committee on Finance has characterized this, would be a private claim, and, as I apprehend, would be properly excluded under this rule. My attention was called to this subject when an appropriation was before us on the deficiency bill. I have listened to the debate since, and I intended to say nothing upon this subject; but as the vote is to be recorded, I wish to state that this claim arises in this way: The Government passed a law for the removal of the Choctaw Indians, and by that law a contract was provided for, by which the Indians were to be removed at stated prices.

Mr. BELL. There was no law providing that they should be removed by contract, but there was a treaty made, providing for their removal, and then an appropriation followed, for the purpose of carrying out that treaty. There was no contract provided for by law.

Mr. MASON. As I understand the matter, Government made a contract for the removal of the Indians, or whether provided for or not, a contract was made which was afterwards recognized and made legitimate by the action of the Government, and there was an appropriation made for the removal of the Indians. As I understand, from delay or from some other cause, more money was needed to remove the Indians. The contract was made by the Government and sanctioned by law; but the appropriation did not hold out, because of the interference of the Government in such a way as to cause a loss to fall upon the contractors. Now, when we are called upon to recognize that as a claim sanctioned by an existing law, I would ask any gentleman who considers that the claim is excluded by the rule, what the difference would be between reimbursing the contractor for the losses he sustained because the appropriation did not hold out, and providing for carrying out the contract by a new appropriation, if this question were now in progress, and we were making the first provision? As I understand, it was really an appropriation, and though it was to go to a private individual, it is in the same condition as any other public claim.

Mr. HUNTER. I think that my colleague misapprehends the facts of the case entirely. If this claim were to carry out an existing law, I should admit that it would come legitimately into the bill. If it were an appropriation to carry out a contract for which a former appropriation was insufficient, I would admit that it would be appropriate here. The facts, as I understand them, are these: the contract was not made by the claimants with the Government, but with the Indians; and the Indians were to be removed at their own expense. Scrip was to be given to the Indians prior to their removal; but in consequence of a change being made in the mode of paying the Indians, they could not satisfy the demands of the contractors, who thus suffered a loss; and they desire that the Government should make it good. This is therefore a claim on the equitable consideration of Congress, and not an appropriation to carry out any existing law. We are not called on to consider whether it is a just claim; that is not our present business. It seems to me that in the discussion of a general appropriation bill we should not be forced to go into such inquiries. The very circumstance that Senators are differing as to the facts of the case is sufficient to show what will be the consequences if we introduce such items as that now under consideration into the bill.

Mr. COOPER. I wish to say a single word. Here is a claim about the justice of which there is not a particle of doubt in the mind of any one who has examined it; but it seems that there is some doubt whether it comes within the rule which would exclude it from this bill. Where there is any doubt—and the claim is a proper and just one—I think it should be interpreted in favor of the claimant. I merely make this suggestion for the consideration of the Senate. There is no doubt whatever about the justice of this claim. It has been examined and reported on repeatedly. The Committee on Indian Affairs have had it before them two or three times, and decided unanimously that it was just; and if any doubt exists as to the interpretation of a rule, that doubt should be determined in favor of the claimant.

Mr. MASON. My colleague says that I do not understand the facts. Now, if the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs is correct, I apprehend that the misapprehension is on his part, if I comprehend his remarks. I understood the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. Atchison] to say that the contract for the removal of the Indians was made, not with the Government, but with the Indians, and that the Government was to provide them with scrip to pay the contractors. As Government failed to do so, the Indians were unable to meet their obligations. If that be so, then I have misunderstood the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs in 1851, for it is there stated that "the early removal of the Indians, who still remained east of the Mississippi, was considered necessary for many reasons, and especially because it was earnestly insisted on by the people of the State of Mississippi. Accordingly, on the 3d March, 1843, the Secretary of War made a contract with Alexander Anderson, by which he agreed to remove them by water from Vicksburg to Fort Coffee."

Mr. BELL. That was the first contract.

Mr. MASON. It was a contract made by the Secretary of War. He says, the Indians "re“fused to go until the certificates or scrip for their lands were issued. They desired these to pay their debts. The Secretary of War promised that it should be issued in September, 1844; but the promise was not complied with. The contractors were, therefore, placed in a most embarrassing position.”

Mr. BELL. There is another contract.

Mr. MASON. It appears that this report was made in January, 1851, by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.]

Mr. BELL. Allow me to read a paragraph.

Mr. MASON. Certainly.

Mr. BELL. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the following statement:

“Efforts were made for their removal under this contract, but the Indians refused to go by water, and the contract was canceled on the 4th of September, 1844. On the same day, another contract was made for their removal with Anderson, Cobb, Forrester, and Pickens. These parties were to be paid $35 71¢ per each Indian removed.

“The Government appointed Colonel H. N. Barstow as agent to superintend the emigration, and see that it was properly conducted; and he repaired to the Indian country to enter upon his duties.

“Efforts were immediately made to remove the Indians within the time fixed in the contract, but they refused to go until the certificates or scrip for their land were issued. They desired these to pay their debts. The Secretary of War promised that it should be issued in September, 1844; but the promise was not complied with. The contractors were, therefore, placed in a most embarrassing position. By the condition of their contract, they were required to remove one thousand Indians within the year 1844, or forfeit their contract. They were, under the circumstances, compelled to furnish the Indians, at their own private expense, those articles which were necessary for their removal, relying upon the promise of the Secretary and the provisions of law, by which the Indians were to be furnished with land scrip, to repay them.”

Mr. MASON. With whom was that contract made?

Mr. BELL. It was made by the Secretary of War with the contractors.

Mr. MASON. Does this claim grow out of the last contract?

Mr. BELL. It does.

Mr. MASON. Then, as I understand, the contract was made by the War Department in the same manner as other contracts are made; and it appears that “the Indians refused to remove, both in 1845 and 1846, without their horses and oxen. The agent of the Government assured the contractors that if they would subsist them, they would be paid by the Government.” “There were, accordingly, five hundred and fifty removed.”

Now, if there is any misapprehension between my colleague and myself, I think the error must be on his part. I do not profess to be so fully acquainted with the subject as he is, and therefore rely on the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, in a great measure, in forming my opinion. By this report I find that the contract was made with the Secretary of War, and that in consequence of the embarrassing position in which the contractors were placed, the Indians were removed at the expense of the contractors, relying on a future appropriation by Congress to cover the amount.

Mr. ADAMS. My recollection of this transaction is not very distinct, though I think I understand the manner in which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] misapprehends this question, to some extent. The contract was made in the manner stated in the document read by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON] for the removal of the Choctaw Indians. A law was passed by which scrip might be given them in lieu of the reservations to which they were entitled under the contract, one half to be paid to the Indians directly and the other half to be vested in Government funds, and put to interest. They made contracts with various persons in Mississippi on the faith of the half which was to be paid in scrip, and which they supposed would be paid to them there before they removed. When they were about to remove, under the contract, the Government issued an order, directing the agent not to pay over the scrip until their removal west of the Mississippi, in consequence of which order they refused to remove. After they had been assembled for emigration they refused to remove, and, finally, Government changed the contract, and undertook to pay the Indians for removing themselves; and, in some cases, speculators removed some of the Indians, and Government paid them. But Government fixed the price to be paid for their removal, and it is under the contracts arising out of the law, and which they had a right to make, that they have sustained a loss.

Mr. HUNTER. Here is a paragraph in a report from a Department, which I will read:

“The contract for the removal of the Choctaws, in the performance of which this claim originated, stipulated, among other things, that the contractors should, in no event, set up any claim for any further allowance than what was specified in the contract; and, on this ground, the Indian office appear to have declined paying any part of the demand now made upon the Government.”

This is a claim for articles furnished to the Indians, not stipulated for by the contract; and they claim that they should be paid, because the Indians could not pay on account of the laches of the United States, in not giving them land scrip. That is the foundation of the claim, and it was so stated by the Department. Instead of making a claim for articles stipulated for, they make it for articles furnished to the Indians, which they say the United States is bound to pay, because the Indians could not pay, in consequence of the United States withholding the scrip for their lands.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection to this claim on the ground of justice, though I have not made a particular examination of it. The question arises under the rule of the Senate, and that rule, if worth making, is worth maintaining. And that rule expressly prohibits the introduction of a private claim in connection with a general appropriation. This is a general appropriation bill, and the question is not with regard to the justice of the claim against the Government, and whether any appropriation shall be allowed or not, but whether it is a private claim, in the ordinary meaning of that term. Now, if I wanted any evidence of this being a private claim, I would draw my evidence from the fact that it was presented to the Senate of the United States as a private claim, and reported as such, by the Senator from Tennessee, at the session of 1851. And the statement upon the report is, that it is made upon the memorial of William B. Hart, January 29, 1851. In that report the fact is set forth, without going into all the proceedings, in what has been read by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER:]

“The contract for the removal of the Choctaws, in the performance of which this claim originated, stipulated among other things, that the contractors should, in no event, set up any claim for any further allowance than what was specified in the contract; and, on this ground the Indian office appear to have declined paying any part of the demand now made upon the Government. The committee are of opinion that any damages the contractors may have sustained by the default of the Government, should be paid, notwithstanding the provision in the contract above stated.”

I would ask Senators what constitutes a private claim if it is not where the claim is made by a private citizen, in a case where, though according to the terms of a contract he would not be entitled to claim, yet because some action of the Government has tended to disarrange his plans or defeat them, he requires that the Government should compensate him? Is not that a private claim? We have now before the Committee on Private Claims half a dozen which could not possibly be discriminated from this, if this is a public claim. There is a claim before that committee for losses sustained in building the custom-house in New York. The contractor found that the measurements of the architects were not furnished in due season to enable him to carry on his work, and he consequently sustained a serious loss, according to his statement, and, in fact, according to the proof before the committee. If this is not the same in principle, if it is not a private claim, I cannot understand the meaning of words; and if it is a private claim, then the rule, if it be of any utility at all, ought to be sustained; for if you break it in one instance, and consider this a public claim, you cannot draw the distinction. While the rule remains, I cannot vote that this claim shall be received as a public claim.

Mr. BELL. An allusion having been made to a statement of fact in the report of the committee on this matter, it is necessary that I should occupy the attention of the Senate to explain what follows. Now, in substance and in truth that contract was not complied with on the part of the Government at all. It had an excellent and intelligent man, who was not interested in this contract, to see to the removal of the Indians, with due care, paying all attention to their comfort. The foundation of the claim commenced when the Government failed to pay the scrip; and the Indians had no means of paying the debts they had before contracted with the citizens around them. The agent of the Government went there with full authority not to annul the contract, but as the representative of the Government to see to the execution of the contract; and it was upon his recommendation that these gentlemen went on in fulfilling its specifications. They avowed their inability to go on with the contract unless the Government would comply with its portion of it. Here are the documents. They are voluminous. It will take much time to go over them, but they show what was recommended to these gentlemen. There was under the assurance of this agent of the Government that they proceeded. There is not a single item which is not sanctioned by the agent of the Government. The contract was, that nothing extra should be claimed. They claimed nothing extra in the execution of the contract. The whole question, from the very commencement, may be said to have been thrown open in fact, and that these parties were persuaded to go on and expend their money out of their own pockets, and in many instances to borrow it, in order that they might purchase supplies under the assurance by an officer of the Government of its repayment by the Government. It was the policy of the Government to remove these Indians. As they had them collected together, everything required that they should be removed. It was on that ground that the Committee on Indian Affairs thought that this original clause in the contract, in regard to nothing extra being claimed, should not be enforced, for the very first step of the Government was to violate its own contract. Here are the figures to show that upon a certain day they were assembled, and that it was agreed that the scrip would be on the ground; whereas the scrip was not issued for two or three months afterwards. And so of the other items. I do not remember all of them now, but I think every one of them had the sanction of the agent of the Government. These gentlemen did not go on entirely blindly. They went on under the assurance of Mr. Barstow that it was the policy of the Government, founded on the treaty of 1830, and was confirmed by the act of 1842, and by the appropriation for their removal. The Government thought they could get these Indians removed cheaper by contract. They made contracts with these gentlemen, who were ready to fulfill them; and the Government failed to supply the means according to agreement. I think, therefore, that this case can be clearly discriminated from the kind of cases alluded to by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to read an extract from the report of the Senator from Tennessee, which seems to me to place this claim upon its true ground:

“It appears that the contractors did sustain great damage, and were subject to great expense, not necessarily connected with the fulfillment of their contract, by the failure of the Government to furnish the scrip in due time, which was to have been delivered to the Indians before their departure for the country set apart for them west of the Mississippi. Of the whole amount claimed by way of damages against the Government, the sum of $6,595 is based upon issues and supplies furnished to the Indians by the contractors, on various occasions.”

That is to say, that they make the claim because, by the failure of the Government to furnish the scrip in due time to the Indians, the Indians could not pay their debts and obligations to the contractors. Owing to the failure of the Government to discharge its obligation to the Indians, the contractors say the Indians could not discharge their obligations to them; which is precisely what I stated in the beginning; and if that does not constitute a private claim, and is not founded upon the mere equity of the transaction, I do not know what is.

Mr. BELL. I would ask the Senator whether that is not sufficiently presented there, so as to appear distinctly to his mind that those were supplies that need not have been furnished but for the failure of the Government to issue the scrip? I apprehend that has relation to the item for supplies which were furnished to the Indians when they were in encampment, or assembled together ready to remove, and that while they were waiting for the issue of the scrip which had been promised. The contractors had, necessarily, to furnish supplies which they were not bound by the contract to furnish, in furtherance of the policy of our Government still to hold the Indians together to get them to remove when the scrip should come.

Mr. HUNTER. My impression is that the foundation of the claim was, that the Indians were bound to the contractors for supplies, and would have paid for them if the Government had issued the scrip; but the Government not issuing it, they could not pay them.

Mr. BELL. No, sir, that is not the foundation of this part of the claim; but another part, for some $15,000 or $18,000, is founded upon supplies furnished by these gentlemen to the Indians, for which they were to be repaid out of the scrip. But in the mean time—and they removed some one thousand or eleven hundred of them—the Government changed its policy in relation to it, and said they would not pay them scrip at all; and hence the claim.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to be properly informed upon the facts of the case, and ask the Senator if a great portion of this claim does not arise upon the ground that the Indians could not pay their debts to the contractors, because the Government did not give the scrip?

Mr. BELL. That is the ground for a claim of about $18,000, I believe.

Mr. BAYARD. It seems to me that the argument of the honorable Senator from Tennessee goes to the justice of the claim. I can make no objection to its justice. So far as I understand it, I think it is perfectly just; and from the knowledge which I possess, I would not oppose it if it came in a proper shape. But that it is a private claim, I do not doubt. What distinguishes it from the case I hold in my hand, which has been reported upon by the committee at this, and previous sessions—the case of Matthews, Wood & Hall, contractors with the Government for building the custom-house at New York? In the one case, the Government contracted for the erection of a public building; in the other, for the removal of Indians. Matthews, Wood & Hall make a claim, which has always been treated as a private claim, founded on the fact that the Government had not complied with the stipulations of the contract, by furnishing the measurements necessary to enable them to carry on the work. They were thrown over for the season at great expense. They claimed damages for it. It was referred to the Solicitor of the Treasury, who made an award in their favor, but no attempt was made to put it in a general appropriation bill. It came before the Committee on Claims, and they, with some reduction upon the amount estimated, reported in favor of the claimants. It is essentially a private claim, arising out of a contract made in reference to a public matter. And where is the difference here? Is not this a mere private claim for equitable damages arising, as the honorable Senator from Tennessee says, from the non-performance by the Government of a contract entered into by the proper officers? And what is that but a private claim? I submit, if the rule be preserved it is impossible, however just the claim may be—and I believe it is just—that it can be included within the rule, without a precedent for including the claim which I hold in my hand, just as much as that, or any claim of a similar character.

Mr. BADGER. I desire to contribute my mite to the consumption of this day, and to aid in illustrating the excellence of that rule which the honorable Senator from Virginia persuaded the Senate to adopt during the last Congress; a rule which no two men in the Senate understand alike, and which presents this extraordinary spectacle, that every time it is undertaken to be enforced, a day is taken up in deciding whether the amendment falls within it or not. I make that preliminary remark as the basis of the notice which I now give, that I will to-morrow move to take up the resolution which I submitted seven weeks ago, to rid the Senate of this time-consuming, mischievous rule, which occupies the whole time of the Senate upon these bills, in deciding whether we can consider questions, instead of considering and deciding them.

Having said this much, I desire to make this remark: When my friend from Tennessee offered this provision as an amendment to the deficiency bill, I said, and voted accordingly, that I thought it was a private claim within the rule, and excluded by it. I have been satisfied, in the discussion which has taken place to-day, that I was wrong, and I believe, and shall so vote, that it is a public claim, within the meaning of the rule, and ought to be received.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on receiving the amendment, and resulted—yeas 30, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Brooke, Cass, Charlton, Clarke, Clemens, Cooper, Fawcett, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Fish, Foot, Houston, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Morton, Sebastian, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Sumner, Toucey, Upham, Wade, and Weller—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bright, Brodhead, Butler, Chase, Felch, Geyer, Hunter, King, Meriwether, Norris, Pratt, Stockton, and Walker—14.

So the Senate decided the amendment to be in order.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. ATCHISON. Mr. President, under the direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I offer the following amendment:

For defraying expenses incident to the visit of the Pueblo Indians, and their attendants, from New Mexico to Washington, and to defray their expenses to their homes, the sum of $7,500.

For general objects incident to Indian service in New Mexico, $20,000.

I am informed by a letter from the Department of the Interior, that these estimates would have been laid before the Committee of Ways and Means in the House, but for the fact that the Department was waiting for the arrival of Governor Calhoun, of New Mexico, from whom they expected to obtain all the information necessary to enlighten them upon this subject. But, unfortunately, Governor Calhoun died before he reached the State of Missouri. I believe he died upon the frontier of that State. Since his death, his secretary has arrived in this city, and it is upon a letter and information furnished by him that the Department of the Interior now ask this appropriation, by way of amendment to this bill.

These Indians are a small delegation, consisting of four Indians, perhaps, and an interpreter and guide. The appropriation is asked to pay their expenses from New Mexico here, and on their return home. The general appropriation of $20,000 is asked for the purpose of complying with promises made by Governor Calhoun, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, ex officio, in that Territory, to certain tribes of Indians within its limits. The estimate made by the Secretary amounted to some $89,300; but the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in view of the next session of Congress being so near at hand, has cut them down to $27,500, and it is for that sum I ask the appropriation now, by way of amendment to the bill. If any Senator desires it, the letter of the Secretary can be read.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to ask whether this visit of the Indians was authorized by the Government, or whether they were merely sent here by an agent?

Mr. ATCHISON. I understand that it was authorized and very much desired by this Government. They are the only New Mexican Indians that ever did visit the United States, and I am told that they are somewhat advanced in civilization beyond most Indians in New Mexico. They were sent here by Governor Calhoun, Superintendent of Indian Affairs there, and it was desired by the Government; and the appropriation is now asked for to defray the expenses.

Mr. HUNTER. Did I understand that Governor Calhoun was authorized by the Department to bring them on?

Mr. ATCHISON. I so understand it.

Mr. HUNTER. If that be so, I have no objection to the amendment; but this practice of agents bringing Indians here on their own motion, ought to be stopped.

Mr. ATCHISON. It has been.

Mr. DAWSON. I know these Indians. They are very intelligent, and can read and write the Spanish language with great fluency. They are sensible and honest men. They came here for the purpose of ascertaining the character of our institutions. As the Senator from Missouri says, they are the first New Mexican Indians who have ever come to this country. I have conversed with them. They express great admiration for our people, and deep amazement at the appearance of our country and the power of the Government. They give it as their opinion that it would be vastly advantageous to the Government of the United States to get the representatives of the various tribes in the Territory of New Mexico to come here, to impress them with our kindness toward them, and give them apprehensions, too, of our power to punish them if they violate the laws of the country, or the rights of our citizens. I have no doubt that the $20,000 or $25,000 which it is now proposed to appropriate, will save this Government perhaps $250,000, or even $500,000, by the impression we make upon these Indians, and the information they will carry back to their people. It will be recollected that they are near five thousand miles from us, subject to our control. These Indians had never seen or known anything about an engine or steamboat. They came round by Buffalo and New York, here, and are amazed and perfectly astonished at what they have seen; and when they go back home and tell their people with whom they are now associated, their moral influence will be better than the influence of all your mounted men; they feel a moral influence; and it is an act of kindness, charity, and benevolence, and of good treatment on the part of our Government, thus to act towards them. I have a full knowledge of these facts, having had a conversation with them, and the only regret I feel is, that this amount is not larger. The Indians must have some presents made to them before they return; and I was about to propose the sum of $25,000 instead of $20,000, but some of my friends say that we had better not change it.

It is a little remarkable that the Indians of this Territory, that has so many Indians within its limits, so many different nations of Indians—should have no attention paid to them, whilst we have appropriated so much money to others on our borders. Why, sir, it is only the skillful management of the government of the Territory of New Mexico—the kindness of that deceased Governor whose carriage can never be forgotten by the people living there—which has kept these Indians within the limits they have; and these Pueblo Indians who are here now, express the kindness which they feel towards that individual, and say that through the arrangement he made, they have been kept in peace and quietness, under the expectation that a treaty would be made by which they would be placed on the same footing as other Indians. I will consume no more time of the Senate, but hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. CASS. I agree with every word that has been said by the honorable Senator from Georgia. It is vastly better to acquire an influence over these Indians by kindness, and exhibiting the power of this Government to them, than it is by going to war with them. I know personally the fact, that, taking the wilder Indians through this country, and letting them see the actual power they would have to contend with, if they went to war, has a very good effect upon them. I shall vote for the appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Mr. President, I have several amendments which I wish to offer, by the direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The first is based upon an estimate from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, predicated upon an estimate made to him by the Colonel of the Corps of Topographical Engineers. It is to insert the following:

For expenses of running and marking the eastern boundary line of the Creek country, west of Arkansas, $7,900.

That expense is rendered necessary for the purpose of fulfilling the stipulations of the treaty of 1830 made with the Creek Indians. By that treaty—by which they agreed to emigrate west of Arkansas—their boundaries were prescribed, and the United States entered into the stipulation at their own expense, to mark out, survey, and designate by sufficient monuments the boundaries between the Creek and Cherokee Indians. There are two boundary lines which ought to be run, and which, in the course of time, must be run. The recommendation of the Department, however, is to confine the appropriation at this time entirely to the designation and running and marking with monuments the eastern boundary of the Creek country—that which separates the settled portion of the Creek nation from the most populous part of the country occupied by the Cherokee Indians. It is a boundary, but a very small portion of which is marked by any natural features. The line is to be surveyed, marked, and designated by monuments in order to prevent those aggressions which sometimes willfully and sometimes without intention are continually being made upon the part of one tribe against the other. I understand it to be very much desired by the Creek and Cherokee Indians that this portion of their boundary should be marked.

The estimate is based upon what appears to be a very correct and nice calculation of the expenses of running and designating the boundary with small cast-iron monuments, located at the distance of one mile apart, and also one at each of the angles of the boundary. I have in my possession the estimate, and I have also a communication from the Colonel of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, in which he estimates every item here mentioned, and which can be read if any Senator desires it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The next amendment which I wish to insert at the end of that portion of the bill making provision for the payment of the Choctaws, is the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to examine the reservation claims of the Choctaws, known as "Bay Indians," and all those Indians in whose cases the scrip awarded by the late Board of Commissioners has not been issued; and where he shall find that such Indians are clearly entitled to land under the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830, and under the several acts heretofore passed in relation to such claims, he is hereby authorized to extend to such claimants the provisions applicable to such claims in the acts of the 23d of August, 1842, and the 3d of March, 1845.

A word of explanation may be necessary in regard to this amendment. It is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and embraces succinctly the provisions of a bill which passed the Senate without any question, I believe, some time since. It is general in its character, and embraces a solitary remnant of Choctaws who have never been provided for under the treaty of 1830. A portion of the provisions of that treaty authorized such Choctaws as chose to remain in the country, to take reservations of six hundred and forty acres each. That provision of the treaty was complied with, in respect to a large proportion of those who chose to remain. But there was a portion who did remain in the country who signified their intention of claiming reserves and become citizens of the States, who made application before the Board of Commissioners constituted for the examination of their claims, whose claims were examined, and testimony taken in regard to them; but according to the report of the Commissioners themselves, it is shown that the time for the sitting of the Commission expired before they were able to render up the formal decrees in the case. The entire records of their proceedings are on file in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The amendment which I have offered is intended only to include those Indians who were not provided for, in consequence of an omission over which they themselves had no control, and whose names are embraced in the records of the Commission on file at the Indian Department. It embraces no new case; it provides for the adjudication of no new class of cases; it introduces no new class not provided for in the act of 1844, and the subsequent act of 1845. I believe that no one who has ever looked into the case, has entertained the slightest question as to the justness of this provision. If it be desired by any Senator to have a more accurate knowledge of the circumstances, the Senators from Mississippi, who are personally cognizant of the history of this transaction, from its inception to its termination, will be able to give a most lucid and satisfactory explanation of it. The amendment provides for the payment of no money; but only for the issuing of scrip to these Indians as it was issued to other Indians coming within the same class, under the laws of 1842 and 1845.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I am directed, also, by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to offer the following amendment, to be inserted in that portion of the bill which provides for the payment of the Seminole Indians:

*That the Secretary of War be directed to pay to each of the survivors, or to the heirs of those who have died, of the Seminole warriors who were mustered into the service of the United States, at Fort Brooke, in December, 1835, an amount equal to three months' pay and allowance of a private soldier in the Army of the United States: *Provided, That the amount so paid shall not exceed $3,870: And provided, also, That such amount paid shall be in full of all claims of said friendly Seminoles, during the Florida war, for compensation and for indemnity on account of losses sustained.

This amendment is for a small amount, and is intended for the payment of one hundred and twenty-nine Seminoles, who were mustered into the service of the United States in the Seminole war of 1835-'36. The reason why they were not paid, was that the original muster-roll was lost. The report which the committee have made in regard to the case, states that there were one hundred and twenty-nine Seminoles, who were mustered into the service of the United States on the order of Major General Gaines; and the only difficulty was to ascertain what was the period of service for which they were engaged by the United States.

I believe that the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] now a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, once had this subject under his charge, and according to a statement made by one of the officers of the Army, it is understood that he reported that there were a less number of Indians engaged for one month. Since then, however, the letters and certificates of the officers, who had these Indians in charge in the Florida war, have been obtained, by which it is found that the precise number mustered into service by Captain Sanders, in December, 1835, was one hundred and twenty-nine; and that they held themselves in the service of the United States, and were actually engaged in the service from that time till the 1st of April, 1836, when they were emigrated by the United States to the western boundary of Arkansas. The only difficulty that ever presented itself was as to the number that served and the length of time they served. The commanding officers certified that the Indians were undoubtedly entitled to pay; and the amendment which I have offered places them upon precisely the same footing with the other soldiers of the United States. It gives them the ordinary pay and emoluments of a private soldier for three months. I believe that there was among the papers a complete roll of the Indians, which was taken from the original muster-roll. That, however, was lost and could not be obtained.

There were in addition some other losses which these Indians suffered in consequence of their fidelity to the United States. These are not embraced in this amendment. But the Indians are required to release those claims before this payment is to be made to them. I believe there is no fact upon which their right is based about which any question can be made. The evidence consists entirely of the certificates of the military officers who had the Indians in charge, which are on file in the Indian Department. The principal certificate is that of Captain Casey, who, on the 23d of January, 1847, certified, that on or about the 31st of December, 1835, the friendly Seminoles were enrolled by him, under the order of Brevet Major F. S. Betton; that the number enrolled was one hundred and twenty-nine; that their services were rendered whenever required until about the period of their emigration in April, 1836. He also states that they were armed on being enrolled; that they furnished details to assist in guarding the fort whenever the hostiles approached; sent out spies and scouting parties regularly, and frequently had several conflicts with the enemy; furnished a guard for cattle, &c. The certificate states the length of service, and its character—that it was a very irregular and dangerous service on which they were engaged. I believe I have now given a short and succinct statement of the claim, which I presume will be satisfactory.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Indians were mustered into service at that time, why were they not paid?

Mr. SEBASTIAN. As I stated, the original muster-roll was lost; and the facts of the case, which the committee have stated, have been derived from a certified transcript of one of the rolls obtained, I believe, from the private possession of one of the officers, Colonel Betton, who was in command. It appears that these Indians were enlisted by order of Major General Gaines. One thing is certain, they have never been paid. Such is the statement from the War Department. The estimate upon which this amendment is based comes from the Paymaster's Department, and I presume there can be no question as to the fact of service having been rendered, and there having been no payment for it.

Mr. CASS. Before I vote for this amendment I should like to be satisfied in regard to one point. This transaction occurred a great many years ago, and I do not understand why the claim was not brought forward before. We ought to look with suspicion upon these old claims. The certificate read by the honorable Senator from Arkansas is not entirely satisfactory to me. It would seem to me that those Indians were a kind of minute-men who went out occasionally, and yet were not actually engaged in the service. I did not hear the certificate distinctly; but I think it stated that whenever these Indians were wanted they made their appearance, and were sent out; but it was not stated that they were in actual service. I may have misunderstood the certificate, but that is my impression, that they were not regularly on the muster-roll, as men who are mustered into the service and mustered out of it. There should be some such certificate as that to authorize the payment. I think that is a very loose memorandum from which the Senator has read.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The report in this case is a very short one. It refers to official documents. If Senators will hear it read, I think it will satisfy their scruples. I therefore ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Holata Emathla and other Seminoles, for compensation for services rendered during the Florida war, beg leave to report:

That the evidence before the committee shows, that when the Florida war broke out, a party of friendly Seminoles were assembled at Tampa Bay for emigration. That about the time of Dade's massacre, the garrison at Fort Brooke being small, and surrounded by a large Indian force, the officer in command armed and enrolled a number of the friendly warriors, and put them on the defensive as auxiliaries.

In February, 1836, seventy-five or eighty of these warriors, by order of Major General Gaines, proceeded with that officer to the With-la-coo-chee, under the immediate command of Captain W. G. Sanders. After an absence of one month in this service, they returned to Tampa Bay, and in April, 1836, the whole party was removed to the Indian territory west of Arkansas, by an agent of the Government.

These facts are established by the testimony of Colonel Betton, of the Army, and of Captain Sanders, the officer in charge of the detachment under General Gaines, corroborated by the certificate of the latter officer, and of Captain Casey. The officer under whom these Indian volunteers served, all concurred in certifying that they were all entitled to pay. The only question is, how many are to be paid, and for what time?

The original muster rolls appear to have been lost; Colonel Betton, who first engaged their services, says, in a letter to the War Department, dated July 16, 1848, twelve years after the occurrence: "I armed some fifty or sixty of the hands under the above chiefs," (Holata Emathla and Black Dirt.) He adds, "I believe they were regularly mustered, and perhaps Captain Casey, now of the Subsistence Department, who spoke the Seminole language well, may have performed that duty. Such rolls, however, may have been lost," &c.

On the other hand, Captain Casey himself certifies, on the 23d of January, 1847, that on or about the 31st of December, 1835, the friendly Seminole warriors were enrolled by him under the order of Brevet Major F. S. Betton, and that "the number enrolled by me on December 31, 1835, was one hundred and twenty-nine, and that their services were rendered whenever required, until about the period of their emigration in April, 1836." He also states that they were armed on being enrolled; furnished details to assist in guarding the fort whenever the hostiles approached; sent out spies and scouting parties regularly and frequently; had several conflicts with the enemy; captured several of the hostiles; furnished a guard for cattle, &c., &c.

Major General Gaines states, that seventy-five of these Indians were with him for one month, on the expedition to the With-la-coo-chee, under the command of Captain Saunders, and are entitled to pay for that time.

The War Department furnishes a list of eighty warriors, as having served with Captain Sanders during the time specified by General Gaines.

Captain Sanders certifies on a duplicate of the War Department roll, that about the time of General Clinch's first battle, the friendly Seminole warriors, then at Tampa Bay, to the number of one hundred and twenty, were taken into the service of the army by Major F. S. Betton, and assisted in the military defense of that fort and region; that several of them were killed and wounded in that vicinity, and that seventy-six of the hundred and twenty proceeded under his command to the With-la-coo-chee, by order of General Gaines; that he cannot tell which four of the eighty on the roll were not with him, and that "it was of no consequence," well knowing that "all of the hundred and twenty were in service, and that all ought to have been mustered and paid for their services."

The committee are of opinion that the evidence shows that but seventy-six of the friendly Seminoles were in service under General Gaines. But it cannot be doubted that those who were retained at Tampa as auxiliaries by Major Betton, and performed then the services described by Captains Casey and Sanders, are equally entitled to pay.

As to the entire number in service, the precise statement of Captain Casey, who mustered them, confirmed as it is in a great measure by Captain Sanders, is more likely to be correct than the more vague account of Major Betton. Captain Casey says he mustered one hundred and twenty-nine; he also certifies that their services were rendered whenever required, until about the period of their emigration in April, 1836. According to the statement of this officer, who seems to have had the Indians specially in charge, one hundred and twenty-nine warriors are entitled to pay for at least three months' services, from December, 1835, until April 1836.

Reliable information has reached the committee that these Indians rendered themselves, by their adherence to the United States, peculiarly obnoxious to the hostile Seminoles, and that they lost, in consequence, a good deal of property in the shape of cattle and horses. Up to this day they have never received from the Government any indemnity for losses, or pay for their services. The treaty with the Creeks and Seminoles, of January, 1845, unfortunately cut them off from all hope of obtaining indemnity without making any provision in their favor. This fact presents an additional reason for a prompt and liberal adjustment of their claim for pay. The committee, therefore, recommend an allowance of three months' pay to the one hundred and twenty-nine warriors mustered by Captain Casey; and herewith submit a bill for that purpose.

Mr. BRIGHT. By whom is that report made?

The PRESIDENT. By the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEBASTIAN,] from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me that this is a private claim; but I suppose that, from the recent decision of the Senate, they do not mean to regard that rule any longer. It strikes me, however, that if we go into this sort of legislation, we ought to throw some additional guards about it, in order to ascertain that the payments be made to proper persons.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 16, noes 16.

So that it was rejected.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. ADAMS,] voted in favor of the amendment after the eye of the Chair had passed him, and he was not counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. NORRIS in the chair.) The decision has been announced; the Chair therefore thinks that it is too late to make any question as to it.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The next amendment which I wish to offer is to insert the following:

For expense of compiling a map, under the supervision of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for the use of the committees of the Senate, showing the present boundary of the Indian territory, and the location of the various Indian tribes within the United States, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I have one other amendment to offer. It is to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and requested to ascertain the names of those Cherokees residing east of the Mississippi river who were entitled to, but not paid their per capita allowance under the treaties of 1835 and 1846, and cause to be paid to them the like amount as was paid to the others entitled: Provided, That the number shall not exceed sixty; and the sum necessary for that purpose is hereby appropriated.

A word of explanation as to that amendment. I perceive the chairman of the Committee on Finance is about making an attempt to get the floor. I am not at all astonished at it; for I believe, whenever the name "Cherokee" is mentioned, there is an involuntary shudder which seems to disturb his sensibilities. I have, therefore, some misgivings for the success of the amendment. It, however, embraces a small class; and I shall, after a few words of explanation, leave the amendment to the Senate. I will state the facts briefly.

I believe it is in the recollection of the Senate, that about two years since we appropriated, upon a final settlement with the Cherokees, some million and a half or two millions of dollars, said to be due them under the treaties of 1835 and 1846. In the administration of that law, however,—in the payment and distribution of that money, some of the Indians were omitted. As a matter of course, it was supposed there would be some defect in the execution of the law. In the first place, the sum appropriated to the Cherokees had to be divided between those east and those west of the Mississippi, after the division was made according to the census taken under the authority of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The number of those residing east of the Mississippi was ascertained, and an amount of money sufficient to pay them their proportion was dispatched to the pay agent, who distributed it among those who had been placed upon the pay-roll by the agent who had been directed by the Department to take the names of the Indians. There were, I believe, about two hundred who made application to go on the roll as Cherokees, who were decided by the agent not to be entitled, and were rejected. No provision is of course to be made for them. Their appropriation is an adjudicated matter, and it may be their misfortune, but it is certainly one not to be remedied. There were others who, in consequence of circumstances which Senators can easily imagine, were not placed upon the rolls—those who were living far from the place where the Indians were convened, who escaped the notice that was given by the agent, a small number of whom were induced to believe that by accepting the distribution they waived their right to some extraordinary pretensions which they had set up under the treaty of 1835 to lands within the limits of North Carolina. These constitute only a few, and I understand from the best estimate that can be obtained, that they will not exceed sixty. These persons were evidently entitled under the treaty, but the fund which was appropriated for them has been exhausted, and the question is, whether we will make an additional appropriation for the payment of those persons, or leave them in their present situation?

The Committee on Indian Affairs took this question into consideration, and believed that, inasmuch as there were so few of these Indians, it would be better to pay them (although it should be done out of the Treasury of the United States) the amount to which they were entitled under the treaty, and which they had not been paid by the disbursing agent, rather than to be importuned by a claim which they were certain would never die. Most of these persons have made their application in writing to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Of course there could be no response to them, except that there was no money on hand. Statements made out by gentlemen from North Carolina and Georgia and Alabama have rendered it certain that there are not existing sixty of these persons; possibly not over thirty.

The amendment, however, limits the number of Indians to whom payment may be made to sixty. I believe that number will embrace the full amount. It lies entirely within the discretion of the Senate whether they will make a provision for the payment of these sixty additional Indians.

I am of the opinion, that in the execution of the law involving the disbursement of so much money as that of the appropriation under the Cherokee treaties of 1835 and 1846, we have been remarkably successful; and it presents a very rare instance of the perfect execution of a law with so little complaint. If in the disbursement of about $2,000,000 among fifteen thousand or sixteen thousand Indians we have only overlooked or escaped some fifty or sixty, we have been remarkably fortunate.

As I before said, these Indians are evidently entitled to an allowance under the terms of the treaty. Their interest is per capita—an interest which we have always regarded as vested, and which could not be paid to others. There is no fault at all attributable to the pay agent, or the agent who was directed to ascertain the number of the Indians. He undoubtedly performed his duty with as much skill and as much fidelity as could be expected under the circumstances; and, considering all things, he has succeeded remarkably well in the accuracy with which he made out this roll.

I present this case with the considerations for, and those against it, and the Senate can decide whether, under the circumstances, they feel authorized to make an additional appropriation to quiet, probably, the last clamors with which we shall be importuned in reference to the execution of this treaty.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, I should like to know from the Senator from Arkansas whether the adoption of this amendment will not amount to a virtual repeal of the provision made in the last appropriation for the Cherokees that it should be a final settlement? because if we reopen it as to these Indians, how can we refuse to reopen it unto the others? How do we know that there may not be other claims?

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I would say to the Senator, that so far from opening what was certainly intended to be understood on all sides as a final settlement, this amendment acknowledges the finality of that settlement. As I said before, if this amount of money be paid, it is a gratuity over and above the amount due to the Cherokees under the treaty. There was so much money due to the entire Cherokee nation—to be distributed per capita. Unavoidably, in the distribution of that money, fifty or sixty persons, according to the best evidence before us, were omitted to be placed upon the pay roll, who were evidently entitled under the treaty. As I said before, the fund is gone. There is no pretense that any more is due them; and I think it is a question of policy on our part whether we will pay this small additional sum to quiet what I think will be the last demand upon the Government arising under this treaty. I am of opinion that we had better pay this small amount of money as a gratuity, in order to fulfill literally the terms of the treaty, than to be continually importuned with these claims, which we know have an immortality.

Mr. BELL. The only difficulty I see about this matter is, as to the mode of ascertaining who these eastern Cherokees are. It is some fifteen or sixteen years since the treaty was made; and I am satisfied that under the appropriation which was made some time ago to the North Carolina Indians, a great deal of fraud was practiced in the ascertainment of the Indians who were entitled. I forget what those frauds were; but I know that, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I had occasion at one time to look into it, and I found that every sort of claim had been trumped up from the year 1835 to the time that the examination was made. Claims were set up for alleged heirs of Indians who had been extinct for years—claims depending upon very uncertain proof.

Now, I have no objection at all to make an appropriation to pay the per capita allowance under the treaty of 1835 to all who shall be, with reasonable certainty, ascertained to be entitled to it. The difficulty is to ascertain now, after this lapse of time, who are entitled. I do not know whether it is a fact, but I have heard it said that some Cherokees have returned from the west to the east occasionally, and set up some of these claims. That was an allegation under the former examination.

I make these remarks for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senator from Arkansas and of the Senate to the propriety of making some amendment to the amendment, by which this claim shall be ascertained in such a way that we shall think there is some security that we shall not have to pay a large batch of claimants who are not entitled. I know that a great many claims would be set up in that country, founded upon a very little evidence. Cunning, ingenious white men may go among the Indians, and for the purpose of putting something into their own pockets, they can get up almost any number of claims, and get the Indians to allege that they are entitled. And unless provision is made for a very close examination of the claims, I think we are likely to have a fraud practiced upon us.

It is true, as stated by the Senator from Arkansas, that this claim will not lead to the expenditure of a large amount of money; but I would suggest that some provision be made, by some alteration in the amendment, to remedy the evil to which I have alluded. I understood the Senator to state that there were applications from some of these Indians in writing, claiming these sums. Now, if the Secretary of the Interior should take it for granted that all these are valid claims, in regard to which applications have been made in writing, I do not think it would give any assurance of truth. I think if provision was made that the Secretary should send an experienced officer of the Indian Department to make that examination in the country—one who had knowledge of the frauds formerly practiced, we should then have some assurance that all would be right, or at least as much assurance as in the nature of things we could have. There are some officers in the Indian Department who could make such an examination. If Mr. Mix, for example, were sent on such a mission, I should have the greatest confidence that he would eviscerate the facts as far as he could with reasonable scrutiny. But, then, we ought to enlarge the appropriation and pay the agent for his expenses, and if necessary, give him some extra compensation. I believe Mr. Mix is only a clerk, receiving a moderate salary—I do not know what it is. But, if some such officer as he were to go, I should feel some assurance that we should be called upon to pay no more, or not much more than was due, for I know that some frauds will be practiced under any circumstances.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The suggestions of the Senator from Tennessee are entitled to their weight, and are considerations which legitimately arise out of the nature of this case. It is very true that the amendment ought to be guarded in such a way as to prevent frauds arising in the administration of this small amount of money; for it is undoubtedly true that if temptation is held out, or any door is left open for the perpetration of frauds, there is nothing in the character of the Indians, and the unscrupulous white men who go among them, to warrant us in believing that a great many frauds will not be perpetrated as long as the Treasury is laid open to their applications.

In speaking of these applications being in writing, I was probably not understood by the Senator. Many of the applications have been in writing—complaining that these Indians were not placed upon the pay roll. I do not say that all of the applications have been in writing; on the contrary, I know that many of them have not been. Many of the Indians are known to be in existence who, from unavoidable circumstances, were omitted in the pay-roll which was made out under the authority of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I learned the names of a number of them—some from a Representative from the State of Georgia, in the other House, a portion from a Representative from the northern part of Alabama, and some from the declarations and statements made by the pay agent who went there, and who was satisfied, from the applications made to him, that there were genuine and bona fide Cherokees clearly entitled, who were not embraced on his pay-roll, and who would have been paid, but for the fact that their names were omitted from the roll.

I would state further, for the information of the Senator from Tennessee, that there is, I think, one means of identifying every genuine Indian entitled under the treaty of 1835; and that is, the census made out by the terms of that treaty, upon which all who were genuine Indians were required to be enrolled for the very purpose of receiving the benefits of the treaty, and for the very purpose of avoiding any difficulty about the identity of the persons who were to receive payments under the provisions of the treaty. That roll, generally called by the Indians the roll of 1836, is now in the archives of the Indian office.

It may be true, and I have no doubt such is the fact, that some of the western Cherokees have emigrated back to North Carolina. But they have been paid, and the names of those who have been paid are on the pay rolls of the agents who have distributed the money under the treaties of 1835 and 1846. So that I do not apprehend any difficulty on that score. I am perfectly willing to receive any additional amendments to confine this appropriation to the very small class for whose benefit it is intended. I shall receive, as a favor, any suggestion which will end in the incorporation of a proper amendment. An amendment has been sent to me by a friend, which, as far as it goes, meets my approbation, and I therefore move to amend the amendment which has been offered, by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That no Indian shall receive any payment under this section who has already received what he was entitled to under the said treaties.

Mr. HUNTER. There is one argument urged by the Senator from Arkansas in relation to this claim, which carried weight with me. He says, we know these claims are immortal, and that they will ultimately pass—that if the claim is made, it is as well to pay it at once. I think experience shows that there is much in this argument. I know of none of these claims which do not ultimately pass. It seems to be almost a waste of time to resist them. We have a full Treasury, and it seems to be the determination to expend what is in it.

I had hoped that this Cherokee matter was closed when the last appropriation was made and pronounced to be a "final" satisfaction of their claims. We are reopening it now as to persons, and it will not be long before we shall reopen it as to claims, for the purpose of letting in other claims than those originally designed to be provided for. These are some of the fruits of the practice that commenced, I think, in relation to these Cherokee treaties—the practice of going behind the treaty itself for the purpose of ascertaining what were the parol declarations of the agents and commissioners at the time the treaty was made, and the attempt to execute, not what the treaty provided, but what might be proved by interested persons—what the agents themselves had declared, and whatever understanding they might set up in relation to it. I have no doubt, sir, that the adoption of this amendment will in the end serve to reopen the matter still further; and I have as little doubt that what the Senator from Arkansas says is true, that the claim will ultimately be allowed, and I do not know that we gain anything by resisting it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. President, if I were called upon, I should state deliberately that the Senator from Virginia, chairman of the Committee on Finance, is one of the most amiable and imperturbable men I ever met with in my life. Why, he speaks of this matter in kind terms, as if we never had known of these Indian claims before. We were called upon for a large amount, on a former occasion, in favor of these Indians, and an extended discussion took place upon it, and at last it was concluded that we would go the whole bait, swallow it all; and that we might deem ourselves as finally rid and clear of it, we put in a "final settlement" clause, and said that it was an end of the matter; that it was in final satisfaction of all the demands in favor of these Indians against the Government. But one brief session of Congress passes away, and so far from its being a settlement, up comes individuals presenting their claims and asking that we shall open this "final settlement"—shall go into a reinvestigation of the matter—shall ascertain who have any claims that were not ascertained, and pay them. Why, sir, this is very extraordinary.

The Senator from Virginia is certainly right that this is an outrage upon the generosity of the Senate. But he speaks of it kindly; and he concludes that, as these claims are immortal, and will be paid, we might as well surrender at first as at last—come down and pay the money, and, if possible, get another receipt. Now, for my part, I am disposed to stand by what we have done heretofore, rely upon the receipt we have heretofore taken, and say, on this occasion, to the Committee on Indian Affairs, "We will not deviate from the receipt we have formerly taken—we will not reopen these matters—we will not appropriate any more money for this purpose." If the Senate will do that, it occurs to me that we shall hear nothing more from the Senator from Arkansas in regard to the Cherokees; for he has certainly spoken of them to an extent hardly endurable by any other condition of the nervous system than that of the Senator from Virginia. [Laughter.] The Senator from Virginia seems to bear it patiently; but I wish that he would stand up a little more, and stand firmly, until he finds that he will have to yield.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator mistakes me very much if he supposes that I intend to vote for the amendment. If he wishes to arrest it, he had better give me a little of his assistance.

Mr. WALKER. I am doing so.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not know anything in reference to the original consideration; but I do know this: that I have received communications from Georgia—which I know to be correct—from persons who state that this whole difficulty arose in consequence of the want of proper advertisement to the Indians who were entitled to the money. These advertisements were not made in the public press; but they were made at cross roads and divers other places; and persons who were entitled to the money, knew nothing at all about it. Now, surely they should not be prohibited by any terms in that treaty in reference to its finality, from coming in to receive that which is justly due to them, and which has been acknowledged by the Government to be due to them. The difficulty arises exclusively out of the fact that they have not been advised that they were entitled to this claim. I am sure that is the case in one instance, and I dare say it is in others. If that be the case, where is the necessity, where is the justice of refusing this appropriation?

I hope my friend from Virginia will continue to have the amiable disposition which the Senator from Wisconsin has attributed to him, and that he will not resist the claim. It is a small amount, but it is of very large consequence to those interested. Nothing has been said against its justice. The whole difficulty has arisen because the parties entitled were not properly forewarned of the time when, and place where, they should come forward and make their claims known.

Mr. CASS. I do not see why the principle of this amendment, if carried out, should not apply to all payments to Indians of annuities where they are required to be paid per capita. Indians might come forward and say that they were not advertised of the payment of an annuity, and therefore did not receive their per capita allowance, and demand it of the Government. I do not see why this principle may not apply to every case, if it can be applied to this case; and if it does apply, almost every Indian will say: "The agent was mistaken; I did not receive my proper annuities; I could not go there and get payment. You undertook to give so much per capita, but you did not comply with your contract. I have not got my allowance." Besides, it appears to me that the whole facts of the case are entirely too loose to warrant legislation. If we can make this provision for sixty men, why not extend it to six thousand men, on the same ground? I am opposed to it.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I take this occasion to say that I have listened to this discussion with great satisfaction, because it has brought me to the conclusion that I can, without violation of my conscientious feelings of right, vote for once with the Senator from Virginia against an appropriation. I do it with great pleasure; and as we all have some strong interest in maintaining him in his health and popularity, I call upon the Senate to unite with me and others in voting down this amendment as an encouragement to the vigilance of the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have only one word more to say. The Senator from North Carolina, I admit, is a very liberal man in reference to claims generally; and I only wonder that he has turned round now at the time when he should hold on strongly in the cause of right and justice. If a bill were passed making an appropriation to the members of Congress—I grant you, as we are keen and astute in reference to our rights, constructive mileage and others—it would be very proper that, after two or three years, if we had not made our application, we should be refused payment. I apprehend, however, that that case, unfortunately, never will arise. But here is a case where you are going to make payment of a certain amount of money, and you are not forewarning the beneficiaries of the time and place at which they should come and receive it. If this claim is just, I ask Senators if there is any reason to call it a stale claim, when you have never notified the individuals of the place where, and the time when they should come forward and receive it?

Why, sir, one of the objections to Caligula was, that he posted his laws so high that nobody could read them. But this is worse still. You pass laws; you put them in your statute-book, and expect the Cherokees and their descendants to read them, and do not give them a chance to do so. But you send your agent there, and, like Caligula, he sticks up his notices upon some of the cross-roads; and when these people, forewarned now for the first time by being refused payment, present their claim, we are told that it is a stale claim.

I hope my friend, the Senator from North Carolina, will go with me in this matter, and not sustain the Senator from Virginia. I know it is the business of the Senator from Virginia—and he does it faithfully and truly—to look closely into all these claims; but why this extraordinary vigilance over this small claim? I ask Senators if they believe this claim to be just? and if nobody can gainsay what I said, (and which I said, I think, on proper authority,) then this claim is just, for the proper notification was not given to these Indians, and they should not be thrown aside from the Treasury of this Government in consequence of the acts of the Government itself.

Mr. CASS. The Senator from Georgia will allow me to say, that I think he misapprehends the condition of these Indians. I do not believe the fact, that there ever was to be a payment of money to any Indian tribe whatever, which was previously made known to the tribe—that they were not all there to receive it. The fact that there is money to be paid operates upon them like the fiery cross did upon the Scotch. They come from one end of the land to the other, and present their claims. It is utterly impossible, I think, from my knowledge of the Indians, to keep from them the fact that money is to be paid. They will all know of such a thing.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. A word in reference to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Michigan. Every word that falls from that honorable Senator in connection with appropriations for Indians of course receives a consideration here entitling it to more than ordinary respect. But that honorable Senator will allow me to say to him that here was an investigation spreading over the territory of four States, and embracing hundreds of Indians, many of them thirty or forty miles apart. In the first place, an agent went for the purpose of ascertaining the number of Indians; and afterwards another followed in his wake with the money of the Government for the purpose of paying them. The declaration that that Senator has made, founded upon his knowledge of the Indian character, was true. The Indians were all round the pay table. They were there complaining that their names had not been placed upon the roll by the previous agent, whose duty it was to identify them. The Indians could not be paid unless their names were upon the roll. But true to the instincts of the Indian character—and it illustrates the truth of what the Senator says—they were there.

But there is another feature in this case which astonishes me more than anything else I have ever met with as a member of the Senate. The duties of the Committee on Indian Affairs are at best but a thankless task; and in the investigations which they make, they do it independent of those auspices, considerations, and soft influences which too often pervade the Senate, and which advocate by arguments, too frequently irresistible, the adoption of measures which are enforced by more powerful considerations. But the Indians are a dependent people, without political power or patronage, who come here always as suppliants upon the generosity and justice of the Government; and when we give a patient investigation to one of their claims, and report it as worthy the favorable consideration of this body, there are some who pounce down upon it with that kind of opposition which seems to argue that everything connected with Indian affairs is necessarily rotten in its incipency, and corrupt in its history throughout.

But that is not the circumstance to which I particularly allude. It is, that the distribution of this small appropriation is to be in North Carolina, and the Senator from North Carolina has evinced a stern kind of justice in refusing to vote this little favor. Why, sir, if any gentleman gets up here and moves something to be disbursed in Arkansas, I take it under my most favorable consideration, and it requires arguments of the sternest and strongest character to induce me to abandon it. Here we see the rare instance of a Senator, from the State where the disbursement is to be made, considering the justice of the claim in which it originates. When I see this, I am induced to believe that I myself am not infallible. I am induced to believe that there is something wrong in this case, and that it comes to us, really, in a questionable shape. I am disposed to signalize so rare an occasion as this by something that is almost equally as rare; and that is to withdraw the amendment. Were it not that it is the amendment of the committee, and that I have no voice now in their decision, in order that my course might be signalized by something as rare as that which has distinguished the Senator from North Carolina, I should withdraw it. I will, however, submit this case to the Senate. It is really too simple a matter to engage the attention of this venerable body for so long a time, and I will, without another word, submit it to the decision of the Senate.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I am extremely sorry that my friend from Arkansas has made the remark which has just fallen from him, because it revealed a trait in his character of the existence of which I had no knowledge before, that when an appropriation is proposed to be made, he inquires not primarily into the justice of the demand, but into the section of country in which the money is to be expended. Now, I never trouble myself about where the money is to be expended; my only anxiety is to ascertain whether it is honestly and justly due, and whether, under the circumstances, the Government ought to pay it. I would as cheerfully vote for an appropriation of a sum of money, to be expended among my friend's friends in Arkansas as I would for the same sum to be expended among my friends in North Carolina. But until my friend mentioned that this appropriation was to be expended in North Carolina, I knew not where it was to be spent; and now it is a matter of entire indifference to me.

Perhaps if the idea had struck me at the beginning, that it was to be so spent, I might have contented myself with giving a silent vote against it; but I am very glad that I did not know it, because it gives me an opportunity of committing myself openly against a wrongful application of the public money to any quarter of the country.

My friend says that the Committee on Indian Affairs have a very hard, dry, and thankless office to discharge. They have to examine cases which bring them not under the "soft influences" which he seems to imagine govern the action of other committees, and perhaps extend their authority over the whole Senate. But under whatever influences that committee act, I appeal to him, and to the whole experience of this body, if they have not been in the habit of exercising a most controlling influence over the action of the Senate? I have always been in the habit of going with the Indian Committee. I have always been in the habit of voting for what they recommended as proper to be appropriated. My friend will permit me to remind him that one of the easiest and most effectual means by which the influence and control of that or any other committee, over the opinion and judgment of this body may be ultimately lost, is to press upon our kind and yielding confidence cases like this, which will not bear the test of a moment's examination.

Now, what is this case? I shall be a little jealous of the Committee on Indian Affairs hereafter with propriety. I remember the case well. We appropriated a large sum of money for the purpose of discharging the totality of these Cherokee claims. We put it into the bill that that was the last appropriation Congress would make upon the subject. We declared that it should be in full. We ordered it to be distributed to the persons who were entitled to it. Advertisements were made. Every opportunity of information was afforded to persons who might have just claims, and the money was paid to the applicants. Now, say the Committee on Indian Affairs, here are some people who did not get notice and we must pay them, and then put in the proviso that this shall be the last appropriation. But if your first proviso is worthless, what virtue do you give to it when you reinstate it in the present appropriation? None. Then the whole result in this: that this Government can never, by any process, any notice in an appropriation, any declaration whatever, clear itself of the demands set up on behalf of this Cherokee nation. No, sir, we can never give to this, what we hope we have given to the compromise measures, the character of finality.

Now, I do not wish to adopt any such principle or system for the government of Congress. This Government has made sincere and earnest efforts to discharge its obligation towards these Indians. They have made this as a final appropriation. It was a large and liberal appropriation. It is possible that somebody who was entitled, may have failed in receiving his share; but that possibility will exist always, and the only way by which the Government can be discharged at all, in my judgment, is by holding to the first payment, declaring it to be final and refusing to reopen the investigation. In all human affairs there must be an end sometime, an end to accounts, and open and unliquidated demands. I think that the act of Congress fixed a proper period and made suitable arrangements, and a just appropriation to make it not only final by the direct declaration and order of Congress, but final in right and justice; and, therefore, I think with the Senator from Virginia, we ought not to reopen it. If we do, as the Senator from Michigan has said, why may not six hundred or six thousand people come here, at the next session, and demand another appropriation on precisely the same ground?

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to; and the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was rejected.

Mr. COOPER. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to move to amend the bill by striking out the following:

"Eel Rivers, (Miami.)

"For permanent annuity stipulated in the fourth article of the treaty of the 3d of August, 1795, $500.

"For permanent annuity, stipulated in the third article of the treaty of the 21st of August, 1805, $250.

"For permanent annuity, stipulated in the third article of the treaty of the 30th of September, 1809, $350: Provided, That the money appropriated by the three preceding clauses, together with the similar appropriations in 1850 and 1851, for the Eel Rivers (Miami) heretofore withheld from payment, shall be paid to said Eel Rivers (Miami) only, and to no other band, or nation, or individuals; and that all annuities heretofore due, and appropriated to the Eel Rivers, (Miami), and erroneously or otherwise paid to the Miami nation, shall be repaid to the Eel Rivers (Miami) out of the money appropriated in 1851 and 1852, for payment of annuities to said Miami nation; or, if the Commissioner of Indian Affairs deem it more expedient and just to the Indians, shall be paid and is hereby appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States, to be repaid to the United States, by being withheld from the Miami annuities, in such installments as the Commissioner may deem expedient."

And inserting in lieu thereof:

For the redemption and final extinction of the annuities due to the Eel Rivers (Miami) under the provisions of the treaties of August 3, 1795, August 21, 1805, and 30th September, 1809, $15,000, to be paid per capita: Provided, That before paying the said sum, or any part thereof, to the said Eel River Miami, they shall relinquish, in such form as the Secretary of the Interior shall direct, all claim and demand on the United States, for any further annuity or payment: And provided further, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, before paying the said sum of money, as above directed, to ascertain who are the individuals composing the said band, without regard to the place of their residence, and to pay to the said individuals, so ascertained, per capita, the sum of money herein before appropriated.

I will explain the amendment. I suppose there will be no objection to it on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Finance at any rate. In the treaty of 1795, there was an appropriation made for the Eel River Miami, then a tribe numbering some three or four hundred souls. An annuity was provided, of $500, to be paid to them annually in cattle, and tools, and presents. In 1805, a second treaty was made, by which another annuity of $250 was provided to be paid to them. In 1809, a third treaty was made, by which $350 more was to be paid to them annually in perpetuity. These sums, amounting to $1,100 in all, were paid to that tribe up to 1837, when it became extinct, or nearly extinct. Since that time, these sums have been paid to the Miami proper, resident in Missouri. There has been paid to the Miami some $13,800 of money, which the Commissioner of Indian Affairs believes to be due to the Eel River Miami; or he has requested the committee to ask for the payment now to the Eel River Miami, of the sum which has been misappropriated, and paid for fifteen years past to the Miami. Last year he directed an investigation to be made into the fact as to whether the tribe, known as the Eel River tribe, continued to exist. A gentleman, now a member of the House of Representatives, [Mr. Fitch,] was appointed for this purpose. He applied himself to the duty, and discovered that there are now living in the State of Indiana, sixteen old squaws and young children—the sole remnant of this tribe. It is to them he recommends that this $13,800 be paid. The committee do not think it is proper that these sums should continue to be paid to that tribe any longer. The national existence of the tribe has ceased. It is no longer a tribe, exercising tribal authority. The objects for which the annuities were originally given, have ceased to exist; the committee have therefore recommended that the money due to the tribe up to this time, be paid to the whole body of the nation—if I may use the word "nation" in application to sixteen individuals, residing on a single quarter of a section of land, subject to the laws of the United States, and not pretending to exercise the functions of a tribe—and on the payment of it, they are required to relinquish forever the annuities. It will be perceived that the amendment strikes out of the bill the appropriation that is required to be made, and inserts an appropriation of a similar amount, or nearly a similar amount, which is to be paid to the tribe, in consideration of a relinquishment of the annuities for all time to come. With that understanding, I suppose there will be no objection to making the appropriation. It is, in fact, striking out an appropriation, and extinguishing, for all time to come, these annuities.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, the provision as it stands in the bill, arises out of this state of things: It was supposed that the Eel River tribe of Miami was extinct, and the annuity was therefore paid to the Missouri Miami. It was discovered afterwards that a portion of this Eel River tribe remained. Mr. Fitch, a member of the House of Representatives from Indiana, was appointed to investigate the fact, and he ascertained that there were about sixteen of them, I think, still living. It was provided in the appropriation bill of last year, that the Eel River Miami should be paid what had been withheld from them; but that it should be deducted from the annuities given to the other Miamis. It was suggested, however, that this was too large a deduction to be made at once from the annuities of the other Miamis; and the House of Representatives, in the present bill, amended the former provision, by providing that the amount should be paid to them by degrees.

The difference between the provision of the House, as I understand it, and that now proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, is, that the Committee on Indian Affairs propose that this sum which is to be paid to the Eel River Miamis shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and not out of the annuities of the other Miamis; but they propose to compensate the United States for this provision, by the extinguishment of this annuity hereafter.

Mr. COOPER. That is it.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not know that I shall have any objection to it if it can be done. It is true it would cost the Treasury a little more, but it seems to me that, when tribes are so nearly extinguished, it would be well to set the precedent of making provision to terminate their annuities—which they can no longer want. If an arrangement can be made with the Eel Rivers to extinguish their annuities, I should have no objection to paying them out of the Treasury some compensation for it. The doubtful part of the amendment, in my mind is, whether we are not releasing the other Miamis from the obligation of refunding the amount which they have wrongfully received. It is true the amount is not very much, but the question is, whether it may not be an encouragement to frauds to be perpetrated by the Indian tribes, and whether they may not come in and obtain, not only their own share, but what is due to other tribes. If in making this provision we do not require the tribe which has obtained the money to refund it, do we not encourage them to impose upon their neighbors? This is only a question with me. So far as I am concerned, I believe I have no objection to the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, it seems to me that the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Virginia has no existence in fact. All tribal attributes on the part of these people have ceased. They do not pretend to exercise tribal jurisdiction. They are living under the laws of the United States, without pretending to exercise for themselves any authority. The objects for which the annuities were originally provided, at least the largest annuities, have ceased to exist altogether. There are now but sixteen souls of this band. Three of them are very old squaws. The others are young Indians. Some of them have arrived at the age of maturity, and some have not. The annuity of $1,100 is due to the Eel Rivers, and not to the Missouri Miamis, and it will cease on the payment of this sum. A provision is made in the amendment that the Eel Rivers shall relinquish all claim to the annuities for the future before this sum of $15,000 is paid. The committee thought that it was better that some amount—that which would now be due to them if they had continued to exist as a tribe—should be paid to them to stop the annuities; but they did not think it worth while to seek to recover from the Missouri Miamis the amount which they have received through a misapplication of the fund. This amendment will relieve the United States for the future from this annual appropriation without doing injustice to the Indians. It will give them a competence, and that is all that can be asked of us. The amendment provides for the manner in which it shall be done—that the money shall be distributed per capita amongst all the individuals of the tribe; those individuals to be ascertained in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall point out.

Mr. HUNTER. The amendment seems to be well guarded, but there is another doubt which arises in my mind. The Eel River Miamis were supposed to be extinct; and the annuity due to them was paid to the Missouri Miamis. What I wish to know is, whether it may not be necessary, in order to extinguish this annuity, to obtain not only the assent of the Eel Rivers, but also the assent of the other Miamis; for I do not see why the whole annuity should have been paid to them heretofore, unless they had some title to it. Will the annuity revert to the Missouri Miamis in the event that the other tribe becomes extinct?

Mr. COOPER. I will answer the question. It was through a mistake that the amount was paid to the Missouri Miamis. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs understands the question perfectly, and this year and last year the amount was not paid to the Missouri Miamis; so that there is no difficulty in that respect.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. President, I see no good reason for making the change proposed by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. I am unwilling to see the amount appropriated here, appropriated in gross. The Eel River tribe were at one time a part of the Miami—recognized as such but, nevertheless, known as a distinct band, having a distinct organization. It is true, as has been stated, that most of them are females. There are, perhaps, but two warriors, an old and a young man, living. Upon the representations of the Miami tribe, that the Eel River branch of the tribe were extinct, the Miami tribe for several years past have been drawing the annuities due the Eel Rivers. It is only within the last two years that the fact has been known to the Department, that the Eel River band of the Miami tribe, now, I believe, fourteen in number, are in existence.

Mr. COOPER. There are sixteen. I have the names here.

Mr. BRIGHT. Sixteen were reported; but I believe two have since died. At the instance of the Indian Department, one of my colleagues, in the other House, ascertained the residence of these Indians, their ages, &c. I understand that this amendment has been prepared at the instance of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who, as I supposed, when he was before the Committee on Finance, approved the provision of the bill as it came from the House. Whether he has, or has not, changed his position since, I do not know; but I understood him to recommend the appropriation of the money as provided for in the bill as it came to us. If he has changed his opinion, and has any good reason for it, I should like to hear it.

Mr. COOPER. He has not changed; but the committee have examined the question, and believe that, as the tribe has ceased to exist as a tribe, and as the objects for which these annuities were paid have ceased also, it was something worse than folly to continue to appropriate.

Mr. BRIGHT. To what committee does the gentleman refer?

Mr. COOPER. The Committee on Indian Affairs; by the authority of which committee I have reported the amendment.

Mr. BRIGHT. For several years past the Miami tribe of Indians, located in Missouri, have drawn the annuity due to this Eel River branch of the tribe. The bill, as it came from the House, simply provides that the amounts to be paid to the Eel River Miamis shall be refunded out of the annuities of the other portion of the Miami tribe. Hereafter, if the Government desires to purchase out and pay a round sum for the amount due under the provisions of the treaty, they will have a right to do so; but now there is justly and fairly due the Eel River tribe of Indians the amount of money provided by the bill.

Mr. COOPER. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to make a suggestion? We appropriate $1,200 more than is due to them up to this time. We propose to pay the Eel Rivers the amount that has been misapplied since 1837, and we make it the round sum of $15,000, which is $1,200 more than is actually due them, and we provide for the purchase, for that round sum, of the annuities.

Mr. BRIGHT. These Indians ask no more than is due them. All they ask is, that the Government shall execute the treaty made with them. It was stipulated by the treaty, that they should receive so much annually. It would have been paid to them had the Government known where they were; but it appears that, in the breaking up and reorganization of the band, these Indians were left behind, on the Wabash river, where they remained. As is said by the honorable Senator, they are now about sixteen in number. As soon as their whereabouts was ascertained, and their identity was acknowledged, the Indian Department admitted that that amount of money ought to be paid to them; and I am unwilling to accept for them $1,200 or $1,500, or any other amount, upon condition that their claim shall be extinguished.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator is entirely mistaken again. We propose to appropriate $15,000 to purchase out their annuity, which is $1,200 more than they would be entitled to. We appropriate not only the sum that has been withheld from them for thirteen years past, but $1,200 more. We now propose to give them $15,000 to purchase in the annuity, and relieve the United States for the future from the payment of it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I understood the Senator perfectly, and I think it is he that is mistaken, and not myself. I wish to be understood as saying that if the Government had gone on to pay these Eel River Indians the amount of money due them under the treaty, instead of paying it to the Miamis, the Government would have paid them over $13,000—the amount provided for in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives and the Committee on Finance. That amount is the amount to which the Eel Rivers are entitled; but we do not claim that they are entitled to it out of the National Treasury. We claim that they are entitled to it out of the money paid by the Government to the other branch of the Miami tribe of Indians, and the bill, as it stands, provides that the amount shall be taken out of the annuities due the Miami tribe of Indians. I am unwilling to accept for them the $1,200 proposed to be given as an additional sum to terminate their claim on the Treasury.
